THE SILVER BELL (Two Parts—Sept. 3).—A silver bell for the mission is brought to Don Manuel by Captain Gometz. Gometz falls in love with Dolores, the Spanish Grandee's daughter, and Don Manuel orders him from the hacienda. The captain tries to persuade Dolores to elope with him. Fearing her father, she will not consent, but offers no remarkable resistance when her lover forcibly carries her off. An outlaw robs the mission of the precious bell and conceals it in the den near where Gometz and his love are in hiding. The captain overpowers the bandits by working upon their religious superstitions, rescues the bell and takes both it and the girl back to the hacienda. Don Manuel forgives the captain and agrees to his marriage with Dolores.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (No. 32—August 24).—The finding of the thief who stole Margaret's cameo necklace is bound up with the honor of a character whom we have grown to think a great deal of in the film, and whom Our Mutual Girl has not been unwilling to regard as a possible suitor for her hand. So it is evident, that as the mystery begins to unravel, still intenser emotions are evoked in the nature of the dramatic situation. Dunbar, in the role of volunteer detective, the only person who has the inside knowledge which would lead to the arrest of the real thief, is himself under suspicion. The least misstep will cause his arrest. He even fears that his efforts to recover her necklace for Our Mutual Girl may cost him his life.

Margaret, meanwhile, is trying to forget her loss in shopping tours and a visit to the studio of James Montgomery Flagg. Mrs. Knickerbocker is determined to do all she can to divert the poor child in her trouble. Visiting Spaulding's Fifth avenue shop, Margaret is outfitted in the very latest clothes for sporting wear. The loose sweaters of soft-hued Shetland wool, the breezy Panamas and Norfolk top coats are peculiarly becoming to her youthful face and figure. She insists upon wearing one of the costumes to Mr. Flagg's studio, and although to Auntie it seems just a trifle unconventional for a girl to appear in a white serge suit, cut distinctly on sporting lines, in the city, she consents.

Mr. Flagg evidently approves of the effect, however, as he begins a drawing of Margaret the moment after he is introduced to her.

All this time Dunbar is spending far from a happy day. He has borrowed the white satin jewel case from Margaret to study the thumb print of the burglar, and as he compares it with the print on a police card which he takes from a locked cabinet in his rooms, his suspicions are confirmed. Then he goes to the phone and calls up a number in the poor district on the lower west side.

When his visitor enters, it is with a shock that we seem to see Dunbar, himself, in duplicate. Yet on closer inspection, there is an obvious difference. The thrilling denouement of his relation to his mysterious double; how Dunbar traces him to his lodgings with the help of Anni, the four-footed crook; and how the thief manages to conceal the necklace, makes the thirty-second instalment one of the most intensely interesting of all that have so far been produced.

THE SHERIFF'S CHOICE (Sept. 9).—A Western Sheriff has a young son who breaks his father's heart by his actions in gambling, drinking, etc. The father tries every means to make his boy reform and lead a decent life but all in vain, and after the boy has assaulted a barkeep—stolen a horse, and fled the town, the father leaves too, unable to bear the disgrace among his friends.

In another town he settles and is made sheriff. The boy has degenerated into an outlaw and bears a bad record, culminating in the murder of a rancher in the hills. News is brought to the new sheriff and he sets out to find and capture the outlaw. He does so but finds it is his own son. He is torn between his duty and his love for his erring boy, but finally decides to let fate decide. He knows that, close by, one trail leads over a dangerous cliff, and that the others leads across the hills and to safety. He tells the boy to go and he will not follow for five minutes. The boy goes, takes the path to the cliff, while the father watches him go. He struggles with a desire to stop him but lets him go. Following in a few minutes he finds the boy has fallen over and later finds his body, and realizes that his boy is beyond all further crime and safe from himself forever.

BROKEN NOSE BAILEY (2 Parts—Sept. 12).—Bailey, a crook, has his nose broken by Burton, the detective, in a street fight, and is a marked man thereafter, easy for the police to capture. He pulls off a job and is traced easily and captured by Burton by reason of his broken nose. Bailey now naturally nurses revenge against Burton. Bailey is sent away but escapes from prison and has his nose straightened by a benevolent doctor. He is now able to pass unrecognized by Burton, and feels safe in working out his revenge, which he plans against Burton and his sweetheart. He has the girl lured away, but Burton rescues her and Bailey goes back to prison.

MAJESTIC.

GRANNY (August 25).—Nell and her old grandmother are poor and alone in the world and finally leave their old home and wander into the country in search of work. They reach a little country town and apply at a boarding house for work, Nell agreeing to work for nothing but board and lodging for herself and "Granny." This Sears, the proprietor, agrees to, but Nell is worked to death at waiting on table and other chores, and Sears is very unkind to her and "Granny."

Graham Wilkes, a wealthy young man from the city, on the outs with his father, comes to the boarding house and becomes interested in little Nell, much to Sear's disgust, the latter redoubling his harsh treatment of Nell. Finally they can stand it no longer and leave. But enroute Nell overhears a plan to rob Sears and Wilkes by a couple of tramps, and in spite of her being badly treated by the former, she decides to warn them and prevent the robbery, which she does. Sears now repents of his treatment of her but Wilkes has become interested and Nell turns to him for care and comfort for herself and Granny.

SIERRA JIM'S REFORMATION (Sept. 8).—Sierra Jim, wounded and desperate, flees from the sheriff and is given refuge in the cabin of a young girl, the sweetheart of the pony express rider. Jim thus escapes his pursuers and later plans the holdup of the pony express rider, which succeeds and Jim is about to distribute the spoils of his deed, when he sees the photo of the express rider's sweetheart, which he recognizes as that of the girl who had saved him. He forces his pals to give up their share of the loot, returns it to the express rider, and begs for the photo of the girl, and taking it, he rides away across the hills to a new and better life.

A CORRECTION.

Exhibitors will please observe that the Universal Film Company has substituted for its Crystal release of September 1, entitled "A Seaside Flirt," another picture of the same brand named "Curing a Lazy Wife." A synopsis of the latter picture will be published in a forthcoming issue of the paper.

THE FILM DETECTIVE (Four Parts—August 26).—Jack Daingerfield has been going a fast pace and has lost his entire fortune. His creditors hold a meeting and after a stormy interview he agrees to give them all he has. One of the creditors offers to arrange a marriage between him and a rich girl, Mary Delmar. Jack weakly consents after he has been introduced to the young woman.

Lord Lytton, a jealous rival, breaks the romance, and Daingerfield, in despair, accepts a commission from a moving picture company to make a film of lion hunting in Africa. When he reaches the lion country he manages to get several wounderful pictures of the lions, but one of his friends is attacked by a wounded lion, and before they can kill the enraged beast the man is mangled beyond recognition. Jack moves to a safer place to take another film of a lion that is breaking from cover.

At this moment he is shot in the back by the two assassins, Lord Lytton and one of his (Jack's) creditors. Bill Tuttle, a bright young American who was the cameraman for the expedition, succeeds in getting the two villains on his film, and when the triumphant hunters return to England the villains are exposed in their true colors by the indisputable evidence. Daingerfield finally wins the girl.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Ninth Episode—Reels 17 and 18).—With Norton discredited and unable to see Florence after the scene in the Countess Olga's home, the conspirators find that the chief obstacle in the way of a successful consummation of their schemes has been removed. Only Jones, the aged butler, stands between them and the capture of the girl, whom they believe possesses the secret of the missing million. In the Hargreaves' mansion she is safe. Acting now under the direction of the Countess Olga, whose sharp feminine wit evolved the plan which had eliminated Norton —temporarily at least—from their reckoning, with the co-operation of Braine, the conspirators weave a cunning web about their victim. An official document, committing Florence to an insane asylum, is forged by one of the gang. Armed with this, it is planned to seize Florence at the first favorable opportunity.

Day after day the conspirators keep a close watch upon her movements but no favorable opportunity offers, until a day that Florence decides to go shopping. Once away from the house with no protector but her companion, Susan Farlow, they feel that success will at last be theirs. After visiting several of the Fifth avenue stores, Florence and her friend dismiss their automobile in front of a florist's in the upper thirties, telling the chauffeur to pick them up later after luncheon. The conspirators who have been trailing them all the morning in a taxi see that their chance has come at last and do not hesitate to grasp it.

At the very door of the shop Braine and the other conspirators seize Florence and drag her into their waiting vehicle. The forged commitment papers are flashed on a policeman, who wants to know what the scuffle is all about, a hurried explanation is made and Florence fighting desperately to free herself in the taxi is carried off, before Miss Farlow, who has entered the florist's shop ahead of her, realizes what has happened.

When the car reaches their headquarters, the conspirators, after a hurried consultation, decide that it will be too dangerous to keep Florence in America. Passages are arranged for on the steamship "George Washington," sailing the same day, and Florence, closely guarded, is taken on board. The false committment papers again prove useful to the plotters and, despite her pleadings, the girl is made a prisoner in her cabin with a coarse female as her guard and attendant.

Once out of New York harbor Florence is allowed more freedom, although constantly under the espionage of her keeper. Hearing the captain say that on the following night the ship will be off the New Foundland Banks, she forms a desperate resolve. It is nearly midnight, when Florence making certain from the woman's heavy breathing, that her keeper is sleeping soundly, noiselessly glides out of her cabin. An instant she pauses at the ship's rail, gathering herself together for the supreme effort. Then, as the vessel plunges forward on the swell of a wave, she hurls herself over the side.

Numbed by the first shock of contact with the chilling water, Florence mechanically keeps herself afloat, watching with dull eyes, the great ship disappear into the darkness. Suddenly, the realization of her terrible situation comes over her and with a cry, that is lost in the surge of the rolling waters, she strikes out convulsively in its wake. Her frantic efforts soon exhaust her, her brain whirls, a drowsiness that is sweeter than sleep creeps over her head and then—nothingness.

THE BAREFOOT BOY (Kalem—Three Parts).—Eleanor Warren is loved by Harold Rives, a struggling artist. Although fond of the young man, Eleanor longs for the comforts of wealth. Walter Hastings, a wealthy Southern planter, meets Eleanor and falls in love with her. Rives sees the two together. Filled with jealous rage, the artist creates a scene and is ordered from the house. Shortly afterwards Rives hears that Eleanor has married Hastings. Immediately after the wedding, Hastings and his bride leave for their Southern home. Later, a daughter is born. Eleanor, however, is not happy. Her longing for the gay times of her girlhood are intensified by the messages she receives from her chum in the North. Eleanor also learns that Rives, favored by fortune, is now one of the foremost artists of the day.

Why Don't Our Competitors Take it Up?

She receives news that her aunt has died, together with a letter informing her that she has inherited her relative's estate. Now in a position to take an active part in the affairs of society, Eleanor, knowing that her husband would never consent to join in the social whirl, determines to leave him. When Hastings returns home that evening, he finds a note in which his wife informs him of her purpose. Back in her old home, Eleanor plunges into the social vortex. She meets Rives once more. The woman falls madly in love with him. Rives, however, learning what Eleanor has done, sees her for just what she is. Hastings, embittered by his wife's faithlessness, is filled with a hatred towards all women. Turning his back upon civilization, the man takes his daughter, Frances, into the wilderness, where he leads a primitive life. So great is his distrust of all women, that the father rears Frances up as a boy.

Fifteen years later Frances as wild as any boy. Clad in trousers and rough shirt, she contributes toward the family larder with her rifle and rod. A surveying party headed by John Weir, enters the forest. Frances becomes a favorite with the men, who are ignorant of her real sex. Rives, on a sketching trip, meets Frances. He induces her to pose for a painting. As "The Barefoot Boy," his painting creates a sensation.

A falling tree crushes Hastings to death. Frances' cries bring Weir and his men to the scene. Later, Weir learns that the "boy" is in reality a girl. The man takes Frances home to his wife. The couple adopt the orphan. Fate causes Rives to stroll towards the Weir home. Frances sees her friend of the forest and rushes to greet him. The artist, amazed, draws back, but his amazement increases when he discovers that the beautiful girl before him and "The Barefoot Boy" are one and the same. Rives has tired of the friendship of Eleanor. Frances' youth and freshness win the man's heart. The artist wins the Weirs' consent to paint Frances in her feminine attire. Eleanor sees Rives take the girl in his arms. Frantic at the thought of losing Rives, Eleanor resolves to bare her friendship with the artist. Unable to believe the story, Frances shrinks from her in horror. The girl learns the truth, however. The artist declares that his heart belongs to Frances. Rushing from the room, she meets Weir and tells him all that has transpired. The surveyor confronts Eleanor and Rives and informs the woman of Frances' identity. The following day Eleanor appears at the Weir home and begs to see her daughter. Weir informs her that Frances has gone to visit her father's grave. Frances is sobbing over the rude mound when a touch on her arm causes her to turn. She confronts Eleanor, who informs her of their relationship. The girl stares at the heart-broken woman. A sudden impulse causes Frances to take her mother in her arms. Throwing herself at her daughter's feet, Eleanor begs for her forgiveness.

Just at this moment, a shot emanating from Rives' studio brings his servants to the scene. They find the artist on the floor, a revolver clutched in his hand.

KIT, THE ARKANSAW TRAVELER (Kalem—Three Parts).—Mary Adams, about to visit relatives in a distant part of the country, is entrusted to the care of Manuel Bond. The girl's beauty inflames Bond, a gambler and a scoundrel. That night, when the stage coach halts, Mary is horrified to discover that Bond has registered for both as man and wife. The gambler turns a deaf ear to the girl's frantic pleas. After locking her in the room, the scoundrel proceeds to the barroom. Mary escapes by means of the window. The girl comes upon a party of settlers. Mary joins the party. Later, the girl meets Kit, a young backwoodsman. It is a case of love at first sight and the two are married the same day.

Six years pass. Manuel Bond, who has fled to the Arkansaw country because of an unfortunate Mississippi River encounter, hears a familiar tune being played. He comes upon Kit, who is trying to play a tune he had heard upon the Mississippi, but cannot recall the last half of it. By taking the violin from Kit's hands and finishing the air, Bond wins his friendship. The gambler discovers that Mary is Kit's wife. Later, when the backwoodsman goes to shoot a bird for dinner, Bond threatens to kill Kit unless Mary agrees to run away with him. Terrified, and fearing lest the gambler slay her husband who is unconscious of what is transpiring, the unfortunate woman consents. Seizing her three-year-old daughter, Alice, Mary enters Bond's buckboard and flees with him.

Upon Kit's return, a neighbor informs the husband of what has happened. Mad with rage, Kit follows. He comes upon the three just as they are being ferried across the river. Kit and the gambler engage in a pistol duel. A bullet strikes Kit. The man drops. Crazed by the sight, Mary leaps into the river and is drowned. Bond continues his flight, carrying little Alice with him. Upon his recovery, Kit returns to his cabin. Desiring to obliterate all thoughts of Mary from his mind, the man burns the cabin to the ground.

Fifteen years pass. Bond has resumed his nefarious profession on the Mississippi under an assumed name. Fortune has smiled upon Kit, who is a prosperous stock-raiser. The two men meet in a saloon, and although neither recognizes the other, each is filled with an instinctive hatred. Alice has been placed in a convent by Bond. The girl believes the gambler to be her adopted father. The incidents of the past dwell but faintly in her memory. Bond, desiring to use Alice in his gambling operations, orders the girl to come home. Kit, now known as "The Arkansaw Traveler," witnesses the meeting between the two and is instinctively drawn towards the girl, finding something hauntingly familiar about her. The stock-raiser takes passage on a steamboat which is to make a trip down the river. When about to board the vessel, he comes to the aid of Frau Peddler, a German woman, who has been pickpocketed by one of Bond's gang.

Aided by Judge "Snuggs," "Major" Squigs and other henchmen, the gambler plans to rob the safe of the steamboat during the trip. Alice, who is among the passengers, comes upon Kit while the latter is playing the famous air, "The Arkansaw Traveler." The tune revives the old memories. Despite the years that have elapsed, the girl gradually recalls the terrible incident on the river. James Temple, a young planter, is traveling with his widowed mother. Temple and Alice fall in love with each other. Aware of the fact that the boy is in possession of a large sum of money, Bond inveigles him into a game of cards. Mrs. Temple sees that her boy is losing his last dollar. Her grief attracts the attention of Kit and he promises to help her. Kit discovers that Bond has stacked the cards. "The Arkansaw Traveler" calmly announces his intention of sitting in the game and cleverly succeeds in cleaning the crooks out of the money they won from Temple. Returning the money to the boy Kit warns him never to play with thieves. Enraged, the gamblers attempt to shoot Kit, but are awed by the ugly pistols he levels at them. That night, Kit comes upon Alice. In the kindly face of "The Arkansaw Traveler," the girl recognizes her father. Meanwhile, disguised as deckhands, Bond and his men set fire to the steamboat, and in the excitement which ensues, rifle the safe.

Bond comes upon Kit who holds his long-lost daughter is his arms. Stealing from behind, the gambler stabs "The Arkansaw Traveler" and seizing Alice, throws her into the boat which his accomplices have waiting alongside. The desperadoes row to shore. Kit revives, and despite the throbbing wound in his shoulder, leaps into the river and follows. The blazing steamboat is beached and the panic-stricken passengers leap ashore. Frau Peddler had seen the villains at work and informs the ship's officers as to the identity of the culprits. A posse is immediately formed to search for the men.

When Alice, who has fainted, recovers consciousness, she finds herself in an old shack with Bond and his men. Her attempts to escape are frustrated. The posse, headed by Temple, capture the crooks. Bond makes for the river and is confronted by Kit. The two engage in a terrible bowie knife duel. Realizing he faces death, Bond, in desperation, leaps into the river. Kit follows his man. Both disappear beneath the waters. Bubbles rising on the surface tell of the awful struggle going on. A hand suddenly emerges from the water and convulsively clutches at the air. It disappears. Kit, swimming ashore finds Alice in Temple's arms.

CHIP OF THE FLYING "U" (Selig—Three Parts)—Claude Bennett occupies a desk in his father's bank, but does not earn his salt. Idling one morning at his desk, he draws a ridiculous cartoon of his father, which comes to the attention of the bank president, who summarily tells Claude that the town is not big enough for him. After a moment's reflection, Claude replies with spirit: "All right, Dad, I guess I'll go West." Claude Bennett develops into "Chip," a lively young cowboy on the Flying "U" Ranch down in Texas.

Whitmore, the "Old Man," is a hard worker. Chip becomes an all-around man after a number of adventures in which the wildest bronchoes test his staying powers as a rider, and one day the "Old Man" tells him to hook up the team and drive to the station to meet the "old man's" sister, who is a woman doctor. Chip waits around in a dejected manner until the train pulls in. He is delighted to discover that the "old maid doctor" is nothing more or less than a very pretty, charming young lady. Chip improves the time during the ride to the ranch to get well acquainted with the "little doctor," as he already begins to call her in his own mind, whereas she discovers in this tanned and sprightly young cowboy many of the elements which go to make up a hero. She demonstrates her skill with the rifle by shooting a coyote, this feat of arms putting Chip absolutely at her mercy. He succumbs entirely to her natural fascination.

Chip still does a little sketching now and then, some of which comes to the attention of the "little doctor," who encourages him to paint a really good picture. An accident occurs in which Chip is thrown from his horse and dragged at the end of a lasso over the plains at a gallop. His pet cayuse breaks a leg and Chip is about to end its misery with a bullet when the "little doctor" announces that she can set the leg with splints. She does so, and another arrow from Cupid's bow goes to the heart of Chip. Then Chip is laid up with a sprained ankle and the "little doctor" takes care of him. During his recovery he gets to work on the picture, which he paints with great natural skill, and the "Old Man's" silent partner, Dunk, who comes to the ranch on a visit, sees the painting and promises to take it to the city and show it to someone with a knowledge of art. The picture sells for a good fat check.

The "little doctor" captivates everybody. Even Patsy, the cook, with his dirty apron, succumbs to her charms, and when she makes a professional visit to the kitchen and orders him to "clean up," he obeys after much grumbling. The "Old Man" hears the rattling of tins and kettles in the kitchen and makes an investigation. Patsy has the floor covered with soap suds and is scrubbing away with great spirit. The "Old Man" dashes into the kitchen and sprawls all over the floor, sliding on the soap suds. He has it in his heart to murder Patsy and starts after him, but Patsy slides through the door on another installment of soap suds, and the "Old Man" toboggans down the steps after him.

The "little doctor" is always up to something. She has all the cowboys her slaves, with Chip the worst of the lot. She gets a letter stating that Dr. Cecil Grantham, whose name Chip has heard her mention before and whom he looks upon as a formidable rival, is going to arrive on the next day's train, for a visit to the "little doctor." Chip feels very much disturbed in spirit. He imagines that Dr. Grantham is coming to claim his bride, and the "little doctor" mischievously leads him to think so. So Chip is chosen as the instrument to bring his rvial to the ranch, being ordered to accompany the "little doctor" in the buckboard, and greet the expected visitor. They pull another one on Chip, for the formidable Dr. Cecil Grantham is a sweet and saucy Miss, a classmate of the "little doctor." Chip is so happy over the outcome that he visibly shows it and the girls have a great deal of fun at his expense, in consequence.

The "Old Man" becomes infatuated with the new arrival. Dunk, who has fallen in love with the "little doctor," finds himself outclassed by Chip, and that he hasn't a chance. He shows his jealousy, whereupon he is given to understand in unmistakable terms, that he is not in it. Dunk "beats" it for the railroad station. Then follow gay days at the ranch. Chip saves the "little doctor's" life when she is pursued by a locoed stallion, and there is no more coquetry on her part. The "Old Man" wins the "little doctor's' chum, and when the announcement is made and each loving couple confesses to the others, the "Old Man" sends Patsy for a bottle of wine, so that they can all drink to each other's health. The path of love runs smooth for all—there is no serpent in their Garden of Eden.

"A good investment at double the price"

Elmwood, Ill.

"The Rectifier is in first class order and the result is a wonder to me. I have visited most of the picture shows in Peoria and I can't understand why some of them don't install your rectifier; it would be a good investment at double the price you ask.

"You are at liberty to refer any one asking for particulars to me; will be glad to say a good word for rectifiers any time."

C. A. HATCHER,
Photoplay Theatre, Elmwood, Ill.

Brighter, better, non-flickering pictures are the result of a G-E Rectifier. Bring business your way by having the reputation of "the best picture show in town."

And a G-E Rectifier will save you money on your current bills —It's "a good investment at double the price."

Send for booklet B3274; it gives some valuable comparisons on alternating and direct current. Write today.

"How clear the pictures are!"

You've often overheard that remark—and it's as strong a commendation, brings as much business as does a favorable comment on the picture story itself.

The "clearest pictures" are on Eastman film because the product is right, chemically and physically.

It is easily identifiable by the stencil "Eastman" in the margin.

The Light Which Does Not Interfere With Projection

The day of the dark theatre has passed. This is due primarily to the perfection of the EYE COMFORT LIGHTING System. This system is neither an imitation nor a substitute. It is based on fundamental principles discovered by us and proven by long practice to be absolutely correct. It is the original indirect lighting.

Indirect Light does not interfere with the clearness of the picture. It has no glare, does not distract attention or cause headaches.

It lights the house evenly. It relieves eyestrain.

The Eye Comfort Lighting System

is so good and so successful that it is imitated. But these imitations, which are offered you because they are "cheap," lack the powerful one-piece silvered mirror X-RAY EYE COMFORT reflectors which control and direct the light by their scientific design and evenly light the house. These are the most powerful reflectors made and require less current than any others.

Fill in the blank below and allow our engineers to lay out a plan for lighting your theatre. This won't cost you a cent and does not obligate you in any way. But it will tell you exactly how much EYE COMFORT LIGHTING for your theatre would cost.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

THE PHANTOSCOPE

¶ The word Phantoscope was used by our Mr. Jenkins in a patent which was issued to him more than nineteen years ago (March, 1895). That's a long time, as motion pictures go, but from that day to this the word has stood for successful motion picture machines. You will find it, with other machines by Mr. Jenkins, on exhibit in the United States National Museum.

¶ The modern Phantoscope is as distinctively meritorious as was the first Phantoscope, and for that reason was again medaled by the Franklin Institute. Let us suggest, then, that you investigate the profitableness of the Phantoscope for your own use. It is easily carried about (weighs 18 lbs.); you set it up quickly with no other tools but your two hands; and immediately the exhibition may begin. The Phantoscope costs but $100 complete. Catalogue for the asking.

Attention of Mr. W. W. Hodkinson

My dear Mr. Hodkinson:

Now that the Strand has contracted for the Paramount program I am looking forward with great [illegible]ions to the coming releases.

To say the least, I am delighted with what I have already seen that is ready to be released and it leads me to expect results hitherto undreamed of.

Of course, you know I am very well acquainted with what you have done on the coast and I know that you are absolutely sincere in working for the uplift of the Motion Pictures and mutual benefit of all concerned.

Your plan has been most successful on the coast and I see no reason why it should not be successful here I personally know of the splendid enthusiasm of all of the manufacturers in reference to the Paramount program and there is no question at all but what such effort must prove successful. You may rely upon my heartiest co-operation in every way. Any first class exhibitor should consider himself lucky indeed to have obtained the franchise for Paramount service.

Wishing you and yours every success in the new undertaking, believe me to be

Most sincerely yours,

Dear Sir:-

We are enclosing herewith check on account of contract executed this day for Paramount Pictures for the City of Philadelphia.

The area alloted to the different theatres under this contract leaves only 10% of the City of Philadelphia without a Paramount program.

We were very glad to be enabled to embrace the opportunity to secure these pictures, and certainly hope that we may secure a contract for the Paramount Program for this coming season.

Wishing you all kinds of good luck, I remain,

What the Pittsburgh Newspapers said about RAMO'S spectacular war feature--

"THE WAR OF WARS"

which played the Nixon Theatre in Pittsburgh the week of August 24th

PITTSBURGH LEADER.

War Depicted at Nixon.

War scenes between Germans and French were depicted with vivid realism last night at the Nixon in a motion picture drama which lasted three hours. It is a timely and thrilling film, showing a pretty romance in such a clever manner as to win the unqualified approval of a discriminating audience. Like all soldier romances, the drama is replete with military conspiracies, spying and good sentry work. Soldiers in action are shown, too.

An exciting feature of the picture is the chase of a spy suspect, who is shot from his horse at the end of a long pursuit. The picture drama was well played for the screen reproduction. The pictures will be shown each afternoon and evening this week.

THE PITTSBURGH DISPATCH.

Nixon—Photo-Play.

With much interest a Pittsburg audience of considerable size last night for the first time witnessed a photo-play of the "War of Wars," now being enacted in Europe. The representation is, of course, by means of pictures taken when the German invaders first began to attempt the capture of the Belgian citadels by determined battles. The pictures will be at the Nixon all this week. Pane M. Potter is credited with the foundation of the timely affair. Close to 400 scenes are produced. Plans of German and French soldiers to act as spies and obtain information of the enemy's movements are frequently shown by means of simple disguises; and work with guns, pistols, cannons and bombs is a continual feature.

THE PITTSBURGH PRESS.

Nixon.

Battles rage with incredible fierceness and men perform gallant deeds of bravery and self-sacrifice this week at the Nixon Theatre, where the massive photo-play, the "War of Wars," thrilled a large audience last night. The chief interest of the production naturally centers around the stupendous scenes of carnage, and the demonstration of the modern machines of destructiveness of the modern machines of war, but there is an interesting story running through the play, and the events are cleverly associated into the formation of a strong plot of love and political intrigue. Close to 400 scenes are presented during the evening, including gatherings of soldiery, councils of war, desperate charges over fields of carnage, bombardment of towns, and the working of the far-famed Belgian fortresses.

THE PITTSBURGH POST.

War Scenes at Nixon Are Vividly Enacted.

Thousands of homes were wrecked and orphans and widows made by the score last night at the Nixon Theatre in the war pictures shown there, depicting the struggle between the French and German troops.

The pictures are clear. They bring out every face in the many groups and carry just enough story to vary the succession of battles and mobilization of armies. The principals are capable and make the pictures seem like play. Battles are particularly well handled. The men are finely trained. Horsemanship is at its height in the ranks of the French and German cavalry, and in instances where horsemen are shot while their steeds are going at full speed the men make startling falls from their mounts.

PITTSBURGH CHRONICLE TELEGRAPH.

Nixon—"War of Wars."

The military drama, "War of Wars," based on the present conflict between the German and French armies, made its first appearance on the screen at the Nixon Theatre yesterday afternoon and last night. There are six full films of pictures, which it takes three hours to show. These pictures were taken in Europe, and give a good illustration of what is taking place there now. The costume equipment of the soldiers are copied after the regulation uniforms of the French and German militia. Elaborate interiors of mansions and typical street scenes in the peasant section of a French town feature. A number of skirmishes and military manoeuvers are shown. The scouting and sentry work is good. The play is complete and nothing is introduced that is not in some way connected with the story. The pictures are new and the full six films were shown at both of yesterday's shows without any delays. They will be shown each afternoon and night throughout the week.

PITTSBURGH SUN.

The Nixon.

Nothing could be more timely than the war pictures at the Nixon this week showing the struggle of the French and German troops. The film is good, the faces clear and the story-action sufficiently interesting to hold attention during the moments when carnage and battle are not in progress. The realism of the pictures in depicting warfare is at times appalling. The destruction of homes, lives and country is made terribly clear. No one can see the pictures without a more vivid impression of what the daily news means. In this manner the pictures are valuable, as they make the telegraph dispatches more comprehensible. But in other ways the pictures are exciting and interesting, and for whatever reason one goes to see them he is amply repaid.

Spartacus!

OR THE REVOLT OF THE GLADIATORS

(Arranged in 8 parts—total footage 6000 feet.)

One of the really great Kleine Attractions with its unique record of many successful runs in America's Most Representative Playhouses —The Minneapolis Auditorium, Majestic Theatre, Buffalo, and the Auditorium Theatre, Chicago, where its presentation with the Chicago Grand Opera Co.'s orchestra of fifty pieces was hailed by local dramatic critics as photodrama's crowning triumph !

Spartacus is a story of ancient Rome—of the bloody Circus Maximus—of the history-famed slave uprising led by Spartacus—of the hand-to-hand conflict of two great armies on the lava-strewn sides of Vesuvius ! Spartacus is rich in story and magnificent in spectacle—A worthy member of that splendid family headed by "QUO VADIS."

Read What the Critics Say :

"Quite the most elaborate and wonderfully presented photodrama Chicago ever saw."—Daily News.

"Spartacus takes its place as one of the truly great pictures. It is awe-inspiring, almost beyond description."—Record-Herald.

"Spartacus is a master production, conceived in a masterly way. Its presentation delighted Chicago picture fans."—Chicago Journal.

You can book Spartacus through any of the following George Kleine offices. They will provide you with unusually beautiful heralds, photographs of all sizes, framed and unframed, press matter, 1, 3, 6 and 8 sheets in two styles, 24 sheets and block letter stands. Also a variety of attractive window cards.

Vendetta!

Five Parts (5071 Feet)

FROM MARIE CORELLI'S FAMOUS NOVEL

In the preface to "Vendetta," Marie Corelli says: "Its chief incidents are founded on an actual occurrence in Naples during the year 1848!"

Buried as Dead in His Own Family Tomb, returning to life to find his wife and dearest friend unfaithful; discovering vast riches in that self-same tomb left by a pirate generations dead; using this mighty wealth to satisfy a horrible revenge—these, in brief, are the central thoughts of a story that shames mere fiction in its terrific reality!

> Says James S. McQuade in the "World" for August 29: "The gloom and horror of the family vault are vividly recreated . . . the effect of the earthquake shock in the Romani ballroom and in the grewsome vault where the avenging husband metes out the full measure of his own sufferings to a false and heartless wife, are terrifying in their reality—positively terrific in their visualization."

Strong praise from a conservative critic—yet the mere echo of all who have seen it.

> "Vendetta" takes its place as one of the natural masterpieces—it possesses all the essential qualities of the extraordinary in picture-making.

You can book "Vendetta" now through the Special Feature Department of the General Film Co. The publicity campaign is complete to the last detail.

Facts and Comments

"COMEDY is hard to get." While this cry of distress is by no means new it is today louder and keener than it ever was before. It fell to the writer's lot the other day to accompany several distinguished exhibitors on their laborious quest for good comedy. So much is recklessly labeled comedy that the task of the "viewer" is a particularly hard one. We went from place to place and were told by eager exchange men that they had "plenty of comedy." Alas for the undying optimism of the men who produce or distribute what are called comic films. In most instances the corps of managers cried "Hold, enough," after they had seen a little more than a couple of hundred feet or so. When the writer left them the exhibitors were still searching for the precious comic vein, but they had little hope.

Now, in all these comic films the photography was excellent, the settings were good and there was much tumbling about by artists, men, women and children, but there was nothing to laugh at. While some of the actors seemed overcome by the fun of the situations, probably reflecting the ideas of the directors, who ordered them around, the audience was indifferent and at times positively sad. The production of good and truly laughable comedies is the most difficult of all the problems of kinematography. There has never been a surplus of them and there is not likely to be. At times the dearth of them becomes a serious problem to the conscientious and progressive exhibitor. It would be idle to offer advice, but one thing seems to be reasonably certain. There has been altogether too much of what is known as "rough-house" and "slap-stick" comedy. The patrons are surfeited with it and the exhibitors have had more than a genteel sufficiency. It would be well to try for a finer and somewhat cleaner vein. We are glad to observe a tendency to follow this new direction. A creation of comic types from life and the making of situations which rouse laughter without the fatal banana peel and the seltzer bottle mark the coming of new kinds of comic film.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has always advised its readers that Sunday exhibitions of motion pictures were not inherently wrong or unlawful, but were permitted at common law. This opinion we hold as regards every state in the Union. Recently an attempt had been made to open the motion pictures on Sundays in Albany, but a court of inferior jurisdiction interfered on behalf of the Sabbatarians and then the Board of Aldermen "followed up the advantage" by passing an ordinance forbidding the opening of the theaters on Sunday in distinct terms. Notwithstanding this fact we maintained that the law properly interpreted and fairly applied gave no warrant to stop Sunday exhibitions in the State of New York. Our opinion has been vindicated once more by the decision handed down in the Supreme Court in the Binghamton district. Justice George McCann had been appealed to by the exhibitors of Binghamton to restrain the Mayor and the city officials from interfering with Sunday exhibitions. The justice held that, according to the well-settled law in this state, the applicants were entitled to the injunction against the Mayor and the police and thereupon granted the injunctive relief prayed for. The city authorities had bitterly contested the arguments of the exhibitors and had fought very hard against the injunction, but the judge felt bound to decide against them.

The corporation counsel of Binghamton sought to stop the Sunday exhibitions under the general prohibition which forbids "public sports, exercises and shows on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday." Justice McCann declares the courts have held that motion pictures are not embraced within the definition of "sports, exercises and shows." In the order entered upon the decision of the judge the Mayor and police are restrained from interfering with the Sunday exhibition of motion pictures, "unless the exhibitions are conducted in a disorderly or noisy manner or pictures are shown which are improper for public exhibition." Great credit is due to the organized exhibitors in Binghamton who have had the courage of their convictions and have fearlessly asserted what they believed and what the court has now declared to be their legal rights. They have set a fine example to exhibitors everywhere and especially to the exhibitors in this state. The law as laid down by the late learned jurist William J. Gaynor and now re-affirmed by this decision of Supreme Court Justice McCann applies to the entire state.

The Dreary Commonplace

By W. Stephen Bush

WHILE the exhibitors are not the only living force in the motion picture art, sharing this glory with the playwrights and the producers, they are and always have been the men on the firing line. Hence the ardent devotion of The Moving Picture World to the interests of the exhibitors. Nothing pleases us better and nothing furnishes us with more inspiration than the responses we get "from the front." We want to be in intimate contact with our great constituency at all times, believing that this condition insures the greatest degree of usefulness to our readers.

Using the term exhibitors in connection with this subject, we want to make it all-embracing, for there is a delightful variety of exhibitors ranging from the priest and minister who has entered the field to the great experts who have excelled in exhibition and who have done so much to vindicate the motion picture and assure its present enviable place in public esteem. They all write to The Moving Picture World recording their experiences and assuring us in terms of evident sincerity of their friendship and their esteem. Needless to say we treasure and appreciate these words of commendation and sometimes we are glad to make them the text of an editorial homily.

Never have we had a finer text than one which a clergyman in a Western State has sent us with a renewal of his subscription. Our friend predicts that "before very long a motion picture equipment will be as much a necessity in every up-to-date church as a good organ is now," and after assuring us that this paper "has been invaluable to him in picking subjects and in keeping in touch with this rapidly fluctuating industry," he goes on to say:

"I want to compliment you upon the high standard of service you are giving and upon your effort to raise the standards of the film not only by weeding out the immoral and degrading, but by your insistence upon high artistic merit. To browse upon the inane and dreary commonplace is almost worse than to serve the witch's broth of vice and crime. The latter may stink, but at least it is not stupid."

We think this is a conclusive summing up of the whole duty of the representative journal of the motion picture art. We are glad of the emphatic way in which our friend points out that we have a double duty to perform —not only to weed out the immoral and degrading film, but to insist upon high artistic merit. About the first part of this two-fold duty there has never been any doubt. Our readers will bear us witness that we have fought the immoral and degrading film with every weapon at our command. We should, however, have failed in an equally essential duty if we had been remiss in protesting constantly and vigorously against the "inane and the dreary commonplace." Supremely confident of commercial strength, or rather of the power and the advantages which a strong commercial organization confers, there have been groups of producers who have fallen into a deplorable rut of the "inane and the dreary commonplace." This fact, as we have been at pains to point out, has constituted a great element of weakness in all those regular programs, which depended chiefly on a proper supply of single reels. The origin of the feature itself, dating back to 1911, was due to a continued predominance of the "inane and the dreary commonplace" of the single reel.

The success of the motion picture as a means of popular amusement depends ultimately upon artistic merit. It is easy enough after all to drive out what is morally objectionable. Public sentiment as a rule will attend to such weeding out. It is impossible to corrupt the whole American public. The sound portion of our public is always in an overwhelming majority. The "white-slave" films had their brief day of infamy and no doubt did great harm, but we have outlived them. Other bad crazes will come and go. The prediction is safe that we will be able to fight and destroy the immoral and degrading film in the future as we have in the past.

The harm done by the "inane and the dreary commonplace" is far more insidious and therefore much harder to prevent. Let us remember that the progress of the motion picture from a "fad" to the foremost place in human amusements has been achieved purely through a progress of quality. If we had never risen above the level of 1907 the motion picture would have died long ago with few mourners.

The ambitious desire to make better films infused new and stronger life into the art. It has grown in popular esteem and in prestige and in prosperity in converse ratio with the improvement of its quality. The splendid theaters now in existence and now building all through the country have been made possible by hard striving after quality and an arduous avoidance of the "inane and the dreary commonplace." The higher the effort the richer has been the reward. It is within the writer's own personal knowledge that many a theatre within the last six months has closed its doors not because of small seating capacity or poor location, but merely by accepting too many films that came within the damning definition of being "inane and dreary commonplace."

The motion picture cannot stand still—that is true both literally and figuratively. The demand for quality grows every day. We can scarcely endure what two years ago may have seemed quite passable. The "inane and dreary commonplace" is therefore doomed." Nothing can make it last in the "long run." Adverse criticism may hasten its end, but it is only question when it will die of inanition, leaving a number of unprogressive and fossilized managers behind.

We think we are doing a service to exhibitors everywhere by asking them to make a stand against the "inane and the dreary commonplace" which circumstances often force them to accept. It is today in their power to make a protest that will be felt. Some years ago such protests were frequent enough, but they died away like echoes of unprofitable wailings. Today the exhibitor has more opportunity of selection and more opportunity of rejection.

There is no superabundance of quality on hand. We know of a dozen managers, some of whom change their program once a week, while none of them has a daily change, who are at their wits' ends to know where their next good feature is going to come from. We have not reached the top anywhere. The future of this art and industry lies in the pursuit of quality. "The inane and the dreary commonplace" are like the fruit of the upas tree.

Thought Transference

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

WE must understand one another in order to avoid such a disgraceful spectacle as that now setting civilization in Europe back to barbarism. It would seem as though, in order to attain a sane and sound condition of society, a language is needed to enable one nation to understand the point of view of another, and moving pictures may yet furnish the needed medium. Our incomplete and often confused ideas of one another are distinctly anti-social—to what else can we ascribe the chaotic conditions now existing among the most enlightened peoples in the world—though I do not mean that society finds the clash of views unprofitable. The drama usually means a struggle between two forces. These may well be religious or philosophical quite as well as physical, one constant struggle being towards superior comprehension of the world and ourselves.

Religion may distrust science; science may point the finger of scorn at religion; theory and experience may enter contention—yet out of it all may rise higher spirituality and wider knowledge of the truth. Science searches for the truth, but scientists are human. Some of them announce theory as proven fact. The interesting theory of thought transference from one individual to another without use of the senses has been proclaimed as proven by scientific tests and called telepathy. The story of some wonderful performances by a little girl in Rhode Island breathes sincerity—sworn affidavits attest her miraculous powers—but there are possibilities of fraud where the girl's relatives have to intervene before she can name the object or word in mind, and telepathy would have to be a common attribute to convince most of us of its value, even of its existence.

Mind reading in a general way is skillfully done by fortune tellers and not always so skillfully by poker players. It is really a common habit. We do not ordinarily care what another thinks, leaving it to each individual to lie or tell the truth as he or she sees fit, but the moment we are deeply concerned, we study, both consciously and unconsciously, a thousand little mental revelations, just as a judge or a juryman does a witness on the stand. We use all our senses to get at the thought behind the statement, knowing well that mature minds, and even immature ones, hold much in reserve. We are most deeply interested where we are most deeply concerned, as a matter of course, but there is also a certain charm in getting at the thought behind the action, and it is right here that most producers of moving pictures fall down.

The motive for a deed is often easy to understand, in fact, it is all too obvious in most cases, but to care anything about what is done we must, in the first place, be placed into sympathetic recognition of what manner of person is in action. In rather poor illustration, we meet some one whose face is not familiar, who introduces himself as having formerly had the pleasure of our acquaintance. We respond coldly. Then we are told of the particular circumstances under which the meeting took place; mutual friends and acquaintances are mentioned; we gradually warm; the strange face melts away, and it is replaced with that of an acquaintance. When a leading character is shown in a screen portrayal, the mind of the spectator tingles with curiosity, a genuine anxiety to become better acquainted. How seldom is this desire gratified! How little we care for the play when we do not know the people!

Familiarity implies a former perception. Gradually, from lack of acquaintance, and consequent lack of interest, the audience may be brought into a cordial, or even a sympathetic relation with important characters of a play, so that their conduct takes on a greater significance. Spectators in front, instead of being dubious or cold, reach an at-homeness of agreeable acquaintance that puts them into friendly mood. The play now moves on as a human experience in which all may feel an interest, where all are held in suspense as to the outcome of what is going on. The whole audience emerges from critical indifference into a state of apprehension or of expectation to be relieved or gratified as the case may be. This is brought about through skill of author, director and interpreters working in harmony of purpose, that of transferring the whole thought involved as well as the passing mental phases of the performers.

The actor must have personality, must feel in order to convey, especially when there is an alternation of character from good to bad and back again. There must be consciousness of what is transpiring within if there is to be any conscious recognition of that thought, feeling or emotion on the part of those in front. The thought must precede its transference. The actor, appearing and disappearing from the scene of action, must be alive to the inspiration of the moment, in order to excite the imagination of those watching the performance. Plot, punch and all that goes to the sum of a play's holding power are the result of thought transference from author through director and interpreter to the audience, each impersonation carrying its own continuity except in cases of sudden conversion. So far, even in pretentious photodramas, insight into the personality of characters has been curiously neglected.

It is hardly surprising under the circumstances for reviewers to constantly speak of "treatment," even of "photography." The absence of a meaning, or of ability to translate that meaning, has given a false impression of moving pictures. A brilliant writer recently denounced them all in my presence as utter rot. I asked him if he was accustomed to judge any art by its imperfect examples, adding that this art was only in its swaddling clothes. I afterwards thought, being slow of speech, that, if he had anything particularly worth while to say, he might reach a much larger audience, in a more effective manner, than through the medium of printed language. Then it is a pity for any capable author to entertain such views. The art needs thinkers if it is to transfer thought.

See how easy it is to upset our boasted social fabric with war! Modern society rests to so great an extent upon wide spread good understanding, upon ideal conceptions of justice and fair dealing, that general intelligence must be kept up to the highest point to prevent world disaster. Our children know nothing of the social structure that enables us to live as we do and inspire to better things. Each little boy and girl has an enormous amount to learn before reaching comprehension of interdependence. There are even grown boys and girls who need information on the subject. Each stupid blunder in the visualization of plays set before millions has a deterrent effect on the growth of this and of the coming generation, so important has the new art grown. Hence it is up to all of us interested, authors, critics, producers and exhibitors, to maintain a standard of pictorial interpretation corresponding to our best ideals and to the growing intelligence of those who give us such generous support.

"The Fifth Man."

James Oliver Curwood's Thrilling Tale of Jungle Life in Central America Filmed in Three Reels by Selig Will Be Released as a Special Feature by General Film Company.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

AFTER viewing "The Fifth Man" on the screen, the chief impression left on my mind was the powerful fictional interest of the story. The pictures were followed so eagerly that the fifteen minutes consumed by each of the three reels had passed without any sensible measurement—indeed, for that matter, had been swallowed up without any mental note on my part.

Scene from "The Fifth Man" (Selig).

In photoplays of the "Jungle" type, fictional interest usually subordinates the dramatic, for the reason that thrill and adventure, with wild animals as participants, are the keynotes; but it must not be supposed that in this case wild animals furnish the thrills. They do not. There is only one instance where a combat between a man and a wild animal occurs, and only a glimpse of that is caught by the spectator.

Scene from "The Fifth Man" (Selig).

The author of the scenario of "The Fifth Man," James Oliver Curwood, has provided us with a new type of "wild animal" for these pictures. They are two demented men—one of them a mad scientist, who lives in the wilds of Central America; the other a black man, his slave. Around these two wild creatures he weaves the web of an amazing story, and in the telling of it he treats us to several strong dramatic situations.

Thomas Wynn gives a dinner at his home in New York to four of his classmates at college, from which he and they had just graduated. The dinner is in honor of three of their number, about to leave for foreign countries to seek their fortunes. At the close of the dinner every man solemnly agrees to meet at the same place, if alive, five years hence, on the same day of the week, at the same hour.

The appointed evening arrives, and Thomas Wynn awaits his guests. Only three of the five meet on time. Shortly afterwards a letter is brought in from the fourth, who is sick in a hospital in Bombay, and after waiting some time for the fifth man, John Gaunt, they are about to drink to his memory when he staggers into the room wild-eyed, gaunt and poorly clad. Then he tells his story.

John Gaunt, prospecting for gold in Central America, got lost in the wilds one day. When about to perish, he is discovered by a mad scientist and his slave, who conduct him to their abode. There he is held prisoner, as a specimen for the animal collection of the scientist. He eludes his captors and finds imprisoned in a cage nearby a beautiful girl, Joan Darey, who has been a captive in the hands of the mad men for two years. He releases her and they attempt to flee, but are caught by the scientist and the slave. As punishment for his attempt to escape, Gaunt is placed in a cage with a puma, and a fight to the death takes place, with the man a victor. Gaunt again escapes and makes his way to the coast, where he gets work on a vessel bound for New York.

Hearing his story, Wynn and his brother classmates accompany Gaunt to Central America, where they find the mad scientist and his slave dead and Joan well nigh exhausted from hunger. Gaunt conducts the party to the hiding place of the mad scientist's treasure, which is given to Joan as dowry on her marriage to John Gaunt.

Miss Bessie Eyton appears as Joan Darey and impersonates that trying part creditably. It is pretty hard to be seen behind the bars of a cage all through the action of the photoplay, so far as her role is concerned. Charles Clary has a strong part as John Gaunt and sustains it admirably. Lafayette McKee gives a striking impersonation of the mad scientist, and the part of the slave is well taken by Roy Watson.

F. J. Grandon directed the production. His splendid work in the Kathlyn series need only be referred to in order to guarantee capable work in this instance.

The release date is Sept. 14.

"Protea II."

Five-Reel World Film Offering Gives New Adventures of the Unique Woman Detective—It Holds Well.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE spectator will find a good plot foundation in this picture, and its story will hold his interest from the time when the situation is stated in the opening of the first reel till the close of the fifth part in which the climax comes. It deals with the sensational exploits of Protea, a woman detective, who helps a pretty heiress friend of hers in an encounter with a villain, and it is a good example of a picture in which the interest accumulates slowly but steadily. There are no twists or back jumps in the narrative such as are often encountered in more complicated stories. Through it all only one question rises in the mind of the spectator, and that is: "Will Protea be able to keep the villain from overreaching the heroine?" But the gradual answer to this suspense is not the sole entertaining factor. It is filled with what may be termed incidental sensations. Most of these have dramatic value as integral parts of the plot, though some, like a graceful, bare-legged dance, are closely woven into the story yet have an interest that would stand alone. Also, Protea has a humorous clownish assistant who at times introduces pranks, acceptable enough, but with little or no vital connection with the action.

The story's sensational incidents contain the new interest of the offering; for the plot, well written as it is, is not new or plausible except as setting forth these things. They are often fantastic and astonishing to a degree. As in the best and more recent of pictures that more or less resemble this one, they are exaggerated at times to the point of humor so that the whole has a taste quite different from the melodrama of yesterday. It isn't burlesque, but is light and airy while at the same time it is exciting. Pleasantly acted, competently staged and fairly photographed as it is, we count it a good, amusing offering for the average photoplay house audience. It is not quite the picture we should choose for a children's program. There is nothing at all in the story that is not perfectly clean and acceptable. The dance, considering it separately, will appeal strongly in many places, not in all, though there is nothing outrageous at all about it.

As the story opens we find Lady Mabel (Madeleine Parisel), an heiress, courted by Count Skittisch (M. Mancini), a villain with a gang of thugs at his back. Becoming suspicious, Mabel calls her friend Protea (Josette Andrio) to help her. Mabel has been left a gold mine by her uncle. The directions for finding this are in a safe. Before the villain can blow the safe open to get them, Protea, trying to save them from him, looks through the iron door and reads the directions by the aid of violet rays and finds that there is only half of them there. The rest are to be found tatooed on the shoulder of the uncle's valet. This valet has in the meantime fallen in love and has had them removed. The detective, however, gets an old photograph of the man and from it gets the full directions to the mine. Yet the villain is still on the job and manages by abducting the girl to get the detective also in his clutches and from her gets the paper and later the mine. He thinks that he has killed the detective; but is mistaken. He becomes prosperous and has the poor heroine locked up in his house. Her rescue by Protea with the help of the comical assistant is tinctured with the same exaggerated humorous fancy that gives life to the whole and is quite new and unexpected. It is a very light offering; but is freshly fanciful and should, we think, go fairly well. There is little or no dry padding in it.

No Cameras Going to the Front.

Charles G. Rosher, Who Was With Villa, Unable to Get from London to Continent.

IT is impossible to get from England to the Continent with a motion picture camera, says Charles G. Rosher, who has just returned from London. Mr. Rosher is a British subject, has wide connections in England, and also had letters of introduction to people of influence. So, too, is he a cameraman of experience, as may be seen when it is stated that he was with Villa in Mexico for the Mutual Film Corporation. If a man of this experience and advantages is unable to get near the firing line it is unlikely that we shall have genuine pictures of battles. Mr. Rosher left New York on July 21, with business engagements requiring his presence in London and later in Italy. The outbreak of the war was responsible for the cancelation of these, and it was then that he tried to get to the front. In spite of his strong "pull" he found it a physical impossibility. He learned that not only is it out of the question to get a motion picture camera out of England in the direction of any of the belligerent countries, but likewise it is not possible to get a motion picture camera into England and retain possession of it.

Mr. Rosher says that English exhibitors are boosting with all their might the films manufactured in Great Britain, taking advantage of the closing of the Continental studios. There is a big demand from the public for topical films, and for anything in the nature of war stories. Mr. Rosher says that he gathered from interviews with prominent film men that the legitimate stage probably will suffer during the war. The picture theaters at present are doing a rushing business, owing partly perhaps to the fact that everybody is in the street these days. It was his impression that there would be no material diminution in the volume of business done by the exhibitors in Great Britain, as picture-goers and others naturally would seek some form of diversion, and the picture theaters, with their low prices of admission, would be the places to which they naturally would turn.

"It may be of interest," said Mr. Rosher, "to know that I brought back with me several hundred feet of film that could not be shown in England. I had to use finesse in getting it out of the country. The pictures bear on mobilization. They have been taken by one of the weeklies."

"The Mystery of the Sleeping Death."

New to the Point of Astonishment, the Situation in This Two-Reel Kalem Picture Will Surely Interest.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

EVERY good picture has something new in it; but there never was a motion picture that was a good offering and that hadn't more in it of the old than of the new. Perhaps our greatest pleasure in any story comes from the mind's adventure in the places that it creates. The average mind soon gets tired of walking for pleasure down through the same old weadows and lanes and, to such, a brand new path leading out unexpectedly to places that have never been seen before is delightful. The spectator's experience watching this new Kalem offering, "The Mystery of the Sleeping Death," will be very much like that of one taking a new walk. When he gets well into it he will find that everything around him is fresh and new and is stirring him to the lively attention of a new adventure. There is a profound reason for our need of and joy in adventures. Like Tennyson's "Ulysses," our adventures become a part of us. It is the only way we can grow. Food may make us fat, but adventures, all kinds of them, make us big. That is why the mind as it grows discriminating demands that all art that pretends to offer an adventure to us give us real bread and not merely a loaf-shaped stone. This picture at first is so new that it seems not plausible—perhaps the handling of the action is at fault now and then—but we soon find that it is eatable and gives a good meal. The ingredients are novelty of interest, suspense in its action, and sets that are all one could desire both as to photography and to the set itself. It tells a yarn of mystery; is not substantial, not bread but cake. The people will count it good entertainment.

At the first snap of its opening one feels distinct pleasure in the good quality of its photography. The first few scenes travel a well worn path. We are introduced to a rich man (Tom Moore) who is spied upon by a crook looking through a window, putting money away in his safe. This crook goes after a pal of his and together they get the "best little safe breaker in town" (Alice Joyce). Then the three attempt to get the money. The girl is doing the job alone and is caught by the man. He is the "first man who ever spoke kindly to her" and we have a not new situation. But from this point the development is startlingly new. Before a half hour has passed the man has fallen unconscious in one place and the girl is affected in another place in the same way. Both, it happens, are taken to the same hospital where the peculiarities of both cases leave the doctors at a loss. That they call in a mystic from the East to help them solve the difficulty is the least convincing thing in the picture. One is astonished to find the patients talking in their sleep and in a strange tongue that the mystic says is his language. To explain to the doctors how this comes about the mystic tells an old Oriental legend of two lovers, one a white slave and the other an Indian princess. The story is unrolled before us and with skill so that it passes naturally and has a good measure of suspense. These lovers are not happy; for fate thwarts them at every turn until at the end, while trying to escape, they are captured and brought back. In the temple of the elephant god the priest curses them both and they fall lifeless upon two slabs of stone lying ready for them. Their doom is to lie thus as dead, but living for ever and ever. Every century they leave their bodies and are reincarnated to play their love story over again. In this instance it turns out happily.

The scenario is by Doty C. Hobart. It was put on by Keanan Buel and features Alice Joyce. The acting shows intelligence and carries the story clearly on its way.

Manufacturers Organize.

Form Motion Picture Trades Association and Plan to Hold a Trade Show in 1915—Officers Elected.

FOLLOWING the agitation of the question of holding future motion picture expositions under the auspices of the manufacturers themselves which was started at Dayton, Ohio, during the Exhibitors' Convention in that city last July, articles of incorporation of the Motion Picture Trades Association have been filed by Job E. Hedges of New York as attorney for the manufacturers who acted under his advice in framing the new organization. The charter was issued to the following persons as directors: F. J. Kembusch, Joseph Brandt, H. B. Coles, Robert Kane, W. J. Maxey, W. A. Johnson, Ernst Glantzberg, E. E. Fulton, A. H. Byrd, Carl Anderson and Joseph W. Farnham.

The charter is issued under the Board of Trade act pursuant to the laws of 1912 of New York State. A. H. Byrd, secretary of the organization, explains that it is formed to foster the interests of the manufacturers, exhibitors, exchanges, dealers, and all others engaged in the motion picture industry, to diffuse accurate and reliable information to those of our members and without financial profit.

Regarding the holding of a trade show, Secretary Byrd said that the time and place had not been fixed as the committee on that important matter had not yet been appointed by the president, but that both New York and Chicago were being considered with a possibility of holding a show in each place during the coming year.

At a recent meeting of the board of directors the following officers were elected to continue until the first annual meeting which will be held on the third Tuesday in October, 1914: F. J. Rembusch, president; C. Anderson, vice-president; W. A. Johnson, treasurer; A. H. Byrd, secretary.

NEUTRALITY REQUESTED IN PICTURES.

The preservation of a spirit of absolute neutrality on the part of the American people, as suggested by President Wilson in his recent proclamation, is a matter so vitally important that the National Board of Censorship makes the following suggestion:

When you are producing pictures containing war scenes, please precede the actual pictures with about five feet of caption asking the audience kindly to refrain from any expressions of partisanship as the pictures are shown. You will strengthen such an announcement very materially by adding that this request is directly in line with the policy of President Wilson.

We further suggest that scenes which tend to arouse race hatred because of their realism and horrible detail be treated in a restrained manner.

STERN SUPERVISING VICTOR WORK.

Julius Stern, formerly manager of the Imp Studio, has now increased his scope of operations, as he has recently been appointed supervisor of the production of the Victor staff as well. At present the following directors are under Mr. Stern's supervision: Herbert Brenon, Frank Crane, George Lessey, George Roubert, Walter Edwin, Ben Wilson and Harry Meyers.

The combination of the Imp and Victor forces will undoubtedly prove beneficial to exhibitors as it will enable the Universal to give a wider variety in the photoplays produced in the eastern studios.

AN INGENIOUS SOLUTION.

A novel situation is at present being developed in conjunction with the new piece in which King Baggot is acting, entitled "The Treasure Train," which deals with a hold-up of a train-load of children.

George Lessey, the director for King Baggot, was taxed to the utmost in order to secure a complete train including baggage and passenger coaches. After this had been done, however, the hardest task presented itself, namely, that of securing sufficient children to act in this release. Arrangements were made with various orphan asylums to give the kiddies a day in the country and at least 250 children will be the guests of the Universal on an outing. The only work that the children will have to do will be to be aboard the train when the hold-up takes place, and after that they can enjoy the beauties of nature surrounding them.

Film Pioneer Joins Horsley.

W. G. Gilmore, Builder of First Universal City, Takes Charge of Centaur Plant.

AS the result of negotiations which have been carried on for several weeks between David Horsley and W. G. Gilmore, the last-named gentleman left California and arrived in Bayonne, New Jersey, last week to become manager of the factory and plant of the Centaur Film Company. Mr. Gilmore is one of the best known film men in the game, and his return to the East revives old memories of the sales company on 14th street and the days when the "Independents" had to think fast and fight hard.

Mr. Gilmore got his start in the motion picture business under David Horsley, when the latter was releasing the Nestor brand once every week when nothing happened to prevent sales, which at best were not large as compared with present-day outputs, depending upon the skill and activity of the men in the business office. He soon became business manager, and under his care releases increased to three a week and sales jumped forward with leaps and bounds. A larger factory soon became necessary; a new one was built in Bayonne under Mr. Gilmore's supervision. When the Universal Film Manufacturing Company was formed, the Nestor brand and property was merged; the factory was turned over to the Universal and remains to this day its largest and best plant.

Early in 1912, when Mr. Gilmore had all arrangements made to go to Europe to establish agencies for the Nestor, he received a telegram from David Horsley, who was then at Hollywood, California, requesting him to come to the west coast to systematize matters there before going abroad.

Thirty days after Mr. Gilmore's arrival in Los Angeles the Universal was formed and took over the Nestor studios. But things immediately began to develop, and Mr. Gilmore was the first Universal manager and, in conjunction with W. H. Swanson, built the first Universal City.

Within a few weeks fourteen large companies were operated there with facilities which are said to have been second to none in the world.

John Ince, Grafter

THE Philadelphia Horticultural Society, at its Fall exhibition, will display a plant which will undoubtedly attract much attention. Seen in the grower's greenhouse the other day, it appeared to be a curious specie of cactus on which have been grafted several fruits, the result being a small, yellow edible, about the size of a walnut, resembling a pear with a peculiar, aromatic peach-like flavor. This rarity has been produced after near four years' experimentation, the grower having brought the plant from Arizona and at odd moments, in a small greenhouse in his backyard, has been patiently carrying on his work, more than fifty graftings being made before the result warranted public mention. On the errant's card will appear the name of John Ince, familiar in the picture world, whose interest in matters horticultural might be surprising if his reticence did not in a measure prepare his friends for the unexpected.

John Ince.

Can you beat it? Burbank, wizard of all grafters, will have to look carefully to his laurels. If Ince ever starts on this grafting business in earnest there is no telling where he will finish. Since this yarn was written, it is reported that Mr. Lubin, for whom Mr. Ince makes pictures sometimes, has set aside a large plot on the Betzwood farm for the grafting experiments of Mr. Ince or any other player or director who may have a bent in that direction. It is believed that the farm is specially adapted for experiments in that particular line of horticulture.

Katharine Bement Davis.

New York City's Commissioner of Correction Deeply Interested in Motion Pictures.

By Florence Margolies.

ON the twenty-fourth floor of that imposing structure, the Municipal Building, after many gyrations in the labyrinthian corridors, one comes upon doors and more doors inscribed with big, bold letters the unmistakable Commissioner of Correction. Those doors are all inviting enough, for a mere turn of a knob presumably, will usher you right into the august presence of her Commissionership, but you instinctively pause, lest you come in for a bit of correction. Turning to the left, however, is still another door, holding out the announcement that within its enclosure presides the Secretary to Commissioner of Correction, Miss Finn. Something in that monosyllabic name inspires confidence, and I entered.

Emma Finn just barely looked up from the machine upon which her nimble fingers ran with lightning speed, apparently quite accustomed to such intrusions.

"I hardly believe," said Miss Finn, after I had explained my mission, "that Commissioner Davis will see you today, as she is at present in consultation with her Deputy Commissioner Lewis, and after that she will talk to that crowd of reporters, who have been waiting ever so long. But you may wait here, and I shall try to announce you, if only possible." The conviction grew on me that it was the luring power of the "movies" which I mentioned, that moved Miss Finn to this extraordinary kindness, but inwardly I vowed eternal faith in people whose names had but one syllable.

Dr. Davis was laboring under an unusual pressure of work and considerable perplexity engendered by the peculiar case of Becky Edelson, the fair hunger striker on Blackwells Island. Telephones could be heard from all sides, ringing the important question of the hour, "Has Becky taken food yet, and if not, are you going to have her fed forcibly, Commissioner?" And the lingering reporters were living question marks of like import.

This ado about that misled, hysterical girl is, of course, due chiefly to the novelty of it all; a hunger striker in America, and obviously, variety does lend some color to life, so here you are. If, though, the combined fates of suffrage, and free speech, and befuddled anarchism and meaningless feminism, with all the other brands of "isms" and "ettes" will eventually have produced as luxurious a crop of starvers or, as they are more euphoniously called, hunger strikers, as strange and historic England boasts of, it will be comparatively easy for the Commissioner of Correction as there will then have been a very definite and uncompromising method of procedure evolved for the proper handling of such cases as "Becky."

At length, through the graceful maneuvers of Miss Finn, I was introduced to Dr. Katharine Bement Davis, recently appointed by Mayor Mitchel, Commissioner of Correction of Greater New York.

Not one instrument of torture could I see anywhere; not the least trace of "corrective implement for delinquents" meets the eye, and absolutely no vestige of those inquisitorial terrors hover about the head of that powerful institution. Miss Davis is a genial, extraordinarily human looking woman of about middle age, with a decided twinkle of humor in her eyes of the bluest blue, and vibrant with potential energy.

Katharine Bement Davis.

"You want me to talk about the movies? We like them very much, don't we, Emma? Yes, I am greatly interested in the movement, and I believe they already constitute an enormous factor in the people's amusement, and that a grave responsibility rests with the motion picture producers and exhibitors, for the educational element inherent in picture shows is vast, indeed."

"Commissioner," I asked, "have you given any thought to the 'movies' in connection with your work in the prisons and other institutions of correction?" "Oh, yes," readily responded Dr. Davis, "I have not only thought about it in the abstract, but we are actually using motion pictures at the Bedford State Reformatory for Girls, and it works wonderfully well.

"We have five reels," Miss Davis explained, "divided into five different subjects: One reel is scientific, dealing, for example, with the biologic development of the frog. The various stages of evolution are so remarkably simple as depicted on the screen, that the lesson is learned with the utmost ease of all.

"Another reel is devoted to geographic matters, showing distant lands, perhaps, and the various peoples of the world. That invariably fixes the attention of the girls, as they instinctively seem to recognize the fact that people the world over are really the same; that the myths and superstitions which distance and lack of knowledge create, vanish when you are confronted by reality.

"Then, we have a dramatic reel, historical or literary, but always calling forth bursts of enthusiasm and very obvious appreciation. In fact, all of the pictures, including the little dramatizations of books and short stories, as well as the humorous sketches included in our screenic repertoire, afford untold delight to the girls. I want to mention the fact that my girls at Bedford are very fond of Bunny; he is always funny and gets from them many a shriek of unrestrained laughter.

"This is my method: Those girls whose deportment cards show a good record for the week are rewarded with the permission to attend the 'show,' and so strong an inducement does it prove, that the weekly audience increases all the time.

"Yes, indeed, I want very much to have the 'movies' installed in the different institutions within my jurisdiction, but so far I simply haven't the wherewithal. If some kind, benevolent spirit," laughed Dr. Davis, "would be moved to donate for this very desirable and worthy purpose, none would be more gratefully appreciative than I. Particularly keen am I about having pictures for my boys at the Harts Island Reformatory, as I know it would help my work there most effectively. But I have to bide my time, as the funds are already somewhat overtaxed.

"Now, I'll tell you what, in my opinion, considerably mitigates the resultant good of universal use of motion pictures for prisoners," continued Commissioner Davis with animation, "it is the darkness. Naturally, it is impossible to exhibit on the screen in the light, and I should be very much averse to throwing a room full of all shades of questionable characters into utter darkness. It would be a decided risk, notwithstanding the most rigid discipline. And, by the way," meditatively went on the Commissioner, "it is just that matter of darkness in the hall or theater at the time of presenting photoplays that furnishes the cause for the strenuous objection most censors have to juveniles going unattended by their guardians. It is, you know, a matter for serious consideration, because a movement of such sudden and phenomenal growth like the moving pictures which has spread as nothing else did ever before all over the civilized globe, must not be allowed to be marred even in the slightest degree by any flaws or drawbacks.

"Yes, yes, most decidedly," emphatically declared Miss Davis, "by a steady process of elimination the 'movies' will ultimately be perfected, and all those undesirable qualities that the discriminating find fault with, and which are still there of necessity, through immaturity will undoubtedly disappear.

"I most certainly dislike and disapprove of those suggestive photoplays that go under the guise of 'problem plays,' and that so many exhibitors seemed to try out on the public. I think they are quite horrid. They can do absolutely no good in the way of pointing out a moral. For the most part, young people who see them 'take the cash and let the credit go,' or, plainly speaking, they get and imbibe all the rest of the nauseating display and let the moral completely escape. I do hope that kind of pictures is already taboo.

"Do you know," vivaciously asked Commissioner Davis, "that they took pictures here for 'Our Mutual Girl?' I am in those, and I certainly did enjoy the posing and all the rest of it. It was lots of fun." And her eyes danced with the recollection of that event.

From the infectious enthusiasm and whole-heartedness with which this remarkable woman spoke about the "movies" one would infer that the chief function of a Commissioner of Correction, appointed for the term of four years at the comfortable salary of seven thousand five hundred dollars per annum, was to study and look after the various phases of motion picture life. But no, Dr. Davis, like the other big minds of the world today, are keenly on the "qui vive" for the things that count; for that which makes for a better life; for the factors that tend to spread light and progress, and, for all that which makes this brave old earth of ours a better, cleaner, more desirable place to dwell on. And all of those big minds recognize and readily concede that the great moving picture movement is one, and a very mighty one, of those factors.

BALBOA COMPANY GETS BUSY.

The famous vaudeville team of Ben Deely and Marie Wayne, who for more than ten years presented the sketch, "The New Bellboy," on the Orpheum and the Keith Circuits, recently decided to enter the moving picture field, and are now at work for the Balboa Amusement Producing Company at the Long Beach, California, studios of that corporation. While in vaudeville, Mr. Deely evolved ideas for presentation in films of a series of comedy releases surrounding the adventures of one "Ima Simp, Detective," and he secured the services of William Wolbert, for many months a director of Joker comedies for the Universal company, as director of the new Balboa comedy aggregation.

Deely and Wayne, during the vaudeville engagements they played at Keith's Theater in Washington, had the honor of winning laughter from President Wilson and Secretary Bryan, these national leaders freely joining in the plaudits that rewarded the team's mirthful work in "The New Bellboy."

The Messrs. H. M. and E. D. Horkheimer, proprietors of the Balboa company's studios, intend to strive steadily to make the "Ima Simp" series of comedies renowned as high-class, laughter-bringing releases of the best kind. Deely and Wayne and Director Wolbert are, therefore, being supplied with the very best facilities to film their comedy scenes.

Charles Dudley, long associated with the Keystone, Monopole and the Universal players, and who has been a member of the Balboa's organization since it was formed, is one of the funmakers working with Deely and Wayne. Other character and comedy players in the new company are Henry Stanley, a veteran actor, Archie Warren, Brent Carruthers, Suzanne Rogers, Robert Barrow and Alice Brookton.

Percy de Gaston is cameraman for the new company.

HORSE WAS NOT KILLED.

In a review of a recent Warner Feature entitled "Across the Border," which, by the way, was made by the Colorado Motion Picture Company, and not by the Albuquerque Film Company, as the item declared, it was stated by the reviewer that "the dumb beast goes down head over heels to his death it seems." Manager Boucher, of the Colorado company, declares that while the scene was a thrilling one, the horse was not hurled to his death, but is still working faithfully in subsequent releases. The Moving Picture World's account of the picture brought the humane society's officer to the company's office where he was convinced that the horse had not been maltreated.

NEW SELIG PUBLICITY PLAN.

One of the most unique, as well as comprehensive, methods of exploiting picture plays for the benefit of exhibitors has been created by the publicity department of the Selig Polyscope Company. It is in the form of a "release herald" and contains synopses for the entire month of September of all Selig releases. There are eighteen single-reel comedies, dramas and tragedies, four two-reel dramas and comedies and a special Selig three-reel jungle-zoo feature, introducing a horde of wild animals.

Each one of the single-reel releases is neatly illustrated with a half-tone engraving, and the title, date of release, author, producer and cast is given, together with a well worded and comprehensive synopsis of the story told in the picture.

Each of the two-reel Monday releases is described in a most interesting manner, the description and illustration being printed in the form of the regulation herald, to be supplied exhibitors for advertising the picture when booked at their theatres. The actual herald is produced in the Selig release herald in the same form it will be supplied to exhibitors.

The explanation is admirably complete in a most capable and clever manner, so that nothing is left to the imagination of the exhibitor. The whole story is told to him in a condensed form.

Another feature of this new Selig release herald is a complete exploitation of the "new Selig plan to bring the motion picture theatre and the local newspaper together." The plan embraces a series of six novelettes, written by the celebrated Selig star, Kathlyn Williams, these stories being based on Selig special three-reel features in which Kathlyn Williams has played the leading part and which are being released, one a month.

The first three novelettes of the series are "In Tune With the Wild," "Chip, of the Flying 'U'," and "The Fifth Man." The others completing the series will be announced in the near future.

The Selig Polyscope Company has made arrangements with the Western Newspaper Union so that any newspaper can secure the plates of these novelettes all ready for printing so that a local theatre can book the picture for a certain date and arrange with his favorite newspaper to run the story of the picture from the plates during the week immediately preceding the date set for the exhibition of the film.

This new Selig plan brings to the newspaper a most efficient plan for building circulation and obtaining an added advertising revenue from the motion picture theater, while the theater benefits by the publicity that helps to attract crowds to his house.

In this unique plan, which is being utilized eagerly by newspapers and picture theaters, Selig has again scored a point in its dissemination of publicity.

The Selig release herald will be issued every month and will undoubtedly grow in prestige, efficiency and usefulness.

"HANG TOWN" REJUVENATED.

A feature of the realism which the California Motion Picture Corporation has incorporated into its film dramatization of Bret Harte's "Salomy Jane" will be a rejuvenation of Hang Town, the most famous and characteristic of the early mining camps of the Far West. The history of Hang Town is symbolic of its name. The settlement in the late 40s and 50s teemed with all the outlawry, violence and reckless bravado that called the celebrated vigilantes into existence. The organization effected by these self-ordained guardians of law and order plays a very large part in the story of "Salomy Jane."

The film story of "Salomy Jane," like Harte's original romance, is said to be an unusually realistic prototype of Hang Town temperament and history. There is the almost paradoxical companionship of lawlessness and prodigal generosity that gives the records of young California a peculiar heart interest. Under more modern nomenclature Hang Town has become Placerville.

TWIST MOVES OFFICES.

Stanly H. Twist, president of the Inter-Ocean Sales Company, has moved his offices from the World's Tower Building to the fifth floor of the Times Building, where he will occupy part of the Standard Film Corporation's new and well appointed suite. This move will enable Twist to give much of his personal time and attention to the management of the Panama-Pacific Exposition department of the Standard, in the affairs of which company he is also actively interested.

UNDER the capable direction of Ralph Ince, "Four Thirteen," by Donald I. Buchanan, moves swiftly through a series of exciting incidents to a highly effective conclusion. There is not only a spirit of exciting movement in the drama, but there is also an undercurrent of ethical purpose—it drives in tragic manner at the greed which actuates men when they disregard all obligations, including purely social ones to their fellow men. It is when men contrive and scheme to defeat the codes under which we are living that they often begin descent into a riot of crime. It is when men try to attain great wealth by taking unfair advantage of those who are doing business in the open, that the essence of crime is attempted. "Four Thirteen" shows how Destiny metes out justice to such guilty individuals even when the law is unable to reach them.

"Four Thirteen" is a magnificent villain, an arch smuggler of diamonds, who lives a double life, that of devoted father to a lovely daughter in the open, and that of a master crook in secret. He is Mr. Hall, jeweler, of high business and social standing in New York City. To those who bring in his merchandise free of duty he is known only by a number, all relations with his confederates being carried on with the utmost secrecy in a den devoted to that purpose. Hall is returning from a European trip with his daughter, when he makes a steamer acquaintance, Baron Barcellos. The Baron is one of those titled adventurers who throng European countries, and has just been commissioned to smuggle a lot of cut diamonds into America, consigned to an individual known as "Four Thirteen." Hall has never met him before and he does not associate Hall with "Four Thirteen." The Baron is invited to Hall's house and loans Hall his fountain pen to inscribe the address.

The Baron, however, is under suspicion. A sub-chief of the secret service assigns Raymond Davis to an investigation of Barcellos at the dock. Raymond is a favored suitor for the hand of Hall's pretty daughter and runs into them at the dock while in quest of the Baron. He is not distracted from his duty thereby, but has Barcellos searched in a private room without discovery of importance. On returning to the dock, Baron joins the Halls for a moment and recovers the fountain pen he loaned.

The plot is very ingenious. Hall holds in his possession for a brief time, all unwittingly, the diamonds Barcellos is bringing in for him. Raymond's relations with Hall's daughter makes the situation more involved, and an additional complication is afforded by Tina, an adventuress in love with Barcellos. The latter goes with the fountain pen full of brilliants to meet "Four Thirteen" and delivers the goods to that character, none other than Hall, wearing a mask. The Baron notes a pocket-book from which "Four Thirteen" makes a payment and this serves to identify Hall when the two men meet in the latter's office. The astute Barcellos traps the man all the ingenuity of secret service men had not uncovered.

The Baron, made aware that he is under suspicion, formulates a plan to defeat Raymond at every point, even to the extent of marrying the jeweler's daughter. It is a daring scheme, even for a melodrama. On an evening when both Raymond and the Baron are invited to dine at Hall's mansion, Raymond comes upon a handsome woman in distress, none other than Tina. She faints in front of a cafe just as the detective approaches. He is a very unsuspicious detective. He permits himself to be lured into a private room and locked in while Tina makes a scene and accuses him of assault. It is a palpable frame-up, and the detective does not even telephone his excuses to those awaiting his presence at dinner. The photodrama is very weak at this point, but the movement is probably rapid enough to cover inconsistencies.

Raymond is discredited temporarily, but he keeps at his scrutiny of the Baron's movements. Miss Hall visits Tina in prison and learns that Raymond is in great peril. A gathering of the forces at the rendezvous of smugglers results in swift tragedy, the death of Baron Barcellos. Hall escapes without being seen and a tremendous chase ensues. The desperate smuggler, realizing that his own daughter is among those pursuing, resorts to one extreme measure after another, winding up with the theft of a special empty train. Its engineer catches the last car, runs through, climbs over the tender and enters upon a struggle with Hall. Secret service men and railroad employees are following on an engine, and Raymond is in the procession with an auto containing Miss Hall. The engineer is thrown from the locomotive by Hall. A train dispatcher telegraphs ahead to switch a train running wild, and a thrilling spectacle follows, a head-on view of a train switched to a siding and pitching over into a gully.

The melodrama is skillfully handled and finely acted throughout the majority of scenes and is well calculated to hold the interest of a mixed audience to the conclusion.

CHICAGO SYNDICATE CONTRACTS FOR KLEINE SUBJECTS.

Lubliner & Trinz, controlling a number of theatres in Chicago, have contracted for a series of big Kleine pictures. At the opening of the Biograph and Vitagraph theaters, Lubliner & Trinz promptly arranged to use Kleine's "Quo Vadis?," "Anthony and Cleopatra," "Last Days of Pompeii," "Between Savage and Tiger" and "The Lion of Venice," as the best mediums for a favorable introduction of the new houses.

MOVING SCENARIO DEPARTMENT.

A change of considerable import is now taking place in the Universal offices, as they are now removing the complete scenario staff from their present headquarters at the executive offices at 1600 Broadway, to the Imp Studio. The move was suggested by Julius Stern, manager of the Imp Studio, in order that co-operation may be developed between the directors and the Scenario Department.

It is essential that these two departments work in unison and the move is considered a great thing in the way of saving time. It also enables the Scenario Department to judge what is necessary in the way of photoplays for the various companies under Mr. Stern's supervision.

Picture Conditions in South Africa.

Joseph Fisher, Cape Town Exhibitor, Gives Many Interesting Facts About the Business in His Country.

By George Blaisdell.

FROM Cape Town, South Africa, to the United States is a long distance for a man to travel for a vacation. Yet Joseph Fisher, director of Fisher's Elite Bioscope, Ltd., and the Grand Theater, both of Cape Town, the southern point of South Africa, says he would not have missed it for a good deal. Mr. Fisher arrived in New York on May 27 intending to remain a few weeks. Talking a few days ago he said that he intended to start for England on September 2 in route for Cape Town. He was not sure about getting home, but he was sure that he had a corking good time in the home dominions of Uncle Sam and that whenever he saw anywhere the Stars and Stripes he would feel like taking off his hat in memory of the splendid hospitality of which he had been the recipient in his journeyings in the territory bounded by Boston, Chicago and Washington.

Joseph Fisher.

One of Mr. Fisher's main objects in coming to the "States" was to attend the exposition in New York in the hope of gaining information about the latest moving picture equipment. "I found practically nothing, however," he said, "of which I did not have previous knowledge through reading the Moving Picture World. Your paper, by the way, means more to us in way-off South Africa than you realize." Mr. Fisher appeared in a thousand-foot picture devised by Mr. Plimpton of the Edison studio, and the Cape Town exhibitor is sure that the subject will be of great interest to his patrons, as it will show their exhibitor meeting their favorite players. Mr. Fisher also spent a very pleasant four days at Atlantic City in the company of "Pop" Lubin—"and Mr. Lubin is real company, too," said Mr. Fisher. A visit to the Vitagraph studio is also one of the enjoyable memories of the trip.

"Cape Town has a white population of 80,000," said Mr. Fisher. "There are twelve picture theaters; there is only one where vaudeville is shown. The license tax is based on seating capacity. For a thousand and over the charge is $50 yearly, for 750 it is $40, and below that $25. Our Grand Theater seats 940 persons and runs the year around, two performances a day. We use an orchestra of ten pieces, and pay as much attention to the music as we do to the pictures. We show six reels and change programs twice a week, Tuesday and Friday. We use the Gaumont and Pathe Weeklies and about 600 feet each week dealing with South African happenings.

"How about the exchange business? Well, you know at one time we had four exchanges, and you may be sure there was sharp competition. There was price cutting and duplication of programs. In September of last year there was organized the African Film Trust, which was, of course, the amalgamation of the four exchanges. This company controls all films entering South Africa, and has a contract with every theater in the country to use only its films. It has an output of fifty-five reels a week, which are shipped from Southampton every Saturday. The buying offices are in London, where four men are employed for the sole purpose of viewing every picture on the market. These men are instructed to get what in their opinion are the best regardless of make. Of course, the exhibitors are not always satisfied with the selections. We are going to hold conventions at stated periods so that we may keep our London agents in closer touch with our desires. Our most popular brands? Why, I should say for us they are the Edison, Vitagraph and Lubin.

The players are as well known and as much interest taken in them in South Africa as you will find in the United States. We are always getting inquiries about them—are they married, etc. Since coming here I have joined the Screen Club, and I have made arrangements with the manufacturers to forward me their printed matter. When I get back home I am going to open a Bureau of Information.

Mr. Fisher referred to pictures portraying South African life. Some of the subjects contain blunders that make their exhibition out of the question. He related as an instance a representation of a ship coming into Cape Town and anchoring off a beach, on which palm trees were waving. "You know we have $55,000,000 worth of docks down there," he said. "Furthermore, I doubt if there is a palm tree within a thousand miles.

"Have we censorship troubles? We have. It is comparatively recent, too. Its beginning was rather singular. When the administrator heard Kalem's 'From the Manger to the Cross' was to be shown he said it must not. As he had not seen the production he was asked why. He said it was a religious picture. When he was told there was no law under which he could prevent its exhibition, he curtly replied: 'There'll be one.' In fourteen days he had pushed a bill through the Council giving him full power. He had judged a picture unseen. The censorship board is composed partly of clergymen and doctors. Yes, there are women members. A committee of three visits the theaters on the day of the first showing, just after the arrival of a steamer. They may eliminate or they may condemn as they please. If the picture is shown in spite of them they may appeal to the administrator, who will then send official notice that if the offense be repeated the exhibitor is liable to a fine of $100, and that for the second offense the penalty will be six months' imprisonment."

Mr. Fisher was asked as to the custom regarding the admission to theaters of the blacks. He said in houses patronized by the whites they were not admitted—that if one were allowed even in the gallery it would mean the desertion by the whites. There are theaters on the outskirts of the city for the benefit of the colored population, where the admission is 6d. The natives take much interest in pictures and cheer the hero and hoot the villain in the most approved fashion. The admission in the city is 6d. and 12d. Any electric current we may use must be taken from the corporation. As to nationality or origin of pictures we prefer the American to those of any other country.

"In regard to educational subjects, we have difficulty in getting them. We do have children's matinees, and make an effort to get a program suitable for the occasion. We try to keep away from the Wild West stuff and the blood and thunder films. We are seeking to improve the tone of our entertainments. We take nothing over 3,000 feet in length. My idea is that variety is the life of the business, and we get that in the single-reel lengths. Yes, films are expensive in South Africa, as you may judge when I tell you that the pictures shown in my houses are immediately started on a journey of a thousand miles."

"The Bond of Love" and "While Fire Raged"

Two-Reel and Five-Reel Eclectic Productions Possess Many Features of Interest.

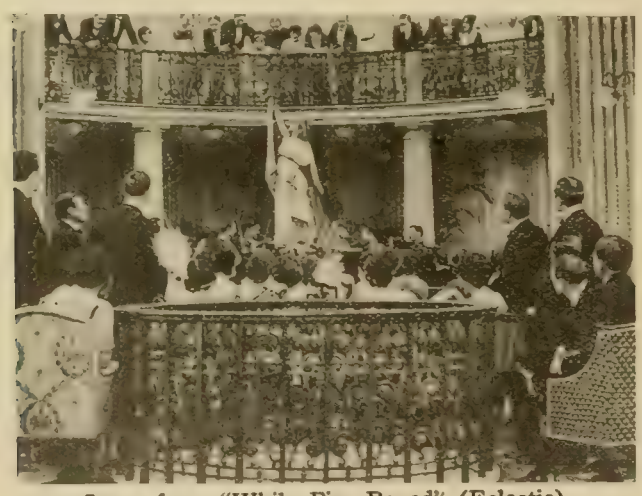
Reviewed by Robert C. McElravy.

A UNIQUE interest attaches to "The Bond of Love," a two-reel photoplay, inasmuch as it was produced entirely by the Yale University Dramatic Association. The story is one of student life, was written by students and entirely enacted by undergraduates. It is well pictured, constructed with admirable technique and presented with considerable skill. All of the parts, including two girl characterizations, are played by young men.

Scene from "The Bond of Love" (Eclectic).

The story concerns Bob Finch, an orphan, and his cousin, Eric. The latter is weak and yields readily to temptation. Numerous gambling scenes are shown, one being staged at Mowry's, a famous New Haven student resort. Pictures of the Yale buildings are also included in the various scenes, all of which have a proper university atmosphere.

Bob, who is in love with Eric's sister, promises her to look after the wayward youth. He finds this a severe trial, and in the course of the story assumes the blame for Eric's attempts to "crib" in examinations. For this Bob is suspended.



Scene from "While Fire Raged" (Eclectic).

The big scene occurs in the second reel, where Eric, endeavoring to raise a large sum of money to pay his poker debts, attempts to rob his own father. Bob, making a surreptitious call upon the sister, appears. In the darkened room he mistakes Eric for a burglar. There is a struggle and Eric knocks Bob out temporarily and escapes. Later the truth becomes known; Bob is cleared, and Eric writes a note that he will not come home again until he has made a man of himself.

The leading parts in this production were taken by Howard T. Cumming, Gaillard Thomas, Newbold Noyes, Littlefield McCoy and Rufus T. King. The story as a whole has a youthful swing to it and carries the interest nicely throughout.

"While Fire Raged."

"While Fire Raged" is a five-reel production, most of the scenes occuring on a big French liner. The cast is made up of well-known French performers, including Gabrielle Robinne and Rene Alexandre.

The story makes a strong, artistic production, chief interest centering in the second, third and fourth reels, when the big fire is raging on the vessel. While panic reigns in the steerage the famous dancer, known as Gaby de Rose, entertains the other passengers. They learn of the fire only when it has been brought under control.

Wallace Summers, first lieutenant of his father's steamship, is engaged to Ethel Richards. He meets the celebrated Gaby and falls in love with her. Gaby signs a contract which takes her to Mexico and travels on the same boat with her lover. The captain is opposed to the match, and even after the dancer's supreme efforts during the fire he succeeds in separating them. The love scenes at the beginning, during the holocaust and at the separation were exceptionally well staged.

This offering as a whole possesses a good combination of artistic and melodramatic interest.

"TREY O' HEARTS" HAS CAUGHT ON.

Manager Isadore Bernstein Receives Innumerable Letters Attesting the Worth of Big Serial.

THE many letters that have been received by Manager Isadore Bernstein, of the Hollywood (Universal) studios, written by people who have witnessed the initial run of the first installment of Louis Joseph Vance's serial, "The Trey o' Hearts," prove that unflagging energy has once more been justly rewarded.

Aware of the magnitude of their assignment, the members of the company, from the director, Mr. Lucas, to the assistant cameraman, and from Cleo Madison and George Larkin to the most lowly of the extras, have spared no effort, have balked at nothing that promised to make the film one of the most spectacular and, at the same time, true-to-life stories ever produced.

To those familiar with the methods of film production, one of the most unique phases of the entire work lies in the fact that none of the players will consent to the use of a "double," however dangerous the scene. They have taken the position, it is said, if they are to receive the credit for the daring action, they are going to earn it. To accomplish this, it is claimed, George Larkin has dived with his hands tied together from a height of sixty feet into a boiling, rock-strewn surf; Miss Madison and Mr. Walsh have been tied to a rock in the ocean over which broke a surf so fierce that the ropes were fastened in place only after a battle of more than two hours. In another instance, it is narrated that it was only the prompt action of those on shore that saved the lives of three of the company, when their water-logged dory capsized as they were bringing it in through the surf on the rock-bound coast of Point Loma.

Not least among the many unusual features of the series is the work of Stephen Rounds and Henry Valleyo, the Gold Seal's cameramen. In a number of places, it is necessary for Miss Madison, in the double role of Rose and Judith, twin sisters, to appear in the same picture. The taking of the double exposure which this necessitates would not be worthy of especial note if it were not that in many instances it is imperative that the two characters actually hold conversations with each other. So perfectly have the films been timed by the cameramen that even the players themselves find it hard to believe that Miss Madison is taking both parts and that there are not two different people in the film.

Much money, time and energy have been spent to make the film possible, but Universal people say that results indicate that their expenditure is amply justified.

CANNOT PRAISE TOO HIGHLY.

Devonport, Auckland, New Zealand.

Editor, Moving Picture World:

Enclosed find $4.00 in payment of a year's subscription to the "Moving Picture World," commencing with the issue nearest August 15. I also enclose 25c. for the list of 74 operator's questions.

It may interest you to know that we are Americans and are doing fairly well. I am enclosing a photo of our theater, the "Victoria." It is a rather costly building being valued at $50,000, and is far more luxurious inside than out, as that is the custom in this country.

I cannot praise your magazine too highly.

Yours truly,

"The Lost Paradise"

Famous Players Film Company Offers a Five-Reel Picture of Ludwig Fulda's Internationally Famous Melodrama of Labor Against Capital.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE theme behind "The Lost Paradise" is the struggle of capital against labor. It is this day's big dramatic theme just as in Homer's day war and fighting held the big interest for men and women. Any picture of human fates—of love, of happiness, of hunger, of life itself—that sets them forth against the clash and struggle of capital's greed and non-capital's apparent weakness brings those facts home to more individual human beings who have to live in this modern world than any other picture with any other theme as a background could possibly do. It is, indeed, so pertinent a theme that the average spectator must see something of his or her own story in it whenever it is clearly shown. And on that account he or she will be the more critical of such a picture's feeling and, perhaps, if satisfied with the emotion that the picture excites in them and in others around them, especially in the hypothetical "capitalist who will have to see the picture," will be the less critical of its author's intellectual grasp of the subject.

"The Lost Paradise," picturized by the Famous Players, and with H. B. Warner in the leading role, was recently shown to a well-filled house at the Strand Theater and received a welcome that showed the audience in sympathy with it as a whole. The original play by Ludwig Fulda has been warmly received by audiences in Europe and in America as well. The picture will also be popular. One cannot help seeing that a kind of standard has been set which dictates how this struggle between labor and capital should be properly handled. The love story and the peculiar experiences of hero and heroine, and of the capitalist too, may vary in every play, story or picture; but, taking them as they come, the lesser characters and many of the situations of any one might fit into any of the others without much jarring of the general plot. In this offering there is not enough that suggests other plays to put much of a burden on it. Turns of the action now and then remind one of other works and particularly of Galesworthy's "Strife"; but that its story is individual and different we need hardly say, and it holds interest. There is no noticeable padding in it, and it was clear that all its climaxes, its emotional points and its humor "got across" to the spectators, and it was clear that they considered it a "good picture." That it might have been made more fresh in its rewriting for the screen, that the stage wrinkles might have been ironed out a bit better, is true; but that fact does not by any means destroy or markedly hamper its entertainment value or the pleasure that it gives. Every time it aimed at a laugh the audience responded heartily, in spite of the fact that in its action there is no truly inherent humor. Its fun comes from humorous characters whose sole duty in the action is to furnish relief, a stage expedient quite common in Shakespeare. To sum up, the action, while interesting, is a bit awkward at times.

The hero of the picture, well played by H. B. Warner, is the inventor of a new dynamo; but his invention has been stolen by a great manufacturer for whom, as the picture unrolls, the hero goes to work as foreman of the shop. He has known his employers' daughter for many years and is in love with her; but she is engaged to the man whose part in the action is that of a mild villain. The crux of the melodrama is a bit of evidence that shows how and where the manufacturer got his knowledge of the invention. This evidence is discovered by the hero just as a strike at the shop is about to begin and amid the struggle of the workmen against their employer. It plays a very important part in a very melodramatic way. The happy ending accounts for only the hero and the heroine, leaving the fates of several of the lesser characters to the imagination. The acting is pleasing, especially in the leading parts. The photography is good, and some of the scenes include inside views of a big iron works that are tremendously interesting.

CARLYLE BLACKWELL ENTERTAINS.

A party of fifteen guests inspected the studios of the Favorite Players Film Company, which were designed by Carlyle Blackwell and constructed under his personal supervision. The new studios at Edendale consist of a spacious building that is the last word in building construction and is of particular interest, as it shows the wonderful progress made in the motion picture industry. This institution will contain every known device for turning out the best pictures possible. The factory building is one hundred feet wide by sixty feet deep, two stories high, and the entire construction is of brick and concrete, making it absolutely fireproof.

One million feet of pictures a week is the capacity of this factory, and, judging by the spacious quarters assigned to the various departments, it can be handled with all comfort and speed. The interior of the studios is forty feet high and is almost enclosed by plain plate glass. The dressing rooms, etc., are along the side of the studio. A tank, twenty-five feet wide, is constructed in the floor for water and trap scenes. The very latest electrical devices for electric lighting have been installed.

The studios met with the highest approval from Mr. Blackwell's guests, and after completing their inspection the party motored back to Los Angeles, where an elaborate luncheon was served at Tortoni's restaurant. All the features of this company will be released through the Alco Film Company, of which Al. Lichtman, former sales manager of the Famous Players Film Company, is president.

DEATH OF MRS. CHARLES ELDRIDGE.

The many friends of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Eldridge, the latter being the well-known and popular Vitagraph actor, will learn with regret of the death of Mrs. Eldridge at her home in Brooklyn, N. Y., August 20. Her death terminates a married life of thirty-two years, practically all of which was spent in theatrical environment with her husband.

Professionally Mrs. Eldridge was known as Addie Dunant. She had appeared mostly as a character woman, and her principal parts had been as Aunt Polly in "David Harum," as Martha in "Faust" with Lewis Morrison, and as Mrs. Tarbox in "The Girl from Rector's." She also appeared in "The Message From Mars" and numerous other productions.

The remains were cremated at Fresh Pond, Long Island, August 22. Mr. Eldridge has many friends who sympathize sincerely with him in his bereavement.

"Frenchy"

Spirit of Quiet Fun All Through Characterizes New Two-Part Majestic Picture with Western Background.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is good in things that are different. In the early eighties a commander of one of those intrepid frontier regiments was in the east on vacation and his friends wanted to get him a book to read. For ten years he had been chasing Apaches and Comanches among the wilds of Arizona with high-strung adventures and hair-breadth escapes and the book that he chose was "Cranford." He wanted a change.

In these early weeks of the war, our excitement makes war pictures in demand and pictures with a tense melodramatic punch; but we'll probably get tired of these in time, and even if we don't, pictures that offer a contrast to these things are even now the more acceptable on account of what is in the newspapers and they more than likely will be increasingly so. "Frenchy" is a comedy depending on the character of a cowboy whose finicky French airs become very amusing when we find that he is not only a better dresser than the rough punchers on the ranch, but a much more daring rider, a much quicker hand with a gun and a surer shot withall than the best of them. His ways make them despise him; but he again and again shows himself the best man on the range notwithstanding. All this is well worked up to be amusing. There are no uproarous situations, but there is an almost continuous variation of this same human fact, around which the characters are arranged and rearranged in a way that keeps a smile lighted, but seldom makes loud laughter.

The leading role is taken by Vester Pegg, a player whose pleasing personality and whose skill as an actor are well known. As the first scene comes out on the screen, we find him as a cowboy going into camp for the night. At a nearby ranch a girl (Francelia Billington) climbs into a wagon whose team is resting at a door. The horses run away with her and the cowboy seeing her plight makes a flying rescue, snatching her out of the wagon to his saddle at full gallop. He is invited home to supper at the ranch and the foreman (Fred Burns) finds him dolling up at the water basin, the broken mirror and the dirty towel that are at the door. Foreman turns up his nose at this; but when he finds that the girl takes pleasure in the stranger's talk, he is incensed. The stranger is given a job and the nickname of "Frenchy." The bunch tries to make things unpleasant for him; but it is soon plain that he can take care of every perplexity. For instance, they dare him to ride an outlaw horse named "Jumping Funeral." He takes the dare and effectively tames the beast, then he calmly asks the foreman to ride him, but the foreman doesn't care to try his fate on the wild horse.

Not all of the incidents are as wholly convincing as this of the bucking horse, but if "Frenchy's" character is accepted there is nothing in the picture that is not amply plausible. For instance, on the way home from a dance, the bunch play a trick on him. They stop to rest for a moment; "Frenchy" falls asleep by the road side, and the rest mount and leave him there. His horse takes leave of him and appears at the corral, making the owner think that "Frenchy" has had an accident. This brings the whole outfit out in search for him and he is found seated calmly smoking on the porch of the hotel in the village. So he is fired and told to go to the ranch for his kit. Meanwhile the girl has fallen sick. The doctor can't at once be found. "Frenchy" claims that he can practice medicine and gives her a dose which, so the doctor says when he comes, saves her life. The picture leads us to expect that this will close a love story, but things don't turn out that way. The rancher can't persuade him to remain. Then we see him waking up. It was all only a dream anyway.

It is one of George Pattullo's short stories picturized. The acting of all concerned is good and the photographs are clear and commendable.

Ad-Film Men Meet Again

Form a Temporary Organization and Arrange for Another Meeting September 22.

A representative gathering of industrial and educational motion picture manufacturing interests convened at the offices of the Smallwood Film Corporation in the Flatiron Building, New York, on Monday evening, August 31.

This was the third of a series of meetings, the first of which was called at the Hotel Shelbourne, Brighton Beach, N. Y., August 15. At that meeting a committee of seven was appointed for the purpose of forming a permanent organization. The committee consisted of H. J. Elkins, Pathe Freres; John D. Gill, Edison Co.; Alfred A. Somerville, International Educational League and Topical News Co.; J. L. Davis, Knickerbocker Film Co.; Nelson M. McKernan, Colonial Film Co., of Washington, D. C.; Watterson R. Rotheracker, Industrial Motion Picture Co., and Arthur N. Smallwood, of the Smallwood Film Corporation.

Those present at the Monday night meeting were very enthusiastic as to the future of the industrial and educational branches of the business and considered the formation of a permanent organization of accredited interests in the field a step in the right direction. A temporary organization was formed, constitution and by-laws approved, and officers elected—all temporarily, pending the approval of a larger meeting to be held in New York City September 22, when a permanent organization will be formed. To give some idea as to the object of the new organization, we quote herewith from the constitution adopted:

Article 1.—The name of this association shall be the International Industrial and Educational Film Manufacturers' Association.

Article 2.—The objects, for which the association is formed, are to promote a spirit of amity and good feeling among its members in dealing with methods, interests and questions arising in the advertising and educational motion-picture business; to disseminate written, spoken and pictured ideas of its aims, aspirations and principles; to bring about a course of fair dealing with the public, fostering its interest, which is paramount; to promote a social intent by frequent meetings, with good cheer and the reading of papers on subjects that go to the betterment of the business, and arranging for their publicity in trade and other papers and magazines; to bring into a closer relation those engaged in the business, safe-guarding and protecting the interests of its members in all ways not prohibited by the laws of the country.

Following are the temporary officers: President, Arthur N. Smallwood, Smallwood Film Corporation; vice-president, George L. Cox, Advance Motion Picture Co.; secretary, J. L. Davis, Knickerbocker Film Company; treasurer, H. J. Elkins, Pathe Freres.

N. G. I. HELP IN ESSANAY PICTURE.

The entire First Regiment, Illinois National Guard, was used in one of the big battle scenes of "The Plum Tree," the big three-act mystery drama which the Essanay company has scheduled for release September 18. With the permission of Governor Dunne and the co-operation of Major John V. Clinnin the actors in the drama, together with the soldiers, were transported on a special train to Miller's Station, Indiana, where the location for the scene was laid. In a most picturesque ravine a "movie" battle between Mexican "Revolutionists" and "Federals" was fought. Francis X. Bushman, in the guise of the American adventurer, led the onslaught of the invaders and the Illinois troops, garbed in all manner of Mexican costumes, acted as though they had been in the business all their lives. Gattling guns, rapid firers and hand grenades were used and the picture looks as near like the real thing as any ever produced.

OTIS TURNER TAKES VACATION.

Otis Turner, or "The Guv'nor," as he is called by the big family of employees at the Universal Western studios, has moved bag and baggage to Lake Tahoe, in the California Sierras, where he will take a much needed vacation, following two years of strenuous work as producer-in-chief for the Big U. Turner expects to rest until the first of October, or thereabouts, and then get back into harness again.

Makers of Movies

THE LONERGANS.

By John William Kellette.

OUT in the city made famous by Georgie M. Cohan in "Forty-five Minutes from Broadway," there came one day a man who changed the belief of the world at large to the real status of New Rochelle, and through his art showed that New Rochelle was not the bucolic stamping ground that the musical comedy led one to believe.

That man was Edwin Thanhouser, who laid the foundation for the world famous Thanhouser films. He saw the beauties of New Rochelle and was quick to grasp the opportunity to enact dramas in the "City Beautiful."

He called to his aid a man versed in literature, one who since that time, less than five years ago, has become famous as the champion scenario writer of the world—Lloyd F. Lonergan, author of more than 700 scripts, a writer of reputation before adopting the movies as a means of expression, and whose work in "The Million Dollar Mystery," the forty-six reel Thanhouser masterpiece of serial construction, stamps him, without doubt, the greatest writer in the screen field in the world.

Lloyd F. Lonergan.

The writer's acquaintance with the peer of the screen dramatists extends considerably more than a year. Prior to that time he had seen Mr. Lonergan many times and took him to be a successful retired merchant or banker, never dreaming that he was the noted plot constructor. Acquaintance ripened and the scribe had a chance to study the human dynamo—for dynamo he must be to have turned out more than seven hundred stories for the screen alone, to say nothing of a large literary contract to supply newspapers and magazines with matters theatrical—and confesses that as yet he has discovered nothing that would lead one to believe that Mr. Lonergan was an overworked man.

He never appears to be busy. Cordial greetings are ever ready for those he terms his friends, and he delights in having friends break into his office and take him away from his work, whether it be to go for a sail on the Sound, a swim, golf, a "movie" show or a stroll. It is all in a day's work for the cheerful Director of Productions of the Thanhouser Corporation. He can always find time to take his friends over and around one of the world's big studios and explain the story and action as he flits from director to director while a baker's dozen of 'em are are kept busy vizualizing his output. The secret of his success, he told the writer recently, is "work!" He has passed up the purely mechanical phase of the work, though, and dictates to a stenographer who later puts her shorthand pothooks into type. Yet his work is thorough. He revises the first draft from the stenographer, and this is passed on to the typists to make the copies that the studio requires—a dozen in number—for several departments must have a script before the work is shown as a first run. The director gets one, his assistant another; the studio manager, the carpenter, scene painter, technical constructor, negative cutter, the joining room, and others who figure into the making of the script. And his "hits" figure about .999. Where he finds time, though, to create such masterpieces as "Undine," "The Star of Bethlehem," "The Woman in White," "Lucile," "Cardinal Richelieu's Ward," "Joseph and His Brethren," to read and absorb the books and visualize his construction and then dictate it, and keep traveling along with original work, is a mystery. Even while working on the 46-reel serial now being produced, he finds time to turn out such work as "The Messenger of Death," "The Tin Soldier and the Dolls," "The Pendulum of Fate," and others, and besides all this he devotes considerable work to lodge matters. He is a pastmaster of a Brooklyn lodge of Masons, and is very active in New Rochelle as an honorary member of Huguenot Lodge, F. & A. M., and is a moving spirit in New Rochelle Lodge of Elks, representing that body at a recent convention.

Philip Lonergan.

Mr. Lonergan finds time, also, to pick out locations and make trips with directors on "hurry-up" stories, such as fires, etc., and recently went to Washington on "The Million Dollar Mystery" and while there saw a chance for a corking comedy, and the result was "From Wash to Washington," wherein Carey L. Hastings as a washerwoman dreams that she is Marguerite (Peggy) Snow, and that Jimmy Cruze is her knight errant, and the inventive Lloyd F. had Peggy and Jimmy meet the Nation's celebrities and they'll soon be seen in a Thanhouser release. Should he desire to consult with Harold MacGrath, collaborator in the big serial, he doesn't object to taking such nice little time destroyers as trips to Syracuse or Chicago, and he is daily in touch with the great fiction author by mail, wire, phone and the twin tracks of steel. Should a fire break out Mr. Lonergan summons director, cameraman, actors and actresses and taxis, and goes with them to the scene. There he'll plot out certain business and on the way back decide what he'll do with it. At his office he'll dictate a full script to a waiting stenographer, should the fire be big enough to warrant a story to be written around it. Because Mr. Lonergan has been able to do this is an explanation of why Thanhouser fire scenes and stories are so powerfully convincing.

His entrance into the "game" was the result of persuasion on the part of his brother-in-law, Edwin Thanhouser—his retention upon the merit of his work, but with the literary equipment he possessed by virtue of a metropolitan editorial connection on the Hearst papers covering several years, short stories, articles and essays in magazines and other outlets, and an imagination that appears to have no equal, the 700 scripts will grow to thousands, because Mr. Lonergan is a young man, strong physically and mentally, and grows stout on work—his secret formula for success. He is a member of the Ed-Au Club of New York City, an organization composed of editors and authors of the screen field. He has a beautiful place in New Rochelle, and with Mrs. Lonergan enjoys life to the fullest realization. With Lytton he says: "If there is a virtue in the world at which we should aim, it is cheerfulness." His scripts show that his eye is on the target, for they breathe of cheerfulness.

Another Lonergan that is a maker of movies is Philip, now writing singles and doubles for Princess and Thanhouser brands, who arrived recently from the Majestic studio at Los Angeles, over which he was the director of productions for nearly a year. Since his return East he has been very prolific. He works differently from his "big" brother, and does his own typewriting. His best known work includes "L'Article 47," a Majestic two-reeler; "The Lackey," Majestic; "The Wheels of Destiny" and "The Clerk," in the same company; "The Broken Barrier," Reliance; but since his arrival at the Thanhouser plant he has turned out "Deborah," "For Her Child," "The Substitute" and "The Guiding Hand," all two-reelers, and for Princess "A Telephone Strategy," "His Enemy," "The Little Senorita," "The Toy Shop," "The Veteran's Sword" and "The Belle of the School."

But when Phil, as he is locally known, went West, he found affairs at the Majestic plant in bad shape. He took off his coat and started to whip affairs into a systematic something, and although he had a scrap or two, he let it be known that he was the head. And then writers began to get better treatment and were not backward about sending in scripts.

While out there he developed, by encouragement, several writers who have made good, and he bought their best work. When David Griffith reached the coast he found things in fine condition and complimented the younger Lonergan upon his stewardship. Now that he is back to his first love Phil is putting into Thanhouser and Princess productions the best there is in him. He has a good script record and a high percentage of "hits." He, like his brother, is a member of the Ed-Au Club of New York.

The last member to compose the trinity is Miss Elizabeth Lonergan, a writer of national reputation through her work in Strand and many of the better class magazines. But she has a good script record and is a prolific writer. Among her best known are "Her Old Teacher," Biograph; "The Counterfeiter's Confederate" and "The Secret Formula," both two-reelers, produced by Kalem, and "The Shoemaker and the Doll," a Majestic. She is conducting a department in one of the metropolitan weeklies devoted to the stage and screen under the name of "Wig-Wag," and shows that she is closely allied with studio and exchange.

So it can readily be seen that the game owes much to the Lonergans. Many an aspiring playwright has thanks for them all, but particularly to Lloyd F. and Philip, who have been in positions where they could offer encouragement and material help, often buying mediocre scripts from writers who showed promise, and then by their skillful treatment made of them things that entertained. Plot, problem and punch are the ingredients that the Lonergans mix with "work" and the formula spells success. It is not to be wondered at that Thanhouser has not been in the market for stories with the peer of the screen dramatist at the helm, and those who know Lloyd F. Lonergan will not envy him in his position of Champion Scenario Writer of the World.

A Critique of Granville Barker

By Lawrence Marston.

YES, trust them not, for there is an upstart crow, beautified with our feathers, that, with his Tyger's heart wrapt in a Player's hide, supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you; and being an absolute Johannes Factotum, is in his owne conceit the only Shake-scene in a countrie."

Lawrence Marston, chief director of a motion-picture company which "released" its films when the motion-picture art was confined chiefly to the production of 25-foot chase scenes, pointed to the passage sandwiched in a folio of historical costumes and smiled.

Lawrence Marston.

"Even Shakespeare had his detractors as a stage manager," laughed Mr. Marston. "I don't wonder that Granville Barker in these days is experiencing the same difficulties with 'policemen critics' and a public which refuses to accept any but the old-school method of staging the classics. The passage I quote is from Robert Green's 'Groatsworth of Wit,' published when Shakespeare was revising and staging at the Globe Theater the plays which had pleased a preceding generation. Evidently his critics did not appreciate his innovations and attempts to uplift the drama.

"The same plaint is made today. During the three hundred years since Shakespeare first produced his plays actors and stage managers have built up around them countless traditions which are handed down from generation to generation of players and playgoers until it is considered in these days almost a sacrilege to violate any of them.

"Granville Barker at the Savoy in London especially has found this true. I must confess that to a great extent I sympathize with Mr. Barker. His protest against the pomposities of Shakespearean elocution and 'classical' declamation is well sustained and his effort to inject realism into the settings of his productions and to get away from the footlights and picture-frame idea of stage settings is also worthy of attention. When he discards realism for impression, however, I must take exception. The whole tendency of modern stagecraft is in this direction. For instance in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' he uses a back drop with huge stars upon it at regularly spaced intervals to suggest Night. Bosh!

"If he must use painted canvas for his exteriors why not let it picture what the play calls for—and reproduce Nature as faithfully as possible. Evidently Mr. Barker does not realize that the day is gone when the stage director can order a herald to walk across the stage with a placard to announce that the bare boards constitute 'the throne-room of the Duke of Mantua.' Such devices carry us back to the days when our school fellows labelled their drawings: 'This is a barn,' 'This is a street car.'

"It is an unwritten law of the motion-picture studio that when scenes are located amid nature's backgrounds they must be taken in the open. This ability to stage Shakespeare and other classics out o' doors is the greatest asset of the cinematograph and if Granville Barker were sincere in his efforts to give Shakespeare the best mountings possible he would renounce the indoor stage and devote himself to elevating an art, which I must confess, sadly needs elevation.

"I quite agree with Mr. Barker when he says that painted canvas is not realistic. But if such is the case why use canvas at all. Why not follow in the footsteps of the Coburn Players and stage Shakespeare, wherever the play calls for it, in the open?

"It is Mr. Barker's ambition to present the classics without the arbitrary divisions of acts and scenes. I think the cinematograph has anticipated him in this. Perhaps, indeed, he may have taken a hint from the screen plays. Moving picture exhibitors do not find it difficult to hold the attention of the public through five-reel subjects and there is even now a play running on Broadway which has twice that number of reels, and barring a short intermission holds its audience absorbed from beginning to end.

"I think Mr. Barker is inconsistent. If he insists upon elaborate costuming for his characters why not elaborate mounting, too? In 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' in his own words, he 'gilded and tricked out in fantastic headdresses' the immortals of the comedy but contented himself with a stage setting which obviously did not cause him as much concern as the designing of the robes of the players.

"Granville Barker's difficulties, however, are those experienced by every producer of 'indoor drama.' Mountains and cascades, real woods and the expanse of waters can only be shown with fidelity to nature on the moving-picture screen. Even in the most spectacular of Hippodrome and Manhattan Opera House productions the introduction of a ship or railroad engine merely excites admiration for the ingenuity of the stage director and does not convince.

"In the motion-picture, however, the Twentieth Century Limited roaring along, battleships at sea, trans-Atlantic liners coming up the bay against a background of skyscrapers—any conceivable subject can be introduced as a part of the drama without asking the spectator to extend his imagination.

"Mr. Barker in cutting down the time required to present an Elizabethan drama to approximately three hours, by insisting upon a rapid delivery of Shakespeare's lines, seems to realize that the modern public wants action instead of words. Ranting, bombastic actors of the old school have so retarded the action of the classics that it is no wonder that the American and British publics have been obliged to treat Shakespeare as they treat their religion—pretending to like it because they think they ought to.

"The motion-picture contains action from start to finish and the great public interest in the screen theater must be taken as an indication that they prefer action to drawing-room dialogue. In fact the whole tendency of the picture play is toward the elimination of 'leaders' and explanatory matter.

"Where even Shakespeare was obliged to stage his battles off stage the photoplay shows the event itself along mile after mile of battle front. Real Balkan and Mexican war pictures have been so cleverly dovetailed of late with staged out-door action that it is only the producer himself who can point out which is the 'faked' and which is the real.

"The time is not far distant when the improvement of the motion-picture will compel the indoor-theater to confine itself to plays which are limited to interior scenes. Attempts to reproduce open air settings will merely amuse where they have been designed in all seriousness. Even Mr. Barker's improved stage lighting and other technical improvements cannot stave off this development." "Shaw and Barker may be the Burbage and Davenant of the present century," concluded Mr. Marston, "but they have a lot to learn from the despised photoplay producer."

Foreign Trade Notes

WAR CENSORSHIP OF FILM ESTABLISHED THROUGHOUT FRANCE.

No Pictures Dealing with Great Conflict Are Permitted—Budget of Interesting Notes Concerning American Trade Men in Paris.

By Our Special Correspondent.

Paris, Wednesday, August 19, 1914.

A CENSORSHIP has been established here. All war films have been banned until further notice. The police have told all exhibitors to remove red cross signs from the fronts of their establishments. It is believed that this measure has been adopted owing to the fact that some unscrupulous showmen have been giving performances ostensibly, but fraudulently, for the purpose of devoting the whole of the receipts for the relief of soldiers. A. H. Kaffenburgh, proprietor of the American Theater, continues to give his takings on Thursdays to the Red Cross. This generous action on the part of the popular American has greatly pleased the people of Montmartre and nightly he is the recipient of praise and thanks from his patrons.

I met William N. Selig yesterday. "You look worried, Mr. Selig," I said, "what's the matter?" "Worried; I guess I am worried," replied the famous producer; "I've been studying the papers and I've come to the conclusion that after this war I shall have to quit making battle pictures." "How so," I asked. "Well, can you tell me," he answered, "where I'm going to get all my automobiles and aeroplanes from. To make up-to-date war pictures I guess I shall have to buy up all the autos and aeroplanes in the United States. This is a motor war; I shall have no further use for my horses."

James Downie, of the Universal company, was taken for a spy the other day. It happened like this: Downie was at Henry Ziegler's flat. He thought the curtains were dusty, so he took them down. The police were watching outside in the street. They saw the flood of light—also Downie with wires in his hand. Then the bell rang. J. D. and the police met on the threshold. The film man was arrested and the apartment searched. After Downie had proved his identity he was released.

It is necessary for every foreigner in Paris to possess a "residence permit." To obtain this paper one must call in person at the police station. When Felix Isman went to get his he found a couple of hundred people waiting outside the office. Felix Isman is a smart man. He knew that all telegrams must be passed by the police. So he forthwith wrote out a message and walked right into the station and was not kept waiting more than a couple of minutes. Once inside, Isman showed his telegram and then explained that he wanted a "permis de sejour" for himself and his wife. "What's the color of her eyes?" asked the official. "Blue." "And her hair?" "Blonde," answered Isman. "And how tall is she?" Felix Isman stretched out his arm a little above his waist. The Frenchman stared and then wrote out the permit. "I say," he said, as he handed over the document, "I should like to see your wife, Monsieur." As a matter of fact, though, Mrs. Isman is petite. She is accredited to be one of the prettiest Americans in the French capital.

Paul Singer, representative of the Agfa company, returned to Paris last week after having served for six days with the French army at the front. In his pocket he had exactly six cents, being his pay while on duty. Singer is American born, but he took out naturalization papers for business reasons.

No news has come to hand from Al. Hayman, the theatrical magnate. His bankers say that as far as they know he is still at Baden Baden.

Raymond Sprecher, representative of the M. P. Sales Company, predicts a great boom in Yankee pictures after the war. Many studios here are being used to house large squads of soldiers.

Newspaper reports state that representatives of Messrs. Gaumont and Pathé Freres in Germany have had to abandon their premises and flee the country.

Daily I am being asked by American film men if I can loan them copies of The Moving Picture World.

F. J. Goldsoll, proprietor of the Cines Palast, Berlin, and president of the newly formed Ambrosio Company, is now fighting with the French army. Goldsoll was born American but for business purposes became naturalized French a few years ago.

Joseph Menchen, the American moving picture entrepreneur, is going to place his new seven seater Sunbeam auto at the disposal of the French Red Cross corps. Throughout the war Menchen will drive his own auto under the orders of the military authorities.

William N. Selig is stopping at the Hotel Edouard VII, but as more than half the staff there are at the front, Selig and other visitors are waiting on themselves and taking meals at a little restaurant usually frequented by chauffeurs.

J. Ziegler, Paris representative of the Universal film company has experienced a trying ordeal. He left this city seven days ago to board the France at Havre. On arrival at the port Ziegler learned that the liner could not leave owing to the war. For over a week he and hundreds of other passengers for the States found themselves stranded. Reports state that many were unable to find hotel accommodation and those who were fortunate enough to get rooms had to pay exorbitant prices. Every day there was a terrible struggle to get food at the restaurants. Some of the travelers slept on the quays.

Although Felix Isman has given the two hundred dressing rooms at the Theatre des Champs Elysées for use as hospital wards the work of preparing the building for the production of "Cabiria" is being continued. William J. Gane, Isman's general manager, has invented a new system for the showing of the film. In place of the usual screen, there will be a huge waterfall and the pictures will be projected from the cabin at the back of the stage onto the falling sheet of water. Questioned as to how he got the germ of the idea, Mr. Gane told me that he had observed that the cinematograph recorded flowing water more faithfully than anything else. That fact set him thinking and enabled him to perfect the system.

Charles B. Brockway has just returned from a long sojourn in Hungary and is now working at Isman's theater in the Avenue Montaigne.

WAR MUSSES THINGS IN ENGLISH PICTURE WORLD.

Howl Is Raised When Paper Advises Boycott of Houses in Which German Capital Is Invested—Answering Call to Colors—Notes.

London, August 19, 1914.

SEVERE and caustic comment has been precipitated in the moving picture trade in the metropolis this week through the publication in a predominant evening paper of a slashing attack upon German owned theaters in England. Inspired, or rather excited, by the proceeding war, the writer of the article advises the public to boycott kinema theaters worked upon German or Austrian capital, and even goes so far as to mention certain properties for this unfair treatment. The attack is bound to provoke an outcry in the trade against the journal in question, for it happens that most of these theaters are managed and controlled by Britishers and employ local people. Indeed, the only foreign element appears to be in a few cases the fact that German capital has been invested in the enterprises. In that case about twenty-five per cent. of the industries in this country might as well be boycotted because they obtain their materials from Germany or, perhaps, in the case of limited liability companies, because some of their shares are held by Germans.

Albert Cloyenberg, one of the directors of Ruffell's Exclusive Pictures, arrived in town last Saturday from New York and reports one or two interesting features. Mr. Cloyenberg thinks satisfactorily of the progress of the British film in the United States.

It will be news to many American manufacturers and agents to hear that nearly one-third of the regular employees of the film trade generally has been called out to join the forces either as reservists or territorials. In a few cases the heads of departments have unostentatiously laid down the pen for the sword, and, in view of the cosmopolitan character of the trade, this patriotic attitude is all the more commendable. The positions of men so called out, I am glad to record, are being kept open for them at the conclusion of hostilities and certain benefits paid to the wives or dependents by the employers.

Last week I referred to the contemplated prohibition of actual war pictures by the government. It has since been announced that these regulations will be relaxed a little to permit of the exhibition of any pictures which are clearly of no strategic or military value to the enemy. Of course, the utmost discretion will have to be exercised by manufacturers, especially in the case of topical films, as a single breach of the trust and discretion placed in manufacturers and exhibitors would instantly bring stringent regulations over the whole industry.

Whether the fact can be attributed directly to the war or not, it is a strange coincidence that during the past three weeks an unusual number of mortgages, debentures and other charges upon assets have been registered by moving picture companies. Upon the file at Somerset House for the last two weeks in July there are nearly thirty charges of some kind or other, representing in cash approximately £20,000. This is considerably in excess of the usual average.

Buffalo Bill Historical Pictures.

Graphic Story Told by General King, Who Was Present at the Battle of War Bonnet Creek.

RECALLING the circumstances which led up to the famous battle of War Bonnet Creek, when the troopers of the United States under the leadership of General Wesley Merritt overtook and almost annihilated the band of Indians which was trying to join the Sioux who, a few days before, had wiped out the command of Colonel Custer and killed that intrepid commander, General Charles King, who was present, tells the story of the Buffalo Bill historical pictures in the following interesting manner:

"That was a memorable march. It was fourteen miles west to Rawhide Peak, and there at 4 o'clock they halted, watered, remounted, rode on again—northward now to the valley of the Niobrara, where at 10 p. m. they unsaddled, bivouacked till 3 o'clock in the morning, by which time the wagons with rations and forage had caught up. Men and horses were roused, given a substantial breakfast, then away they went again—east-northeast now and heading for the Cheyenne crossing.

"The Indians to reach it had only an easy Sunday ride of twenty-eight miles northwestward from their abandoned camps. The Fifth cavalry, after a thirty-five mile jog all Saturday afternoon and evening, had still a fifty-mile stage to cover, and had to make it unsuspected and unseen. With only an hour's ride across the crest of a hill, then everywhere the battle began again and on every side the poor red men were being crowded and broken by our fire.

"A high wind came up from the north and drove the cutting snow in the faces of those of us who merely watched the fight. A troop of cavalry swung past at the trot and an ambulance went bumping down the ruts of the road where a patch of us wounded lay waiting. A soldier with two fingers of his left hand shot off came running toward us shouting that it was all damned foolishness. On the hills the sound of carbines firing echoed in a steady, patient way with the sound of hammers driving coffin nails.

"The snow fell thicker and the smoke hung low over the land and we were filled with the heavy monotony of death. It was like some nightmare that we had been weeping in through eternity. The whole world was involved in conflict. A man gritted his teeth and muttered, "My God! Why don't they surrender?" and, as if answering him, the bugles, turned to pity sang "Cease Firing," and a kind silence fell where death and turmoil had been keeping bloody house all day.

"The smoke drifted from the hillside and plains across where we watched; a group of Indians came stalking down the hill pacing to the funeral of a defeated race; our flag fluttered red and blue and white across the dead gray of the earth and skies; there was a cheer and the sound of tramping feet and the blare of loud music.

"And we were recalled to the fact that we were sitting in the Tabor Opera House looking at the motion picture reproduction of the last fight of the Indians of North America against the army of the United States. Hillsides, plains, the moving troops, the dying Indians, the coughing Hotchkiss were no more. Instead there were lights of the theater and the white screen and a thousand people awaking to the realization of having witnessed the most wonderful spectacle ever produced since motion pictures were invented.

"Nothing like this has ever been done before. Nothing to equal it will, perhaps, ever be done again. It is not a 'photoplay.' It is not a series of 'staged spectacles.' It is war itself; grim, unpitying and terrible; and it holds your heart still as you watch it and leaves you, in the end, amazed and spellbound at the courage and the folly of mankind.

"No boy or girl should be allowed to miss these pictures. If you are a lonely man or woman pick up some equally lonely kiddie and take him for an afternoon with the great leaders of our army, with the great chiefs of our Indian tribes and two hours in the open world that has been made sacred by heroic blood of the nation's fighting heroes.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

THE London Bioscope is authority for the statement that there is no panic in the English motion picture field and that the business there will assume normal shape immediately after the close of the war. The real purpose of the statement seems to be a warning to manufacturers not to take advantage of war conditions to raise the price of films and attempt to make up for the loss of business due to interference with commercial traffic. The warning is a timely one and some very strong arguments are made in backing it up. The anticipations of the Bioscope have been manifested on this side quite frequently since the outbreak of the war, but not to an extent attracting serious attention. The first intimations of such fears came from exhibitors and renters. Inquiry shows that none of the American manufacturers entertained a thought of raising the price of films. Their first thought was to reduce expenses and in that way offset a part of the effects of lost export trade, and even the movement in that direction is not as pronounced as it was immediately following the declaration of war. This is explained by the stability of the American market. The manufacturers are not as nervous as they were two weeks ago when some of the fighting governments allowed reports to gain circulation to the effect that the war would last at least three years, and perhaps ten. The belief that the duration of the war will be a matter of months, and not years, grows stronger every day among the manufacturers on this side and they feel that the loss of export trade is only temporary. With this belief on their part it is considered good policy to continue operations as closely as possible to the standard in force at the time the unfortunate outbreak occurred in Europe, so that in case of a sudden or early cessation of hostilities and declaration of peace the manufacturers will be in a position to promptly take up the export trade again.

One of the leading manufacturers states that so far as this country is concerned only one thing can transpire to make an increase in the price of films probable and the manufacturers will have no control over it should the event occur. He referred to raw materials and other supplies for which the manufacturers are dependent upon others. There are reports now that the supply of certain chemicals which are derived solely from importation is running low. These chemicals are indispensible and are extensively used. If the prices of them should be raised it would materially affect the cost of production and the manufacturers would not be able to shoulder this deficit with the other losses. "But," said the manufacturer, "this entire situation is subject to the length of time it will take to re-establish commerce with the foreign countries. Perhaps it would be more correct to say the time that will be required to re-establish peace, because many of the chemicals referred to come from the countries now actually fighting and the resumption of steamship traffic under the United States, or any other flag, could afford no relief if the supplies needed could not be brought over by them. The exhibitors here may rest assured that the manufacturers will not raise the prices on their films if they can help it. It will disturb the market, and that cannot be afforded now. The present margin of profit to manufacturers is so small that all trade now held must be closely guarded and every attention possible given to avoid clashes with the exhibitors."

A gentleman acquainted with the sources for chemicals and other supplies said the abnormal growth of the motion picture business has made it a difficult matter for the importers to keep up with the demand even under normal conditions and they are uneasy over the present situation. He said the importers will have but one alternative if the war promises to continue much longer and that will be to apply the supply now in this country to pending contracts and decline orders from those who have not got them tied up. The informant also said the talk about increased prices was not worthy of serious consideration. In the first place, he said, the demand of the past has been so great that the importers have not been able to accumulate sufficient stock to enable them to dictate prices. They will be fortunate to meet current contracts with what they now have. There is no surplus for market manipulation. You can depend upon that.

Summarizing all the opinions it would seem that the exhibitors need have no fear that the price of films will be raised. But if the statements regarding chemicals and other supplies are correct it is not improbable that a prolonging of the war on the other side will have a different, undesirable effect upon the entire film business. If certain supplies are wholly dependent upon importations and the stock in this country becomes exhausted it will necessarily mean a cessation of studio operations. New films will not be forthcoming and first runs will be suspended. This was discussed a few nights ago and a film exchange man ridiculed suggestions in that direction. He declared that all large manufacturers are stocked months ahead. But a better informed member of the party interjected the statement that if any company is stocked months ahead the supply is in negative form only, and they are worthless if materials cannot be procured to make positives from them.

"Oh, piffle!" exclaimed an old-time exhibitor. "Why worry? There are no more reasourceful men in the world than the moving picture makers and there has been no obstacle in the past they have not surmounted. I have heard a lot of this talk before and have been told that the supplies spoken of can be procured elsewhere, but the importations are preferable."

Developments of the past few days show that, aside from possible effects of the great war as already outlined, the motion picture season of 1914-1915 promises to be the best in the history of the business. New and enlarged picture houses are being opened throughout the country. The movement in this direction makes it impossible to keep track of all the new ventures. Many houses are changing to new owners, but in every instance there is evidence of increased capital and extension in building operations. The new houses exceed these in number. One list published during the past week shows that in the South and West alone over sixty new houses were opened and there were over forty remodeled places. Another encouraging feature for the coming season is a promise that the exhibitors will suffer less annoyance from the censorship barnacle. It is stated upon what appears to be indisputable authority that the Federal censorship movement is enjoying profound slumber and in other quarters the agitators are showing a disposition to adopt a more safe and sane policy. It is confidently stated that during the past few weeks the motion picture interests have succeeded in demonstrating to the agitators and those upon whom they have been depending for support that on a "show down" the agitators can be beaten on their own arguments. One exhibitor attended a meeting of ministers and members of their congregations, a gathering of about two thousand people, and publicly offered $500 to the gathering, or any charity it might suggest, if a committee to be appointed by the meeting would find an immoral picture on any screen in the city. The challenge was not accepted, nor did the gathering adopt the measures it intended.

"That is the kind of campaigning that counts," said the exhibitor. "Money talks. I could have stood talking on that platform all night and not bring those people to me. There were business people in that audience and I put the figure to a point that convinced them as business men that I knew what I was talking about. I pledge my word of honor, I did not know what pictures were being shown in that city that night. I only reached the city a short time before I went to the meeting. But I had faith in the desire of the exhibitors to voluntarily do what these people were trying to make a subject of legislation."

A story is unofficially told of a clergyman of this city calling upon Commissioner of Licenses Bell for the purpose of getting him to accept as conclusive censorship reports on visits made to theaters by the clergyman and a voluntary committee. The Commissioner said the reports would be accepted under the same ruling governing the reports of other inspectors. They would be subject to confirmation by the National Board of Censorship.

Report comes to hand that nothing but the hot weather has interfered with the proposed amalgamation of the Associations of exhibitors. The movement is progressing slowly, but surely, and all will be united within a few weeks. "We are practically working together now," said the informant.

Reserved Seats.

PERHAPS you "know" that your patrons do not want reserved seats, but remember that very lately there has been a war panic and lots of people may now perhaps prefer the photoplay theater to the regular dramatic house, and these are the ones who would most surely appreciate seats reserved in advance. More than that, in some sections the presentation of big subjects at regular prices and with reserved seats have given "the habit" to many who might continue as patrons of the regular photoplay theater if only they could know before they started that they would get good seats. Just the other night we sat in a restaurant in a suburban town and it was the vote of the party that there was no use going to see the pictures as the second show had already started and probably the seats were all gone and assuredly the best seats were.

Perhaps you have experimented with reserved seats and have lost out, but why not try again and this time remember that the people who do not now come are the ones most likely to appreciate the advance reservation. Get five hundred postals printed up so that they can be checked and returned to you. Enclose these in a form letter that reads something like this:

> Will you be good enough to assist us in solving the problem of reserved seats at the Grand Theater by checking the enclosed post card?
> We believe that many desirable patrons are deprived of this increasingly interesting form of entertainment because they are unwilling to engage in a scramble for seats or take chances of standing up.
> We want to know what you think about it.
> The card might read:
> I favor the reservation of seats at a slight increase in price.
> I am not in favor of reserved seats.
> I am not interested either way.
> Note—If you wish to be specially advised of a change to a reserved section, please fill in your name and address or telephone number.

Take a house vote of your patrons, working the campaign with votes and lantern slides. If you can sell your ten-cent seats for fifteen cents or a quarter and at the same time oblige your patrons, why not do it? Reserve only a few of the best seats at first, increasing the reserved space as the demand grows—and watch it grow.

That Friend Pass Again.

The Western manager recently referred to as issuing a Friend Pass on the nights his competitor offers features comes back with a few remarks on friend passes of his own. He writes:

> I note in your July 25th number that my worthy competitor has been kind enough to mail you a copy of my "Friend Pass" and informed you that I used it on his feature nights. This is a misstatement on his part. The pass was used in a legitimate manner, i. e., to secure a mailing list. The validity of the passes were arranged so that about fifty of them could be taken up each night for a period of two weeks. At the end of that time they were discontinued and never used again.
> The enclosed ¼ sheet will show you that I am a great believer in high admission prices. I have never run a five reel picture for less than twenty cents except matinees, until I ran Monte Christo and my reason for that was on account of the poor condition of the film.
> While I am using my best efforts to educate the people to pay better prices, he not only gives the kids a coupon on an auto, but gives everybody who attend his theater on Friday (my feature night) and Saturday nights a ticket that will admit them free to his Second theater.
> When I opened here I charged ten cents straight, but was forced to drop to five and ten cents on account of him issuing an interchangeable coupon good for five cents in either of his theaters. From three reels he jumped to four after giving me his word that he would stick to three if I would open with three reels.
> I don't expect you to publish this, I just wanted you to know that there is one man in the business who has never cut prices in the eight years of his experience and never will if he has to buy a pick and shovel and go to work on the streets.
> Some day when the weather is not so warm, I will slip you some dope for your page, until that time, I remain with best wishes.

The letter is clean cut and straightforward and we are glad that it treats the matter frankly. Evidently things are in a pretty mess in that town, but the friend pass was not one of the troubles. The writer also sends a weekly poster program showing a full week of specials with prices ten cents some nights and ten and twenty others. This was a week prior to the publication of the comment. This does not, however, alter the fact that in some sections of the country this cut throat business is being done right along.

Adds to the Prize.

You know all about the $10,000 prize offered for the best solution of the Million Dollar Mystery. Using precisely the same rules, except that the stipulation is made that the contestant must be a resident of the city or its suburbs, C. W. Johnston, of the Miller Park theater, Franklin, Pa., has added $100 to the prize. He later writes that it drew 2,000 to the theater for the first instalment. He has some of the heralds left and will be glad to send these to those who enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Free Tickets.

The Dixie theater, Paris, Tenn., is sending out postcards with this message. It is a private card slightly larger than the regulation size with two tickets printed at the left side. These are to be torn off and presented at the door. The rest of the card reads:

Season 1914-15 Road Shows, Photoplays

DIXIE THEATRE

O. C. Jackson, Manager.

Drawing Population 7,000 Seating Capacity 900

Paris, Tenn., 1914.

Dear friend:

The managers of the Dixie theater, verging upon our fifth season, being grateful for the patronage and loyalty of yourself and friends to our amusement enterprise, take this opportunity to show our appreciation for past courtesies by giving you two free tickets to the theatre, which are attached to this card.

Simply break them loose, and we hope you will find as much pleasure in using them as we do in presenting them to you.

Thanking you again for your liberal patronage in the past and hoping for a continuance of the friendship for our theater, we remain,

Very truly yours,

O. C. JACKSON,

Manager Dixie Theater.

On the back of the coupons an advertisement for a drug store suggests that the printing paid for itself. The store advertisement carries the best line on the whole piece, announcing itself as

The Cool Place

With the Warm Welcome.

This is a line that would be good for the theater itself.

Here's More De Subersisms.

Harry de Subers has been rather quiet of late, but he is still thinking and he rolls in with some new hints that are as worth while as his catchlines. We wrote him we missed the catchlines, but he has not taken the hint as yet, but if you learn to use this stunt and use it right, you'll call him blessed forever more. It is simple and most effective. It might be added that in hot weather it is customary to use more glue if the composition is too soft and to use more glycerine in cold weather. If some of you will be good enough to send in photographs of the results, we'll be glad to use them. Now Mr. de Subers has the floor:

> Procure a sheet of glass of the size the finished sign is to be; then make a frame of laths or light wood one-half inch high which fits exactly around the sheet of glass.
> Place the glass on a flat surface and cover it to the thickness of one-fourth inch with putty, smoothing it down until it is perfectly level all over the plate. Then with a small, sharp-pointed knife cut out the letters which you wish to appear on the sign, cutting entirely through the putty and exposing the glass. If the glass is wet with clean water before the putty is placed on it, the letters will be easy to remove after cutting out.
> Having thus cut out the sign in the putty, place the frame of lathe around the glass and fill level with printer's roller composition, made as follows:
> Melt three pounds common brown sugar and eight pounds glue together, stirring constantly. Then add one-half pint of glycerine and stir well. The glue is softened before melting by soaking in water, using about one-half pint to the pound of glue. After the glue is softened, place on the fire; stir until melted; then add the sugar, and, when this is dissolved add the glycerine.
> Let the composition remain on the mold for from 10 to 24 hours, or until it sets. Then remove, being careful not to tear it in the process. You will now have what resembles a mammoth rubber stamp, and something which will answer the same purposes, except that it will not last as long.
> Now make a roller by cutting a round stick of the proper diameter that the stamp will exactly cover it to the proper length, and fasten the stamp around it with glue. Drive a nail in the center of each end, and fit a stiff wire handle, and the stamp is ready for use.
> In using either paint, printer's ink or some similar composition it is distributed smoothly on a slate or piece of glass, the roller is passed over it until well covered with the mixture, and then rolled once over the surface where the sign is to appear. It will print on almost any surface, such as a fence, cement walks, walls, side of buildings, or practically anywhere that space large enough for a sign can be found. If done in oil, they will last indefinitely.

By the use of this simple process a boy can put up several hundred sign ads in a day.

If some of the live wire exhibitors try this out many other ideas (uses) of the process may suggest themselves.

A No-Poster Lobby.

Some time ago we alluded to the fact that Harold and Helen Ballou, of the Olympian theater, Seattle, used no programs in front of their house. We expressed a desire to see a photo of the house and so here it is. Give it the once over and then go look at your own lobby. Which looks more like a regular theater? Mr. Ballou says: "Our audiences do not seem to want them and we believe that they are too intelligent to be influenced by meaningless pictures of lurid hue."

We think that Mr. Ballou has the right idea for a man in a clean residential section. The exhibitor is too apt to make his house look like a traveling dime museum. That is all right in a cheap locality, but for the better class of houses it pays to let the suggestion of class start with the lobby and not inside where it cannot be seen by the passer by. Personally we think it is a treat to see a front like this even in photographs. We were over in Philadelphia a few days ago and there the paper is smeared all over the house fronts and there is a place that runs eighteen reels a day.

A Postcard Plea.

The Queen theater, Dallas, Texas, is sending out Kraus postcards of Francis X. Bushman and in script type this appeal:

> Dear Friend: Of course you know that Francis X. Bushman was selected by an overwhelming majority to play the role of John Delancy Curtis in "One Wonderful Night," the great contest story published in The Ladies World. This great picture will be shown at The Queen Theater, Thursday and Friday, July 23d and 24th, and I shall look forward to seeing you there.
> as ever, STUART.

This goes through the mails to the list and forms an effective advertisement; more effective than any cheap looking herald could be for such an attraction with the Queen patronage.

Vest Pocket Size.

Harper D. Canaday, of the Beauty theater, New York City, issues a vest pocket weekly program that looks well and does not cost much. It is on cheap stock about 3 by 3¾, with merely the titles of the headlines. It is inexpensive and yet sufficiently good to be carried around, and it is well printed, the big features being in bold type and the secondary features running in capitals. Each program is properly dated and a change of color also marks the different dates.

Is Montgomery Crazy?

This isn't a suggestion that the Jacksonville amusement hustler is next door to the madhouse, it is merely a quotation from one of the striking advertisements he is running just now.

All over the country people are complaining of bad business in and out of the theater, despite the carefully culled reports from some few optimists, but Montgomery doesn't mind a little thing like that. Hit Montgomery with a chunk of bad business and he'll hit back and win out. Six tickets to New York and return by the Clyde line was one of his baits, and the tango is another, starting with a Castle graduate and continuing with a duo of local dancers. He is putting in a bigger show and the better class amateurs until you'd be foolish to stay home. This extract from a clipping will help to tell his policy:

> A few days ago I offered through this paper an argument to show that this city is today in a better condition than some of our business men who do more business on the corners than in their offices would lead us to believe. I made my entry in business here four years ago, the first day I was in town I went to a certain amusement man and asked the question, how is business? He replied that Jax was a dandy winter town, but no good in summer. I replied to him that
> The people who live here PERMANENTLY rightfully demand more for their money than the tourist who remains here only a short time.
> I cited the fact that during the summer the hotels must reduce their rates, and all others seeking the dimes or dollars must cater more to the whims of the fickle public, and that if he would give a better performance I thought he would make money by doing so, he replied that no one could prosper here after the tourists wend their way homeward. This attitude on his part made me more positive than ever that here was the right spot for me. After having purchased a theater from a man who thought that very year Jacksonville would go to the eternal bow-wows, I determined that the citizens of Jacksonville would always be my first thought, and to cater to them more than to the tourist would be my aim, with a result that every summer I strengthen up my show and make it look good to the "residenter," and the result is that I find the business entirely satisfactory in the real hot months of summer. My motto is, and always has been
> GIVE YOUR VERY BEST BARGAINS TO THOSE WHO PATRONIZE YOU CONTINUALLY.

But no clippings are going to give the whole of the Montgomery secret. The secret is that he is no quitter. If people will not buy his already good show, he makes it better. Then he talks to them. He does not lie down and let out a yelp that suggests that he found that the headache tablets were really bichloride of mercury. He dusts out and makes business good and he is so busy getting people in that he has no time for worrying. He does not cut down his advertising and his show. He builds the show up and then uses more advertising to tell about it, and he turns impending loss into actual profit. Not only that, but on special days he is opening at 10 o'clock in the morning to get them all in. The Montgomery plan is a good plan to follow. Why not try it?

Works the Auto.

We have had the cycle advertisement, but Swan and Schwartz, of the Crescent theater, Kearney, Neb., send in a photograph of an automobile float, that requires no amplification of their simple explanation. The float is decidedly useful in a small town where the whole place may be covered by this simple means in a short time. They write:

> Thinking that our ideas of advertising the "Lucile Love" series is something pretty good I am sending you a photo showing our float. This float measures 14 feet long by 6 feet wide and is placed on an Overland Roadster Auto. It is covered on all sides, leaving two small holes in the front to guide the machine. Each Monday evening at 6 p. m. we start and go all over the city, at the same time using a megaphone or some noise instrument to call their attention. We have used megaphone, Klaxon Electric Auto Horn and Ardmore Chime Horn, all which we have found to be winners. This float advertising has any kind of advertising proposition beat that we have ever tried and our Monday nights business has increased to more than double. After making all streets in the city we return to the theater and allow the car and float to stand near the curb in front of the theater, which seems to attract many transients. Would advise other exhibitors to try this advertising and I think they will agree with us that it can't be beat.
> As we are a Life subscriber to the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and take great interest in the "Advertising for Exhibitors" column I am in hopes that the above may be of some benefit to exhibitors who have not thought of this idea.

Not Complete.

The Vaudette theater, West Point, Ga., advertises Victor's "The Coryphee" with the bracketed explanation "Meaning a dancer." A coryphee is a chorus dancer; one of the mass of dancers as distinguished from the solo dancers and the seconds, or second dancers, dancers above the chorus rank but not sufficiently advanced for solo work. The full definition would have been better. They still adhere to their three-a-week issue. It is costly, but always fresh.

Clean Cut.

The Montgomery theater, Atlanta, is issuing a neat program of eight pages. Most of it is given to current attractions, but they use one page to pull up some house feature. Only the features are treated save in the formal program where the bill for the week is run. More house talk would be effective, but the present appearance of the sheet is excellent, and it is growing better.

Inquest Club Call.

Members of the New York Inquest Club will please send a self addressed post card to the Coroner at once if they wish to be notified of the first meeting. Those who were not members last season, but who wish to join should also send cards if they wish to be present at the opening meeting of the season, addressing The Inquest Club, Box 70, Madison Square Station, New York City.

Mystery vs. Explanation.

To judge from letters received, nothing puzzles writers more than to know just how far to expose the story to the spectator. Some technical experts advise that the exposure be held to the climax as a surprise, but we personally hold that exposition of the mystery is, as a rule, the better plan.

Coming as a surprise, the fact that the will is in the old clock may give one dramatic moment. But if we have seen the father put the will into the clock just before the director told him to die, many dramatic points may be made, the villain may seem to be on the right track and we will be afraid that he and not the hero will get it. If we have no more knowledge of the fact than the Villain, the fact that he looks at the clock does not interest us any more than his examination of the stove, but if we know the will is there, then the situation becomes a crisis. Now if the hero almost finds the will, we get a second crisis, and when the house is to be sold at auction and some one else almost buys the clock there is a third crisis. A fourth comes when the hero buys the clock for the heroine because she is so fond of it and the climax comes when she finds the will in the clock. Instead of one dramatic moment there are five of them, and we are not stopped just before the climax to be told that "John finds the will in the old clock."

It is much the same way in a comedy. If a man kicks a hat and finds a brick inside it is funny, but if we seek the brick put in, we start to laugh the moment he starts to kick instead of waiting until after the kick to see the brick. There are exceptions to this rule, of course, but it is best to explain things as a rule, in advance of the demonstration.

No Worse.

If you were riding in a street car and it should leave the tracks and endeavor to turn into an elevator by climbing up the side of a building, you would think it just a little bit strange, wouldn't you? But, if you leave John Smith sick abed in New York, in the next scene show him well and in a western mining camp, you complain if the story is turned back because it is illogical.

Maybe you never made this particular break, but it is a certainty that you do things just as crude, and all because you do not study your script properly. You read the script in a hurry and each time John makes the great leap your brain supplies the explanation that John went west to forget Ethel. You may read it fifty times, and each time the same thing happens, your mind covers the jump. But the editor is going to read the story. He doesn't know why John went west. He may think it is because John is afraid that New York is going to be hit by some badly-aimed shells intended for some European country.

If you started to pick up a chain and there were a dozen links missing, you would know something was wrong, but if you put back the links you could pick up the whole chain. You cannot put in the links of the chain by any purely mental process. You can put in mental links in your story that makes the script a whole chain. Study carefully to see if it is a whole chain or whether it has a number of mental links. The best way is to stop at the end of each scene and earnestly question yourself as to whether the scene mates with those ahead and matches with those that follow, or not. You can do it in time. It takes training like all other things in photoplay, but it can be done with practice.

A Good Creed.

This is the article of faith of a Texan starter. With this for a creed it seems as though she cannot help find success.

> I have my standard up very high as to plot work, not wanting to use any kind of a plot which had "ready-made" punch, or supposedly "ready-made" punch, such as fires, train wrecks, robberies, murders, etc. Therefore, as I have had such little experience, my plots may not be worked up strong enough. Then, too, the punch which is evolved, requires fine workmanship in plot of action, which I well understand also requires much practice and study before it can be mastered in a sufficient degree to make the scripts salable. Therefore, it all resolves itself into one issue—I must do more work and harder work.

She adds: That it is her honest opinion that even in her recent stage of advancement she could write a script trusting to some mechanical punch such as a fire or train wreck and get away with it, but she wants to write a story and not merely bolster up an ailing plot with a mechanical punch. That should be made a part of the creed.

Kell on Adaptation.

John William Kellette has been working for the Whitman company making book adaptations. He announced he did not like it and was asked to give his reasons. These are the reasons:

> I might answer like any other old woman and say "because," but that wouldn't be answering your question and it would leave a lot to the imagination.
> One reason, and perhaps the greatest reason, is because one is given a book to dramatize and told to get all there is in it out and to follow it closely. Then, if the dramatic element is missing and the one who wants the adaptation made goes in for melodrama and the book lacks that feature, the writer is blamed for a poor script.
> Another reason is that sometimes those who pass on scripts know less about the picture from reading the script than the author does, and cannot visualize the action. Then the writer has to read and explain the business so that a child could understand it. Then, again, all books do not make good photoplays.
> Recently I made a four reel adaptation of a book and after the script was read and wrecked trains, sunken steamers, burned bridges and a few murders were found missing, I was told that if the book didn't have them TO PUT THEM IN.
> That would not be an adaptation of the book. It would be taking the title and trying to trade on the reputation the book made for the advertising value.
> There is considerable work involved in making adaptations that seem to be overlooked. One must read the book to become thoroughly familiar with it. The writer of the book may have rambled several times around the world and introduced business that would be almost impossible of accomplishment, and one might find a paragraph in the rear of the book that might have to be the opening scene of the photoplay. Then the adaptor must collect all this business into one thread of continuity, cull out the unimportant matter, cut out characters that "clog" the action and whip the "meat" of the story into shape. In one book I found 81 characters that had a direct bearing upon the story, and more than two hundred others who filled in as guests, servants, etc. It would have been impossible to use every person named in the book. The cast had to be cut down so that four persons carried the story and nine in all had a bearing to the action. The adaptor is seldom pleased with his work after it is done, and it takes several days longer to produce a four reel story from a book than it does a four reel original. I like to work on big stories in two or three reels and can make greater headway on original work. The really big stories in books have either all been done or are being held in reserve for future production, and unless a company is willing to take up a book that would make a good photoplay in the original, it would be better to give the author carte blanche to produce something original. He is apt to get a better story. Unless one is capable of writing good two reel stories they'd better steer clear of adaptations.

It's a thankless sort of job at best. If you do a good job it's the author. If it's a poor job you're to blame, and after it is all over, the best you get is the reflection that you are only a dealer in second hand junk. If you are competent to adapt a book, you are capable of doing even better original work.

Have You Bad Habits?

Have you had writing tricks? Not long since we looked over a number of scripts and told the writer that his connection was poor. He did not think so, but to his surprise we proved it on him. He has been writing for two years and never realized that his scenes did not track. Perhaps there is something like that to hold you back in your work. Look over the stuff carefully and critically. You'll perhaps find faults that need to be corrected.

Sticking to the Story.

Once more let's chat about sticking to the story. In the first place get a good plot, then stick to it. If this is the story of how John wins Mary to be his very own forever and forever, stick to the winning of Mary. We know at least one man (and he knows who we mean) who would start out to have John win Mary. Then he would shoot off at a tangent and have the life insurance company cancel John's policy because he was found to have housemaid's knee. Next he would have Mary's great aunt's first cousin die of infantile paralysis at the early age of seventy-nine. Perhaps to make it more interesting he would have Niagara Falls run uphill every alternate half hour. None of these things would have the slightest bearing on the winning of Mary. John would have enough without the insurance money, the Great Aunt's first cousin would leave Mary nothing and neither of them would be within a hundred miles of Niagara Falls, but all this junk would go in "to make the story more interesting." And when we pointed these, or similar, things out to our erring friend, he got nasty and came back with the suggestion that there were a few scenes in Hamlet in which Hamlet himself did not appear and, inferentially at least, suggested that we go where Shakespeare is and argue with him. And he knew blamed well that Bill Shakespeare was no member of the Salvation Army, either.

This was all beginning the point. The point we sought to make with him—and this goes for you, too, was that having started to tell of the courtship of Mary, he should have stuck to this and not have wandered afield. Hamlet is not really the story of Hamlet and Hamlet is not needed in every scene. That is where the author of the Mary story went astray. He does not know just what his story is, so he cannot stick to it. Hamlet is the story of how that Danish prince avenged the murder of his father. Every point in the entire play deals with this one point. It is not the story of Hamlet, but the story of Hamlet avenging his father's wrongs and all that follows is the result of that vengeance. In the same way the courtship of Mary might present many points that, for the moment, did not seem to have any bearing on the courtship. If Mary had expected to marry on the money her Great Aunt's first cousin was going to leave her, then the death of that cousin would have had a bearing on the story. If Mary had been marrying John for his life insurance, the withdrawal of that insurance would have had a direct bearing on the story, even though it might have raised scenes in the insurance office in which neither John nor Mary appeared.

The point is that with one or two reels, if you have a real story you do not need to pad, and any effort to bring in extraneous matter is merely clogging the story and detracting from the interest without advancing the plot in the least.

Find out just what your story is. Tell that story and nothing else, and you will at least have centered the interest, but if you try to tell half a dozen stories about half a dozen people and things, you will find that no part of the sectional story is in the least interesting.

A Wrinkle.

William Henry Kitchell, perhaps embittered by the fact that the Newark team is way down in the second division, sends us a dirty- looking sheet of paper and a reproach. The reproach is based on the fact that, following our advice, he bought a full ream of paper at one time and now that he has used a couple of cut reams the rest is discolored around the edges.

We bought a hundred pounds of paper the other day. One of the first things we did was to put it in boxes. The next was to wrap each box in stout paper, pasting down the paper until the package was dust-proof, light-proof and most anything else-proof. Paper, if left out or loosely wrapped is bound to be discolored, but we have some paper that has been kept a year or more and that is as fresh as the day it came out of the shop. Cut the wrapping paper so that it fits snugly. Paste down the main seam, then at the ends paste each fold as you make it, and you can keep the paper for a couple of years if you want to.

Conviction.

If you were a particularly clever modeler and could make a clay apple very like the real thing, you would not paint it purple with green polka dots, wouldn't you? But sometimes you'll write a good play and paint it up with the polka dots of improbability.

It is irritating sometimes to get interested in the manly hero, a clean-cut, finely-drawn character, and along the seven hundredth foot have him do something that no human being either would or could do, just to make it more exciting. Keep your hero and heroine human beings and not demigods. It is all right in travesty to have the hero kick a safe out of the way and push the wall of a building out, but in straight drama give your people things to do that they can do, and do not ask the director to make them perform the impossible. The line between travesty and tense drama is so slight that you are more than apt to turn your tragedy into farce if you lay it on too thick.

Story Suggestions.

Saturday afternoon an acquaintance almost got in a scrap with us because we would not take a story he suggested. It was printed in a magazine published in a foreign country and the magazine went out of business in 1840. He was certain we could copy it off and get a lot of money for it.

He meant well, evidently, but there was no use telling him that we knew three later and better pointed stories along precisely the same lines. That's how some beginners get into trouble. They are given a story tip by some friend who carefully refrains from explaining that he got it out of a magazine or book. The plot is slightly changed, if altered at all, and is sent out. Some editor who knows his business sends it back and marks that writer down as a person to keep away from. Few beginners have a very wide familiarity with plots and, while they are the ones who should be most cautious, generally they are the ones who most eagerly grasp at new ideas.

Be suspicious of everything you get for nothing, and not too trustful about what you pay for.

Plotting Practically.

Suppose you and Bill Smith and Tom Jones were walking down the street together and saw a man struck by an auto and killed. Suppose further, that, without saying anything, all three of you went home and wrote the story up. Still supposing, here is your story:

Ethelbert Marlande loves Eunice Phillpoteaux. She flirts with him and, though she loves him, makes his life miserable. He finally corners her and proposes. She rejects him, not because she does not love him, but because she wants to keep him dangling. He goes out, gets hit amidships by an automobile and is killed. She never smiles again.

That's a corking little story and all suggested by seeing the man killed. It's going to bring some poor but deserving actor some black and blue spots, being struck amidships, but that is for the actor to worry about, not you.

Let's see what Bill wrote. His story is a little different.

Sam Cook, a poor but honest inventor, goes to see Silas Gregg about selling his latest invention. He is knocked down by an auto and is taken to the hospital unconscious. When he wakes his mind is a blank. The rascally surgeon steals his plans and makes a fortune, while poor Sam is given a job as orderly in the hospital. Ten years later there is a young interne who loves Muriel Cook. Muriel visits him in the hospital and feels strangely attracted to the poor old orderly. Just to humor her the young interne devises a new operation for removing the pressure from the orderly's brain. The man's memory returns and he gets after the first surgeon, makes him return the profits of the stolen invention and the interne marries the daughter.

We hate to hurt your feelings, but this story is a little better. Of course the fractured skull and the loss of memory and the operation and the restoration of memory are old, but there is a slightly newer touch. Still it is not without an element of newness. Let's steal a look at Tom's synopsis. Look at this:

Henry Hoyt falls in love with the beautiful daughter of Jimpson Sprague. He cannot make her acquaintance, so he plans to be knocked down in front of her house, expecting to be carried in and nursed back to health by her tender hands. He bribes an auto driver to do the bumping. It doesn't work quite as well as planned. Henry gets bumped, but the best he gets from Sprague is the advice to hire a good lawyer, the auto driver is arrested and has to confess to save himself from losing his license and Henry cannot even collect the accident policy he thoughtfully took out, but is kicked out of the office for a faker just as the beautiful Muriel is passing and she laughs so hard that love dies right there.

Which of the three stories do you think would be the most likely to sell, and why?

Cheap.

The schools have a new trick. They send their circulars to all those who advertise in the city papers for situations. To be definite, we have an advertisement of a Washington fake sent in reply to an advertisement in the Philadelphia Inquirer. It stands to reason that those out of employment are most likely to jump at the glowing promises of the schools. It stands equally to reason that those out of employment are the least well able to lose the fees sent. It is contemptible.

Inquiries

NOTICE.

Inquiries will be replied to by mail where a stamped and self addressed envelope accompanies the inquiry. Inquiries will be replied to through the paper, if requested, but there may be a delay of several weeks. Inquiries should be addressed to this department. Requests for address slips should be addressed to the paper direct and not to this department.

E. C.—Miss Turner is working in England, heading her own company.

MAORI.—There are too many ways of making animated drawings to be catalogued here. The simplest way is merely to add a little to the picture after each successive single exposure. Some of the moving cartoons are combinations of still pictures and jointed figures. The Biograph company controls the patents on the picture booklets. The last we saw were some sent out by the M. P. Sales Agency, London. You might query B. Nichols.

B. R.—We do not know where Mr. Mason is at the moment.

S. N.—We do not know the company mentioned. It is not advisable to price scripts. Try Mutual and N. Y. M. P. Co with synopses.

A. S. H.—We cannot tell you where you can see the releases.

R. G. B.—No company is much interested in one-character scripts. They have been done, but there is seldom any demand for them Write for the one you have out, and after this do not submit to directors or players but to the company direct. You are on for that dinner. The address is correct. Vitagraph, Essanay, and we believe Kalem have given one-reel one-character plays. Lubin did a two-reel one-character stunt. None have repeated the performance. That seems to be the answer.

J. R. M.—The stories of the films (not reviews) are supplied by the companies. Sometimes they are taken from the films and sometimes they are not. We have no way of knowing. It is helpful to the writer to study these stories and see what the companies are doing and about how much story makes a reel.

H. McD.—Any scene taken indoors is an interior. A scene taken outdoors is an exterior. It is to be presumed that a man at a desk telephoning is indoors. At least you do not ask how many scenes make a reel, but the length of time it takes you to read a synopsis has absolutely nothing to do with the length of the produced script. A synopsis of a reel may be condensed to three lines or expanded to three pages without affecting the length of the film. We do not remember the script well enough to answer the next question definitely, but it is to be presumed that the camera had to be moved between scenes 18 and 19. It's the same street, but a different part of the street and hence a new scene. There is no market for "amateur" scripts. The "amateur" is merely a man working to get into the professional class and trying his luck in between.

E. M. S.—If you do not write a script you are not entitled to credit for the work. You might ask to be given credit for the idea, but until you can write a script all by yourself you are not in any position to "demand" credit.

R. E.—Charles Chaplin was Mabel's husband in Mabel's Married Life. Mr. Sennet appears in a picture occasionally, but does not seem to have the habit.

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Carbons Galore.

THE editor of the department very early in the war scare realized the seriousness of the situation with regard to carbons, almost the entire supply of which came from Germany.

The National Carbon Company of Cleveland, Ohio, had long ago practically given up the manufacture of projection carbons. The National, however, was the only straw the American exhibitors could grasp at in the present situation. We, therefore, wrote the National Carbon Company, and herewith print, in full, their relpy.

Cleveland, Ohio, August 26, 1914.

Mr. F. H. Richardson, Editor Projection Dept., Moving Picture World, New York City.

Dear Sir—Please refer to your letter of August 11th relative to the moving picture carbon situation, and accept our apology for delay in answering the same. Events have moved so rapidly the last two weeks that we hardly knew where we stood or what to say to you, consequently the matter has been held in the hope that conditions would enable us to give you something definite.

As you probably know, we have not been doing much in the moving picture carbon field, due to several causes, but it is perhaps useless to discuss them just at this time. Suffice it to say that we had practically no stock when the foreign supply was cut off—about enough perhaps to supply a few regular customers who have been using our carbons for a long time. We immediately began preparations to enlarge our facilities, and we are hoping to have a sufficient stock to supply the moving picture industry in this country all the carbons they want within a very few weeks.

In the meantime, it is our purpose to ship out in small quantities not over one or two hundred at a time, to such shows as are actually in danger of closing their doors. Naturally, there is considerable stock scattered over the country, and if same were distributed equally among the shows who are shorthanded there would be enough to keep them going for at least three or four weeks. Unfortunately, this condition does not exist, and there will be, within the next ten days, hundreds of shows down to their last carbon. It is this class of trade that we are particularly interested in now, and have within the past week sent out notices to all theaters that we would ship a limited number of carbons to keep them going in case their stock was practically exhausted. By the time we get these taken care of we are hoping to have a stock sufficiently large to justify general distribution. Under the circumstances, we have felt this is the best plan, but if you have any suggestion to make in the matter we will be very glad to hear from you.

In the meantime, you can tell your friends if they are actually needing carbons to keep their machines going we can supply them one to two hundred immediately upon receipt of their order.

Yours very truly,
NATIONAL CARBON COMPANY.
J. F. Kerlin, Assistant Sales Manager.

LCH

P. S.—On account of the urgency of the demand, we are asking for cash with these small lots in order to save the time necessary for credit investigation.

This letter will take a load off the mind of thousands of exhibitors who have the past two or three weeks been wondering whether they would be able to keep their doors open or would have to close them, because of the lack of the humble but exceedingly important carbon. That fear is now removed, thanks to the National Carbon Company, and again all is quiet along the Potomac.

Important Notice.

IT is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps, (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply by mail, without delay.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 49.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permissions to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theatre managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

A wire having a cross section of 26,244 c. m., has a rated capacity of 46 amperes, r. c., and 65 weatherproof, whereas a wire having a cross section of 52,441 c. m., is only rated at 76 amperes, r. c., and 110 weatherproof. The area being practically double, why not the rated capacity also? How would you ascertain the diameter of a wire if you had no wire gauge? Has a wire a wattage capacity? How many watts could you convey with a No. 16 wire and keep within its rated capacity?

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 43 is a little more extensive, several of the brothers having contributed very good replies. It consists of Jos. H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada; Eugene A. Upstill, Lone Pine, Nebraska; James T. Cheney, El Centro, California; Harry H. Finney, New Orleans, Louisiana; Elmer W. Stites, Shelbyville, Indiana, and G. D. Bullock, Hobart, Indiana, and Sacramento, Calif. The reply of Brother Bullock has been selected as, everything considered, the best, but there were two other illustrations which will be included, one by Brother Smith, and one by Brother Stites. The reply of Sacramento was excellent, but came too late to receive consideration for publication.

Reply to Question No. 43.

By G. D. Bullock, Hobart, Ind.

The Question:

Would you recommend a belted or a direct connected engine and dynamo? Give reasons for your answer. How would you, in some simple, inexpensive, effective manner, deaden the engine exhaust, without creating any back pressure on the engine? What is back pressure, as applied to an engine? What is its effect? What is compression and its effect, and how is its amount changed?

The Answer:

I would advise a belt driven plant in preference to a direct connected. My reasons are as follows:

1. The average gas engine used in small lighting plants is four cycle, that is it has but one power stroke in four. Large fly wheels are needed to gain the momentum necessary to drive the unit at a constant speed under this condition and would tend to make a direct connected machine expensive in installation. Either a pit would be necessary for the engine or a pier for the dynamo.

2. A direct driven set would require either a high speed engine or a slow speed generator, either of which is considerably more expensive than those in common use. A ten h. p. engine generally drives from 300 to 400 R. P. M. and a generator from 750 to 1000. These common types can be used in a belt driven unit with correctly proportioned pulleys.

3. A high speed engine needs expert care and attention; a low speed only ordinary. Belt losses and troubles are minor factors.

Dig a well four feet in each dimension. In it build two terra cotta walls 4 x 5 inch checker-board style as shown in the sketch. Install exhausts as shown, then floor above the terra cotta and fill in the foot left with dirt. A 6 or 8 inch drain tile will make a splendid exhaust from your muffler to air. The sketch shows the action of the gas in the muffler. This muffler is easy to make, inexpensive and will allow free expansion of gas.

Back pressure as applied to engines in any pressure greater than atmospheric pressure on the exhaust side of the piston head. Its effect is to cause the piston to exert an energy equivalent to the back pressure in forcing the gas into the exhaust system, and this, of course, means loss of power, which loss will be in proportion to the amount of back pressure. Compression as compared to the gas engine is the forcing of mixed gasoline and air into a confined space by the cylinder head before ignition. Compression has two effects. It heats the mixture to a flash point and also confines it so that it becomes a high explosive. Like all explosives, when lighted it must expand, and the expansion forces the piston to the end of its stroke, thus imparting the power to the engine.

It may be remarked that all the other correspondents have recommended the direct connected sets. I would suggest to friend Bullock that, while what he says is perfectly correct, still a combination of a fairly high speed engine and a fairly low speed dynamo is practical and not at all prohibitive, either in expense of operation or first cost, moreover the direct connected set is much more compact and occupies considerable less floor space. Brother Bullock's exhaust muffler puzzled me for quite a bit. I could not quite make out what he was driving at, but the top view is the key to the thing. Just build two 12-inch walls of 4 x 3 inch hollow tile, or for that matter, I think any other moderate size tile would answer as well. Lay the top and bottom course of wall No. 1 with the tile pointing toward the side of the pit, and the center course with the tile pointing the other way, and in wall No. 2 just reverse this, unquestionably the muffler would be effective, but I am, nevertheless, of the opinion that a pit 4 feet square by say 6 feet deep, lined top, bottom and sides with concrete and with a reinforced concrete wall extending down its center to within 12 inches of the bottom would be just as effective, if not more so, and somewhat cheaper. The center wall should join with the concrete top and the engine exhaust should enter one side while the exhaust to the open air should come out of the top of the other side. There would be, to all intents and purposes no back pressure, in a muffler of this kind, and for that matter there would be none in a muffler of Brother Bullock's design. I have drawn my own idea in the corner besides Brother Bullock's, the two top and the lower left hand being his, and the lower right hand being my own. In addition I give a diagram by Brother Stites and Brother Smith, both of which ideas are excellent and either of which would prove effective though I believe Brother Smith's would create a little back pressure; but not much—perhaps none at all.

A part of brother Smith's reply reads as follows:

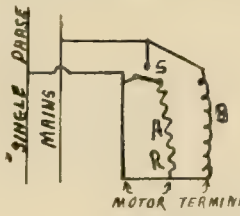
I would demand the single fly wheel type of engine for several reasons, viz.: (a) ready access to parts; (b) avoidance of the torsional strain to which the two-wheel crank is subject when starting and stopping; (c) avoidance of the peripheral resistance varying in one of the fly wheels while the other is subject to a strain in the opposite direction on account of inertia; (d) a great cyclic regularity, induce steadier light; (e) the coefficient of the variations in the speed of a single revolution will not be far from 1/60.

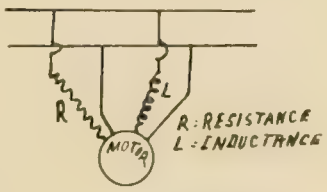
Brother Smith Also Comments on Question 37.

Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas, says:

I want to comment on that part of the answer to question 37 in which friend Upstill says you cannot use a two or three-phase motor on single phase. I differ with him. If you follow the two sketches you can readily grasp my view. Referring to sketch 1, A and B primary windings; R resistance; and S a single pole switch.

By this arrangement you can readily see that a two-phase motor will run on single phase. Taking diagram No. 2, which may also be readily understood, we have split the single phase so that the motor is supplied with two currents which differ in phase. Current in circuit B will lag behind that in A, and the motor will therefore be supplied with two currents suitable for starting. After the motor has attained speed, R and S may be cut out and the motor will then run on single phase. It is, however, more expensive than to run a two-phase motor on polyphase. Three-phase motors will run on single phase, but neither two or three-phase motors will start on single phase without splitting the phase.





All of which will no doubt hold Brother Upstill for an indefinite period. However, he need not feel so very badly about that, because the editor was himself under the impression that it would be impractical to run polyphase motors on single phase. Well, this merely illustrates the fact, which has often been stated in this department, that none of us are so exceedingly smart that we know it all. But, anyhow, I do not believe it would be advisable to operate two or three-phase motors on single phase, except as a temporary proposition in case of emergency.

What Does He Want to Know?

Centralia, Illinois, requisitions information as follows:

Kindly inform me with regard to motor drives. Am using 20 amperes of 110 volt a. c. current. I have your latest Handbook and have spent much time in studying it, but do not find anything concerning such motors. I would appreciate your opinion.

First, my beloved sir, you will have to give me something to pass an opinion on. This is a sample of one of the many very similar letters received. Ordinarily I can dope out the writer's idea—read his mind as it were, but in this case he's too much for me. Moreover, if the brother is only using 20 amperes of a. c. why I do not think there would be any large use in giving him instructions, because all he would get on the screen with 20 amperes would be a bunch of shadows, unless he is projecting a very small picture indeed. If the brother wants me to send him a description of the various motor drives, why great heavens it would take hours, if not days, to get that particular matter together, and it would take a couple of day's work on the part of a stenographer to transcribe the instructions. I would suggest that he write to the manufacturer of his projector and ask if they have any motor drive which can be attached to his machine, and if they have not, then let him write to W. G. Preddy, 669 Haight Street, San Francisco, California, for descriptive matter of his motor drive.

Operators Standing Up.

Recently the editor had occasion to criticise the operating room of New York's leading motion picture theater. Among other things he remarked that the observation ports were so high the operator could not see the picture when seated in operating position. The manager of that theater remarked that that particular criticism was puerile, because he never allowed his operators to sit down anyhow. This manager is unquestionably entitled to a great deal of credit for some of the things he has done. Beyond any question of a doubt when it comes to the picture on the screen he is a competent critic, and that is a great deal more than can be said of the majority of managers. He knows when the picture is as it should be, and, as a rule, demands that his operators put the picture on the screen in the best possible way. But he has not yet reached the point where he is willing to allow the operator to do this in comfort. In the theater in question the picture is placed on the screen under absolutely unnecessary difficulties, one of which is the standing up stunt.

The editor of this department, as he has stated many times, is a practical operator. He can take the projector in any operating room and put the picture on the screen in the best possible manner, but he could not and would not do this and stand up continuously during the entire performance. There is a big difference in men. Some men can do a thing of that kind; some men prefer to stand up, whereas others, the editor for instance, become absolutely worn out and fatigued if compelled to stand continuously on his feet for any extended period of time. If the editor were obliged to stand up continuously in an operating room for an hour he would be too weary to do good work, and at the end of two hours would be completely exhausted, and in no condition to put artistic work on the screen.

But, anyhow, with all due respect to the manager in question, to compel operators to stand up is pure, unadulterated piffle and nonsense. There is absolutely nothing to be gained by it, and there is considerable to be lost, taking men as they come. An operator is not in position to do high class work when he is tired out, and if standing on his feet does tire him out it operates to injure the work on the screen. And what is the objection to the operator sitting down? If the observation port is rightly made, so that it is adjustable as to height, there is absolutely no legitimate objection of any kind to it, except that in some theaters the operating room is so disgracefully small that one would almost have to use a shoe stretcher to introduce a chair, or even a stool. The time is not far distant, however, I hope and believe, when it will be difficult to get high class operators to work in one of these cracker boxes. The demand for high class men is going to exceed the supply, and the really high grade operator will not, in my opinion, have to work under conditions which are objectionable.

The New Baird Projector

The name of C. R. Baird has long been familiar to the users of parts for moving picture projectors and now Mr. Baird and his associates, Robert J. Emory and T. DeCoursey Ruth, have enlarged their scope and entered the field as inventors and manufacturers of a new projection machine, with offices at 24 East 23d street, New York City, and factory at 31 Runyon street, Newark, N. J. The name adopted is the Baird Motion Picture Machine Company. Viewing the Baird machine merely from the standpoint of massiveness, other projectors are but babes in arms. The machine stands 6½ feet in height, meaning by height from the floor to the top of the upper magazine. From the floor to the top of the lamp-house is approximately 5½ feet. Front and back the machine measures, at a guess, 5½ feet. The lamp-house is 1 ft. 9 ins. wide by 2 feet 3 inches in height by 8½ inches in width, not counting the extension of the lamp controls, which sticks out 8 inches farther. The upper magazine, made of aluminum castings, is 20 inches in diameter by 2⅞ deep and its sides and doors are a little more than ⅛ of an inch in thickness. The lower magazine is 20 inches in diameter, but it is a double affair 8½ inches thick, with a dividing partition 3 inches from the front, thus making two compartments, one 3 inches deep on the operating side and one 5¼ inches deep on the other side, this latter containing the motor and take-up, as shown in Fig. 1.

This lower magazine forms a part of the table. It is of cast metal ¼ inch in thickness and its top forms the foundation for the mechanism. The back portion of the table, which is one piece with the lower magazine casting, is in the form of an I beam 12½ inches deep, with top and bottom flanges 4 inches wide. The legs, four in number, are 2⅜ inches in diameter. They are clamped in heavy, massive cast clamps, and are adjustable, so that the projector can be set at any angle. The lamp-house has doors on either side, the same being 17½ inches wide by 24 inches in height. The top of the doors are arched. The lamp, Fig. 2, is both massive and at the same time very simple. It has every adjustment necessary to modern practice, and has them in excellent form. It seems to me that if the operator takes proper care of the Baird lamp he will have absolutely no excuse, so far as the lamp is concerned, for failure to deliver perfect results in screen illumination. The dowser handle can be seen in Fig. 1 just above the condenser casing, but the dowser itself is inside the lamp-house, where it comes down right up close to the condenser, thus not only cutting off the heat of the arc, but in measurable degree protecting the condensers from a sudden draught when the lamp-house door is open. The lamp with one trim will consume a 12-inch carbon above and an 8-inch carbon below, and still have room to spare. The condenser casing is excellent. It is hinged on the left side and may be swung open merely by raising a latch. The lenses themselves are so arranged that the distance between may be readily altered. They are held in separate holders made of aluminum, of sufficient weight to have, I believe, the necessary heat retaining qualities to prevent, at least in a large measure, condenser breakage. The handles of the switch controlling the motor and friction drive protrude through the casting in convenient positions.

The take up of the Baird machine is simple and efficient. It will handle 3,000 feet of film, maintaining an even tension from beginning to end. In effect its action is as follows: the back end of a long arm is seen hinged at X, Fig. 1. This is the rear end of the take-up arm, the front end of which (13, Fig. 4) carries the take-up belt pulley, upon the edge of which is a gear of equal diameter with the pulley. Two inches from the spindle of the belt pulley, back toward the center of the lever, is the center of the take-up spindle (15, Fig. 4), carrying the take-up reel, and upon this spindle is a small gear meshing with the gear attached to the belt pulley. Now, remembering that the arm carrying all this is hinged at X, Fig. 1, and extends into the motor compartment at the rear of the lower magazine, and that the take-up spindle extends through the partition into the film magazine where it carries the lower reel; remember also that the front end of this arm is entirely free and loose, except that it hangs in the take-up drive belt, which is flat and one-half inch wide, and having fixed all this in your mind, you will readily see that the pulling power of the belt will increase just exactly as the weight of the film wound on the lower reel increases and therefore the pull of the take-up belt will be light in the beginning of the reel and correspondingly heavy at the end—just exactly as it should be. I have watched the operation of this take-up in rewinding 3,000 feet of film, and the pull on the film was the same, or very nearly the same, from first to last.

The mechanism of the Baird is entirely enclosed in a heavy casing which is hinged and opens on either side, thus giving instant and free access to the entire machinery. Shutter, governor and vertical shafts are mounted on ball bearings. Framing is accomplished by switching the framing lever (Fig. 3) to the right or left, which has the effect of raising or lowering the entire mechanism, with the exception of the aperture plate, shutter and lens. The lens, shutter and aperture remain at all times in fixed relation to each other. The intermittent is a special star and cam, hardened and ground, running in an oil well, the front of which is made of glass (G, Fig. 4), so the operator can see just how much oil there is in the casing. The inventors claim that the proportions of the star and cam are such as to give a quicker movement and longer rest to the film than the ordinary type, but this claim I can neither affirm or deny. The tension shoes are in two sections, the upper being 2⅛ inches long, and the lower ¾ of an inch in length and the aperture plate is the combined length of the two sets of shoes. The opening from the aperture to the lens is entirely enclosed when the mechanism casing is shut. The shutter of the Baird presents an unique feature upon which Mr. Baird counts heavily because his firm belief that it is the ideal shutter. It is a two-wing shutter which makes one and a half revolutions to each picture, so that each blade is alternately main blade and interrupter. The shutter is geared very nearly directly to the intermittent, so there should be little or no trouble from travel ghost due to worn gears.

By courtesy of the Baird Motion Picture Machine Company, the editor witnessed a demonstration of the Baird projector at the Academy of Music on Fourteenth street. An ordinary Kalem film, 1,000 feet in length, was projected to the Academy of Music screen. The distance was 150 feet, the picture 19 feet. The speed was varied from 55 to 65. It is but a statement of fact that there was not at any time a trace of flicker to be seen. Also, the picture was very steady and, in short, the result was distinctly high class. After the picture projection was finished, the editor himself projected the light on the screen without any film, varying the amperage from 40 to 50. At normal speed with 50 amperes, there was only the barest trace of flicker. The light was nearly steady, and that is a most excellent performance. When speeded to 65 the faint trace of flicker disappeared entirely. The screen, it is true, was a plain ordinary coated screen, and not a semi-reflecting surface, but, taking everyhing in consideration, the demonstration was such that the editor is prepared to make an unqualified statement that the Baird shutter, when working with d.c., delivers excellent results.

The mechanism seems to be reasonably simple and convenient to get at. Mechanically it is very well made indeed, and Mr. Baird assures me that the finest machinery, jigs and fixtures money can buy have been installed in the factory purposely to manufacture this projector.

Taken as a whole the machine impresses one in three points: First, by the extreme massiveness; second that it is, mechanically, exceedingly well made; third, by its simplicity.

One of these machines has been running in a Newark theater eleven hours per day for the past five months, being the only machine in the operating room. Two thousand foot films are used and during this time I am told that no adjustments or repairs have been made.

Referring to the illustrations Fig. 3 gives an excellent view of the mechanism from the operating side. A is the objective lens adjustment screw. The long vertical spring near the front wall of the mechanism, shown also at 10, Fig. 4, carries the weight of the framing mechanism.

The framing lever swings sidewise, operating an upright rod having a coarse screw, this rod not being visible in the illustration. The framing arrangement is simple and effective. The rest of Fig. 3 is, I think, entirely self-explanatory.

In Fig. 4 we see one end of the stereopticon attachment at 1, the same being swung into an upward position in order to show the method of focusing, which is accomplished by means of the little gear which meshes into a rake gear in the horizontal rod, the focusing screw being on top of the casting, or, in other words, on the out-of-sight end of the shaft carrying the little gear. Two and 21 are the springs which supply tension to the top sprocket idler, and the intermittent sprocket idler respectively. Three points to the gears which operates top sprocket, 4 being the top sprocket driving shaft. Five are the gears which operate the revolving shutter, and it will be noted that the rod driving these gears is connected at its lower end directly to the cam-wheel, so that there will be a minimum of lost motion between the intermittent and the shutter, all of which is good. Six is the lever operating the automatic fire shutter, the governor of which is mounted on the revolving shutter shaft which is shown. Just below gear 5 it will be noticed that shaft 4 is square, the reason for this is that, whereas the shaft itself frames up and down with the carriage, to which it is attached, the shutter shaft and its gears do not. By looking at the upper left hand corner just where line 3 crosses you will see a little black dot, with a similar one at the right hand corner. You will observe that these dots are made on lips which fit in the casing of the mechanism. They form the sliding ways for the carriage. You will also note that the part carrying the shutter gears and shaft is fastened to the casing so that it does not frame with the rest of the mechanism. I have tried to point this out as clearly as may be, so you can see just how the thing works. Seven is the objective lens focusing screw, also shown at A, Fig. 3. Eight is the screw for adjusting the tension; 9 is the little glass window in the square oil well containing the star, geneva and gear at lower end of upright driving shaft, all of which run in oil; 10 is the spring, also shown in Fig. 3, the purpose of which has already been described; 11 shows the upper end of the main driving shaft which runs in the oil well, the cover of which, 11, has been removed to show the interior; 22 is the main driving wheel which forms the connection between the motor and the mechanism; 13 is the continuation of lever X, Fig. 1; 14 is the lever which regulates the speed by sliding fibre friction wheel 17 in and out on friction disc wheel 16, which latter is ball bearing. The tension between friction wheel 17 and friction disc wheel 16 is supplied by spring 23. Fifteen is the rear end of the take-up reel spindle and its gears; 18-18 are grease cups; 19 is, of course, the motor, and 20 is one of the lamp house sliding ways, which, as will be seen, are square in form.

This, it seems to me, ought to be sufficient explanation to enable the operator to come to a proper understanding of just how the Baird machine is put together, and how it operates.

We shall await the final test of the Baird, which time alone can supply with a great deal of interest, but on the whole the machine looks to the editor of this department as if it would deliver the goods.

Here Is His Trouble.

Thomas E. Applegate, Knox, Indiana, orders a Handbook and writes:

> My employer has just erected a new theater, modern and up-to-date, with a seating capacity of 500. He has installed a new motor drive Powers Six A. Now here is my trouble. We have been having d. c. service at 220 volts; this is to be changed to a. c., either 220 or 110. Would it be best for us to install a motor generator set, changing the current to d. c. at a lower voltage? What voltage do you think gives the best results? Which is the best make of motor generator? I know you are well qualified to give this kind of advice.

Yes, my brother, and if I did that particular thing I would receive a blessing from one manufacturer, and a carload of red-hot language from the rest. I would by all means advise the installation of either a mercury arc rectifier or a motor generator set. You will find two excellent motor generator sets described on pages 185 to 196 of the Handbook, and you will also find an excellent mercury arc rectifier described in detail on pages 171, 172 and 182 inclusive. Each one of these appliances is very good, but I would advise a motor generator set of 70 ampere capacity or a mercury arc rectifier of not less than 50 ampere capacity. You could get along with a motor generator of 50 ampere capacity, but the larger size is cheaper in the long run. In addition to those described in the Handbook, there is the Wagner rotary converter, which is a very good device, and the Westinghouse mercury arc rectifier, which is also very good. So far as the voltage be concerned, you will find that all dealt with in the Handbook. Direct current operates at its best at from 45 to 55 volts, averaging about 48. The motor generator sets and the mercury arc rectifiers named take care of that proposition. No resistance is required in series with them. Should you install a straight dynamo driven by motor or engine then I would advise that it be 70 volts.

Nothing Doing.

E. J. Giesbrecht, Brooklyn, New York, writes:

I desire to take up moving picture operating for the sole purpose of working evenings to make extra money, relieving operators desiring to take a night off. Where could I obtain instructions? I am informed there are a great many fake schools. How high does the temperature rise in an operating room which is properly ventilated?

Serve at least a six months' apprenticeship under some competent operator, and study hard during that time. That is the only right way. There are already two licensed operators for every job in New York City, with a waiting list at the examiners of almost one thousand. As to the temperature, why it rises high enough on the afternoon of a hot summer day to give the operator a wild desire to do September Morn, so far as clothing be concerned, and one operator recently remarked to me after I had stepped into his operating room: "Why, Rich, if I were to die right now and go down below I would not know the difference, except for the smell of brimstone."

Comments on the Films

Licensed

THE SEALED OASIS (Selig), August 25. A desert tragedy, written by Frank Brockway. Guy Oliver is featured in this offering and Stella Razeto and A. W. Filson have the principal parts. It is the story of a mining engineer and his assistant. Tom is engaged to the engineer's daughter. He and the father venture on a prospecting tour and encounter a sand storm and are separated. The engineer manages to return home but Tom perishes in the storm. The ending is quite harrowing.

THE LUCKY RUBE (Lubin), August 25.—A rube and his wife are peaceably pursuing their agricultural occupation when a crook who is passing marks them for his victims. He pretends to have lost a ring in the road. He fails to find it and offers them $250 if the ring is found. Later, he disguises himself as a tramp, returns and finds the ring which he sells to the rube for $50, who finds that it is only glass. Later they discover him while in town and have him arrested, for which they receive a reward of $500.

THE WIDOW AND THE TWINS (Lubin), August 25.—The scenario is written by Giles Warren and J. A. Murphy is the director. It is the story of a wealthy widow who is much admired by one of a pair of twins. He lives in the East and is a spendthrift. The other twin is a mine owner of steady habits and resides in the West. The spendthrift is engaged to the widow but learns that if she remarries she will lose her money. He breaks the engagement. The steady brother comes East and eventually marries the widow. This is a laughable comedy.

THE COUNTERFEITER'S PLOT (Kalem), August 25.—In this pictureplay, directed by Edmund Lawrence, Irene Boyle is featured. Considerable love and jealousy are contained in this plot, also treachery. A woman who loves the chief of the counterfeiters, through jealousy betrays the band to the United States Marshal. The redeeming feature is a stirring fight, the detectives being finally victorious. It contains a love theme which ends satisfactorily.

TWO MEN WHO WAITED (Essanay), August 25.—This picture story is adapted from the Munsey Magazine, by H. Tifton Steck and is produced by Hal Davis. The first scenes are laid in the country and a fetching little school house scene is shown. A little boy and girl are being teased by their playmates on account of their apparent affections for each other. Later on the plot develops the love story of the same little couple, while growing up. This picture contains human nature and teaches a lesson in life that is wholesome. Beverly Bayne and E. H. Calvert are the principals. A picture well worth viewing.

THE MYSTERY OF THE OCTAGONAL ROOM (Edison), August 25.—This pictureplay is No. 10 of the mystery of "The Chronicles of Cleek," written by Thomas W. Hanshew, in which Ben Wilson is the feature. Sally Crute and a star cast of Edison players ably support him, directed by George A. Lessey. The news comes to Cleek while on a fishing expedition that the Squire's wife on the near shore has disappeared. When Cleek arrives at the house he finds that the Squire is a collector of valuable marbles and he also finds that many of them have been replaced by imitations. Cleek makes an investigation and discovers that a Japanese butler is the cause of all the trouble. The discovery of Mrs. Shadbolt is interesting. A good offering.

JOSIE'S DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE (Vitagraph), August 26.—This pictureplay comedy was written by Kenneth S. Webb, and Lee Beggs picturized it in an able manner. That Josie Sadler and Billy Quirk join forces is enough to guarantee plenty of laughs. Josie is a maid of all work and she obtains a position through an employment agency with the Marshe family. She soon finds that she is at the beck and call of every member of the family to do this and that, from the baby in the crib to old man Marshe, who insists that she launder and massage the old grey mare. She asks for the Fourth of July off and is refused. In desperation she declares for independence. She loses her job but she and Hank get even with the aid of the garden hose. Fine comedy in this.

THE DECISION OF JIM O'FARRELL (Selig), August 26.—A picture drama by Marie A. Wing, featuring William Stowell, and Adele Lane must be mentioned for her excellent work as his wife, whom he neglects for an adventurous, attractive widow. Mr. Stowell's character was that of a well meaning but weak willed man, who becomes ensnared against his own conviction. Miss Ellis, in the part of a spying, gossiping neighbor is excellent, redeeming herself later by her wholehearted kindness to the suffering wife. An interesting offering.

FABLE OF THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN LEARNING AND LEARNING HOW (Essanay), August 26.—A George Ade real comedy, showing how a supposed Bonehead turns out to be a Regular Guy. The story concerns two brothers who get the knowledge bug and enter college. One studies his lessons and is given a medal, the other's average is so low that he gets the can tied to him. He tells the president a few things as he closes the front door after himself and beats it, with little coin in his Jeans. With natural ability he lands a sucker, even if he didn't get a diploma. Twenty years later his brother is a college professor and he is a millionaire. He donates $50,000 to the college, which is hard up, and receives four degrees. Moral: Anybody with Sufficient Coin Can Be a Renowned Leader of Thought.

BUSTER AND HIS GOAT (Edison), August 26.—From the famous cartoons by R. F. Outcault, of Buster Brown. Norris Millington is a clever Buster, as is Constance Robertson as Mary Jane. Philip Dwyer is Tige and William Fables the goat. This is a rube plotting number and will please the children especially. It causes roars of laughter, especially where the goat butts Buster out of the kitchen window, then there is a general mixup between Tige and the goat. It has been well directed, thanks to Charles H. France. Take your children to see this, they will enjoy it.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN MINES, INDUSTRIAL (Edison), August 26.—An illustration of how gold is mined in South Africa and converted into bullion for shipment. Many scenes are shown in the diamond mines. Also numberless views in Johannesburg and Kimberly.

PATHE DAILY NEWS, No. 54, August 26.—Views atop the Rocky Mountains, pictures of Walter Hagen, Francis Ouimet, Varden, Ray, and other golfers of international repute, mobilization scenes in France, Bavaria, Belgium and Russia are the leading features of this interesting reel.

THE MYSTERIOUS LODGER (Vitagraph), August 27.—A pictureplay by Rita Humphreys, directed by Maurice Costello and Robert Gaillord. Maurice Costello essays the part of Ralph Brent, a poor actor who has married a widow with a child and discovered she is addicted to intoxicants. He returns home from the theater to find his step-child dead, the mother having purchased liquor with the money he has given her to procure medicine. A tragedy occurs wherein the wife accidentlly kills herself. Fearing that he will be accused of her murder, he disguises himself and escapes to Canada. He meets another woman, who assists him to escape; later she joins him and becomes his wife.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 52 (Selig), August 27.—A topical news release that is interesting to view.

THE ELOPEMENT OF ELIZA (Melies), August 27.—Eliza loves what her father denominates a low-down nigger, he having eyes on another whom he wishes her to marry. The young couple balk and elope but are pursued by the irate father, who is arrested during the excitement. On the promise of his giving his consent to the marriage the objected to son-in-law secures his release. Many laughs greet this offering.

SLIPPERY SLIM AND THE FORTUNE TELLER (Essanay), August 27.—This visualized comedy shows how Slippery Slim puts one over on his rival, Mustang Pete, for the hand of Sophie. Pete takes Sophie out for a buggy ride and the green-eyed monster slips into Slim's noodle. He goes to a fortune teller for advice. He induces Pete to have his fortune told and hides under the table and dictates to her what to tell his rival. What they concoct frightens Pete and makes the way clear for Slippery Slim. This is favored with many laughs.

THE TERRIBLE LESSON (Biograph), August 27.—A cracksman's wife realizes that the perils of her husband's profession jeopardizes their future life; to her it is a terrible menace. Another enemy looms up to destroy her peace of mind. The two clash and circumstances obtain that happily conceals that which she fears. A power other than hers shapes their destiny to happiness. An intense offering.

SUCH A HUNTER (Vitagraph), August 28.—A comedy by Charles Brown and directed by George E. Baker, which features John Bunny and Flora Finch. Percival (Bunny) tells of his mighty deeds of hunting and fishing and makes Paul Rainey and Roosevelt look like novices, but when he sees a bear he beats it for a tree and you realize his claims are heated atmosphere. The bear is a pet and eats out of the hand of his unpretentious rival. He is considered a big bluff and his diminutive rival walks off with the girl. This is a fine comedy.

A LOW FINANCIER (Selig), August 28.—A farce comedy by W. E. Wing, featuring John Lancaster. This is a meritorious comedy and has the merit of originality. Mr. Lancaster, in the role of "Bugs," a hobo, sells himself for $50 to serve as a subject for the dissection table. He demands cash in advance and time to spend the money. He must be spending it yet, for he fails to turn up. A fake bomb and a bull dog help along with the comedy. On the same reel with "Breaking Into Jail."

BREAKING INTO JAIL (Selig), August 28.—On the same reel with "A Low Financier." A self opinionated chap aspires to be an author. The story of how he tries to break into jail to secure realism creates considerable comedy.

THE BETTER MAN (Lubin), August 28.—The responsibility lies on the shoulders of Shannon Fife for this melodramatic picture and Joseph Smiley is an accessory, as the director. It is a difficult job to comment on this picture which is crammed full of anguish and unnatural, illogical happenings, not pleasant to view or to contemplate. The redeeming features are the acting and photography. John Smiley and Justina Huff play the leading roles and are supported by a splendid cast.

WHEN MEN WEAR SKIRTS (Kalem), August 28.—A Marshal Nielan and Ruth Roland burlesque. In this comedy the theme of the plot is an exchange of the sexes, the males being recognized as the weaker sex and the women as the lords (or rather the ladies of creation). There is considerable comedy developed in scenes in the park, a barber shop and various other places. One of the funniest features is a gang of gun women, who have been hired to kidnap a gentlemanly manicurist. This is an out-of-the-rut comedy.

THE HARBOR OF LOVE (Selig), August 29.—A picturedrama by Nellie Brown Duff. Adda Gleason and Harry Lonsdale are featured. The theme of the story is the working out of two episodes, both of which are rather illogical. The governor of the state falls in love with a fair young artist who is painting his portrait. However, she loves the governor's secretary but refuses to marry him. He goes to the seashore and falls in love with an old fisherman's daughter. The artist is unhappy and repairs to the same locality to find a subject for a picture. She happens, of course, to discover her former sweetheart happy with the little sea maiden and she returns to the city and marries the governor. The seashore scenes and photography are the best part of this picture.

THE KID'S NAP (Lubin), August 29.—A German resident of Krautville, while partaking of his noonday meal, learns from his newspaper that kidnapping is taking place in the vicinity. His son, young Max, is spanked for misbehavior and crawls under the front porch to pout. He is missed and unable to locate him they think he has been kidnapped. Much riotous comedy action occurs amongst the citizens of Krautville. They corral all the children in the town, but no Max. During the excitement he crawls from under the porch, having been taking a nap. It is quite laughable.

THE CAR OF DEATH (Kalem), August 29.—There is considerable that is exciting in the plot of this pictureplay. Helen Holmes portrays the principal role, a country school mistress, and she is asked to resign on account of being too frivolous. A telegraph lineman is her sweetheart. A Sunday school picnic is on tap and the scholars on a special train. A dynamite car breaks loose and runs wild, threatening the Sunday school train. The lineman is working atop of a telegraph pole. He telegraphs to the Hopeville station of the danger and to sidetrack the car. Kate, who is present in the office of the operator, who is old and decrepit, precedes him and sidetracks the car, averting the catastropne. A gripping number.

BRONCHO BILLY'S INDIAN ROMANCE (Essanay), August 29.—A Western drama featuring G. M. Anderson, who is the author and producer. Broncho Billy saves an Indian maid from a much disliked chief. He has been jilted by the girl he loved and goes with his friend (Lee Willard) into the mountains to prospect for gold. Billy is sad and his friend writes to his sweetheart that he is very ill, asking for her constantly. The Indian maid has fallen in love with him, but when she sees his sweetheart she realizes that she must mate with her own race and returns to the chief. Not very exciting but interesting.

TREASURE TROVE (Edison), August 29.—This picture drama is by Loring M. Hewen. It has quite a large cast and the participants handle their various parts artistically. Ashley Miller directed it. The scenes are mostly located on the beach and bay. The heroes are two young chaps who have fallen in love with an old Colonel's two daughters. Because they are poor he will not countenance them at all. Luckily they find in some wreckage on the beach a paper, written in Spanish, that reveals the location of buried treasure. They discover it but a villainous Cuban attempts to take it away from them. The Colonel appears upon the scene and settles the matter and the sight of the gold causes him to change his mind.

SPENDING IT QUICK (Biograph), August 29.—An Irishman inherits $500 from his uncle's estate and invests it in an automobile. He and his wife proceed to have the ride of their lives, which ends by plunging them over a cliff, car and all, almost killing them both. When they emerge from the wrecked car Pat is glad that it was not $1,000, as he would have lost more money. On the same reel with "Baseball, a Grand Old Game."

BASEBALL, A GRAND OLD GAME (Biograph), August 29.—On the same reel with "Spending It Quick." A simp is a baseball "nut" and resorts to all sorts of schemes to attend the game. He informs his boss that his mother-in-law is killed in a train wreck, and wires his wife that the boss has sent him out of town; then he "hikes" for the game. He gets there all right and he also gets into trouble on his return.

THE WRONG FLAT (Vitagraph), August 31.—This is a very clever comedy by G. H. Bailey and Captain Harry Lambart has ably directed it. Darwin Karr and Naomi Childers have the leading parts, supported by a clever cast of Vitagraph fun-makers. The complications in this comedy, which borders on the farcical, cause a great amount of laughter. It is the old story of making a mistake and getting into the wrong flat, but in this offering there is such an innocent mix-up, although it is a worked over plot, it seems original. The way the ludicrous affair is straightened out causes roars of laughter.

PATHE'S DAILY NEWS, NO. 55 (Pathe), August 31.—The reception of the three American Cardinals at Rome, Italy; the annual Baby Parade at Asbury Park; Count Zeppelin reviewing the German Boy Scouts, also a view of one of his airships; French soldiers leaving for the front, etc.

LOVE AND SODA (Essanay), August 31.—This is a comedy in which a plumber shows his marksmanship in hurling eggs, written and directed by E. Mason Hopper. Ruth Hennesey, Wallace Beery and Leo White are the principal fun makers. The plumber to be well dressed, so as to compete with the clerk behind a soda fountain, throws up his job. He obtains a position as clerk and he eats more than he sells, but the proprietor is afraid of him and dares not discharge him. The stylish little clerk who is his rival in love, brings little Miss Moffett into the ice cream parlor for refreshments, and because the plumber serves him with a castor oil sundae an egg throwing contest ensues. A very funny number.

THE BUXOM COUNTRY LASS (Edison), August 31.—This release has been reviewed at length, by Louis Reeves Harrison in the Moving Picture World and can be found on page 941, issue of August 15, 1914.

THE COUNTERFEITER'S DAUGHTER (Bio) Aug. 31.—A father who is a counterfeiter gives up his unlawful operations so that his daughter, who is returning home, will not discover his occupation. His partner, attempting to make him return to his work, threatens the happiness of the father's anticipation, threatening that he will inform the girl. Providence luckily interferes and adjusts matters in a peculiar but satisfactory way. A thrilling drama.

PATHE DAILY NEWS, NO. 55, Sept. 6.—This number shows pictures of America's three Roman Catholic cardinals en route to Rome, scenes at Asbury Park, funeral of Irish Nationalists in Dublin. A Zeppelin dirigible and other war scenes. The various features are full of current interest.

Licensed Specials.

RAINEY, THE LION KILLER (Vitagraph), August 25.—A special feature comedy in two parts. This is a story by Leonard Grover, picturized by George H. Plympton and directed by Sidney Drew, who also plays the title role. Mistaken for a famous hunter, Rainey is welcomed with an ovation at the Sachville Hotel. He is called upon to show his prowess. He has an awful hard time doing it, with the assistance of two pet bears, but he makes good. The bears give him a chase. He turns the tables on them; he does not get them but he does capture a wife. This comedy is greeted with continuous laughter.

THE CAVE OF DEATH (Kalem), August 26.—A two-part story of the West, featuring Princess Mona Darkfeather. It is a story of the desert and illustrates, as many other pictureplays have done, the perils encountered by prospectors. There is a young prospector, working a claim, with whom the Indian maiden falls in love. Two unscrupulous men figure in the plot, who ply the Indians with whiskey and they attack the young prospector. The Indian maiden rescues him and hides him in the cave of death. Other complications follow and the ending is rather sad. The photography is excellent.

THE ATTORNEY'S DECISION (Lubin), August 26.—This two-part pictureplay is written by M. B. Havey and produced by H. Myers, who also plays the lead, and Rosemary Theby plays opposite. A girl gives up her sweetheart, a promising young lawyer, to marry a broker who is the creditor of her father. He soon neglects and abuses her and her life is anything but happy. Five years later her old sweetheart is elected district attorney. An investigation against the crooked brokers is inaugurated and the husband heads the list. This complication is productive of many intense scenes, which in the end develops into tragedy. There is much suspense, which holds close attention as to what the outcome is to be in the finale.

THE AGGRESSOR (Lubin), August 27.—This two-reel pictureplay is credited to Mildred Mason, with Edgar Jones as director. Lew Mortelle, Louise Huff, Edgar Jones and Edwin B. Tilton labor hard to bring an illogical offering to some degree of comprehension. There is much beautiful scenery and it is well photographed. To those who admire this sort of melodramatic hodge-podge it will prove entertaining.

THE BIRTH OF THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER (Edison), August 28.—This release has been reviewed at length by Louis Reeves Harrison, in the Moving Picture World, and can be found on page 814, issue of August 8, 1914.

SEVEN SEALED ORDERS (Essanay), August 28.—This two-act pictureplay is adapted by Edgar Franklin from a story in the Munsey Magazine. It is a thrilling drama, mingling Oriental mysticism with modern methods in the unravelling of a wonderful tangle of complications. A man is given seven sealed orders, which he is to open at various times and places. He follows instructions and the developments contain some dramatic moments, and suspense is maintained throughout the many scenes. The acting is well done. An interesting release.

JOSIE'S CONEY ISLAND NIGHTMARE (Vitagraph), August 29.—A special feature in two parts by Kenneth S. Webb, ably directed by Lee Beggs. Josie Sadler and Billy Quirk furnish the comedy, ably assisted by a good cast. Josie partakes of too much adventure and too much cheese, a combination that makes her see things in her sleep. The picture shows just what she saw in her dreams, visions that are wild and wonderful. She has been reading "The Castaways," and she dreams of terrifying adventures among the cannibals, wherein Hank figures. They awake and find themselves marooned on the rocks by the tide, which has come in. She fires the book into the water and they wade and swim to the mainland. A laughable comedy.

THE BRAND (Kalem), August 31.—A two-part drama of the Alice Joyce series, who is featured. Author, Jere F. Looney. The plot of this story contains much that is of heart interest and many gripping scenes that hold the closest attraction. A girl who has been raised in the backwoods and whose lot has been far from happy, loses her father by death. Her step-mother, who wishes to re-marry, sends her to a reformatory. A girl of the slums, angered by punishment, fires the building. The backwoods girl informs the authorities of the other's guilt and the subsequent scenes are filled with many incidents in which the slum girl tries by blackmail to avenge herself on the informant. This release is worth the viewing.

WHO KILLED GEORGE GRAVES? (Selig), August 31.—A dramatic tragedy by Malcolm Douglas, in two reels. Featuring Stella Razeto. To those who admire melodrama, this picturization will certainly prove satisfactory. It contains enough complications in which crime, treachery, deception and anguish is depicted to make three or four more reels. A deserving woman is made to suffer through drunkenness, criminals and murderers all that human nature can possibly endure.

Independent

THE KEEPER OF THE LIGHT (Princess), August 28.—This story is located in a lighthouse, where the girl and her grandfather live. It has a tragic close, which would have been stronger if handled more slowly. The girl showed some sign of recovery after the shot was fired and her subsequent death came unexpectedly. The setting itself is an admirable one and the pictures very good. Muriel Ostriche and Boyd Marshall play the lovers.

THE SONG OF THE SEA SHELL (American), August 28.—The story of a young shepherd and his love. He dreams that she goes to the city with a stranger who has just come into the mountains, but awakens to find she is true to him. This is a simple sort of story, but contains a wealth of idyllic scenes and attractive photography. The close is something of a surprise as the observer does not suspect the dream feature.

HER LAST CHANCE (Keystone), August 29.—This low comedy begins with some rube characters about a grocery store. The grocer tries to palm off the homely daughter on the swain. Her efforts to elope with him are attended by the usual burlesque scenes, winding up with the fall of a buggy from a high cliff. Not as funny as some of this type of pictures, but will please some observers.

ARTIE THE ARTIST (Thanhouser), August 30.—A comedy number featuring "Vic," the cartoonist, creator of the well-known Axel and Flooey series. Vic hires out as draughtsman at a girls' school and gets in trouble. He has further adventures in a saloon and with his sweetheart's father. This makes an amusing number. The artist draws numerous sketches in the course of the film.

BILL ORGANIZES A UNION (Komic), August 30.—This fifth of the "Bill" series shows the office boy as leader of a strike because the employers won't let the lads attend ball games. The stenographer with the fish hook curls and the substitute office boy with the limburger cheese get up some good comedy. A bright little number.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 33 (Reliance), August 31.—In this new number Dunbar rounds up his rascally brother, who is shot after some exciting scenes. The necklace is recovered. Other features of this interesting installment are numerous views of lower New York and pictures of Irvin S. Cobb, Will Irwin, Gregory Mason, Arno Dosch and other correspondents preparing to go to the scene of war.

WHIFFLE'S DOUBLE (Eclectic), Aug. 31.—An amusing half-reel number. Monsieur Prince doubles handily in the parts of the shoemaker and the lover. They become mixed up and the shoemaker is thrown out of the girl's home. Later the lover also gets into trouble, but all ends happily. The photography is good and the story pleasing.

KASHMIR, BRITISH INDIA (Eclectic), August 31.—Fine colored views of natives embroidering silk, inlaying silver, carving wood, coloring vases and dancing. On same reel with above.

CURING A LAZY WIFE (Crystal), September 1.—Vivian Prescott appears in this comedy number as a lazy wife who pretends to be an invalid, forcing her husband to do all the housework. Even a fire scare fails to cure her, but the husband takes her for a ride in a baby cab and this does the work. The comedy in this is not very strong, but it has a touch of human nature in it.

THE MILKFED BOY (Majestic), September 1.—The story of a young widow who raised her boy like a girl. The observer's sympathy is enlisted with the youth and he is glad to see the boy show some nerve when the tramp comes. The boy saves his mother and calls help. This slight plot has an interesting touch of human nature in it and is well pictured.

A MODERN OTHELLO (Beauty), September 1.—Marguerita Fischer and Harry Pollard here appear in a new comedy of married life. While on a picnic the wife meets a girl friend dressed in a man's riding outfit. The jealous husband chases them home and a tragedy is barely averted. This slight plot is enlivened by some fine lake scenes and good photography.

THE MINER'S BABY (Reliance), September 2.—This title does not cover the story adequately as there are two families and two cute babies in the picture. One dies, giving a touch of real pathos to the story. The other child exercises a good influence over its selfish, grouchy father. A Western offering of about average merit, the presence of the babies being its strongest appeal.

TEMPEST AND SUNSHINE (Imp), September 3.—The famous old story written by Mary J. Holmes is here produced in two-reel picture form and makes an interesting example of the sort of love romance that interested the older generation. Zola Telmzart and Dorothy Phillips play the name parts respectively, one being a pronounced brunette and the other a blonde. Both make the most of their opportunities. The jealous Tempest complicates the double love affair by forging letters and detaining the real ones. An interrupted wedding is the chief dramatic scene. This moves along very much like an old-time melodrama; it is well photographed and capably acted throughout.

A BOGUS BARON (Sterling), September 3.—Ford Sterling appears as a gardener in this number and is bribed by the girl's lover to aid him in forestalling the Earon's attentions. Ford pretends to be a band leader and the usual mix-up ensues. There are no big features in this comic number and it is only fairly entertaining.

TURNED BACK (Reliance), September 4.—This story of how a former rival robs a doctor of money and then returns it later is well constructed and the observer follows it with interest. It is not, however, a powerful offering and some of the scenes are somewhat unconvincing. It makes on the whole an offering of about average merit.

THE MASCOT (Komic), September 6.—This is an amusing comedy number, in which a robber throws a Hindu statuette into the girl's home. The father thinks it will prove lucky, but nothing but hard luck follows its appearance. The lover impersonates a Hindu and terrifies the father into giving up the girl and $5,000. Later the real Hindus appear. There is considerable amusement in this film.

LITTLE MEG AND I (Victor), September 7.—A sea story, based on a poem by C. I. Murphy, from which extracts are used as subtitles. Vera Sisson and Warren Kerrigan play the leads. The latter, now an old salt, tells the story of his ill-fated love. The girl enters into a forced marriage during her lover's absence and later drowns herself. A pretty and pathetic offering, which will please.

FRUITS AND FLOWERS (Nestor), September 7.—Not strong comedy, but there is one real laugh when the jokers meet.

THE BACHELOR'S HOUSEKEEPER (Crystal), September 8.—An amusing and well-pictured little skit, in which Charles De Forrest entertains his bachelor friends. The new housekeeper wins them all, but it develops later that she has a husband. This is pleasing.

WAS HE A HERO? (Crystal), September 8.—This, on same reel with above, shows Chester Barnett as an undesirable suitor for the girl's hand. He gets a fumigating outfit and pretends there is a fire, during which he saves the girl and her mother. This is fair.

BOY (Eclair), September 9.—In two parts, this picture tells a most improbable story with much beautiful photography and some lovely scenes. It aims at sentiment, but deals with a religious background in a way that lacks inspiration and may seriously displease many.

THE UNIVERSAL BOY (Imp), September 10.—This is No. 5 of the "Matty" series. The young lad here appears as an officer of the Juvenile police, devoting his talents to rounding up other boys who smoke cigarettes, play craps and the like. The boy police force have a fight on the roof tops with a rough gang. This makes an entertaining number.

HELPING MOTHER (Rex), September 10.—Once more, in this three-reel number, written by Lois Weber,, have The Smalleys demonstrated their ability to put a pleasing story on the screen. The plot is naturally developed and just the sort of story that goes best with the average audience. The turning of the book pages in place of using subtitles was a clever device. Lois Weber and Phillips Smalley play the leads and Beatrice Van and Joe Young appear to good advantage as the erring young couple whose affair comes to a tragic ending. The auto explosion was realistic. A well rounded number, with a pretty ending.

THE ANGEL OF THE CAMP (Powers), September 11.—A Western story, with Edna Maison and Ray Gallagher in the leads. The latter did not have the makeup of a bad man. He shoots a man and the girl, a Salvation Army nurse, aids in pulling the victim through because she loves the gun man. This is rather obvious in plot and does not make a strong impression on the observer, though it is well constructed.

FEEDING THE KITTY (Nestor), September 11.—A comedy that will go well with the average house.

JAM AND JEALOUSY (Joker), September 12.—Low comedy of an amusing sort. Two tramps in first rate makeup add to the fun of the situations. The girl flirts with one of them to make her brakeman lover jealous. The tramp's antics while dining were quite funny and this proves a successful offering of its particular type.

THE OTHER KID'S SISTER (Eclectic).—A picture enacted entirely by children, showing the experiences of a boy named Billy in his first love affairs. The trial of the auto driver by the "kids'" court was the chief feature. The plot seemed of rather slight interest and had no particular climax. A fairly interesting number.

Independent Specials

THROUGH THE DARK .Reliance), August 29.—This two-reel story begins with two girls clerking in a jewelry store. One borrows a valuable necklace to wear at a ball and throws the blame on the other. The latter serves a term in Sing Sing, is released and later hounded by a prison acquaintance. The first girl finally confesses, after both are married, in order to save her friend from the blackmailer. This is well acted and carefully constructed throughout. The worst fault of the picture is its rather sordid motive, which does not leave a feeling of satisfaction with the observer, who feels that the friend's repentance came rather late.

FRENCHY (Majestic), August 30.—This is a rattling good two-reel Western yarn based on a story by George Pattullo. Some of the photography is a little too light but is acceptable. Vester Pegg plays the part of the lively young Frenchman on a ranch. He rides bucking bronchos, shoots up a bar room and finally plays "doctor" to the sick girl. Fred Burns also gave a good performance as the jealous foreman. Francelia Billington plays the girl. This is a convincing visualization of Western cowboy days and makes altogether an entertaining yarn.

THE CRUISE OF THE "MOLLY ANN" (Broncho), September 9.—The crafty shipowner conspires with the mate to burn his vessel, promising to give him his daughter in return. But the girl loves the captain, who smuggles her on board the vessel. The scenes during the fire at sea are exciting and throughout the entire two reels there is plenty of action. The mate carries the girl from the burning brigantine, leaving the captain to die. But all turns out right in the end and justice triumphs. A good sea yarn.

MILDRED'S DOLL (Domino), September 10.—This two-reel number could have been pictured in a single reel as the main situatiton has been used before. The little girl hides the gold in her doll, to prevent the outlaws from getting it. Though familiar in plot this gets up fine suspense in the second reel. The work of the little girl was good and the dog's intelligent actions helped the picture immensely. The photography is also unusually good.

THE SILVER CANDLESTICKS (Kay-Bee), September 11.—A two-reel story of Italian life. The plot follows so closely the well known "Bishop's Candlesticks" from Les Miserables that it can scarcely be called original. But for one who has never seen the latter this will prove an entertaining story. It tells of a father who steals the candlesticks from the church to obtain money for treatment of his sick child. Later he repents and the child recovers through the prayers of the priest, after the conscience-stricken father has confessed. Some of the scenes are not altogether convincing, but the story is well constructed and the photography generally good.

THE PHANTOM LIGHT (Bison), September 12.—A two-reel Indian production, written by Margaret Oswald. An old brave relates how the false brother was consumed by fire for his misdeeds. Many Western scenes of interest are shown in the course of the story. The plot itself could have been told in one reel and has a rather drawn out aspect at present. The herd of deer and the battle scenes were good features, and the story itself adheres closely to typical Indian legends.

THE SAVING OF YOUNG ANDERSON (Reliance), July 25.—A picture in two reels from O. Henry's story that will make fair entertainment although it lacks a real punch. The way the picture opens makes us for many scenes more interested in one Chick Nelson than in Anderson and these two characters, looking a bit alike when not on together, confuse us a bit. Anderson, a country boy, gets a job as policeman; but falls into too friendly relations with the "gang." The heroine's uncle, also on the force, "plants," with Chick's help, a little surprise for Anderson, who has to arrest two of the leaders and so is saved from friendship with the gang. A fair offering.

Doings at Los Angeles

ON making this week's trip around the studios many different experiences were had at several of the plants where everyone was busily talking war and making pictures. At the Keystone was being made a rube comedy with Fatty Arbuckle; in it a cider press plays a star part. The "heckers" were making cider, and as the cameraman turned his crank, so did the cider man, and they carried the real juice out to the side, and we all had a drink of it,—but the apples were not cider apples, and the beverage lost its charm on that score.

Out in Hollywood the Lasky place seemed to be filled with people, so many extras were there to work in a few scenes. A big pile of boxes in the office, according to Manager Fred Kley, contained a number of pounds of metol, amidol, and hydrochinone, amounting to about $4,000 worth, which had been received that morning from New York. The western people surely are on the hunt for these German chemicals, and metol is at a premium here.

George Larkin, of "Trey o' Hearts" fame, at the Universal plant, was rushing around trying to dictate a message to a Western Union boy for his sister, who had written him for his proper address, they having been separated for the past seven years, because George thought she was killed in a train wreck. Happily it was untrue, and the young leading man is now expectantly awaiting an answer to his wire. The letter came through the post office at the Pennsylvania Terminal, New York City, and as the letter was there we know the event was based on government facts.

The western Vitagraph is sailing pretty close to the wind, word having been received from New York that "the strictest economy must be observed by all members of the company owing to the disturbances in Europe—where a great number of our releases are sold." Therefore, the company is rather careful of its work and expenses.

"I did not want to lose any time getting my subscription renewal in, so I sent it by mail instead of waiting for you to come and take it," is what Director Albert W. Hale, of the Santa Monica Kalem said the other day. Johnny Brennan poked his painted head through the window, formerly a ticket window, for the studio is in a building once used as a passenger station by the Southern Pacific, and said "Yeah, and the Moving Picture World is to us what the old Almanac is to the farmer way down east."

CLARKE IRVINE.

Vincent Trotta

SKETCH artist and cartoonist have become quite indispensable in the motion picture business. The most attractive advertisements in the Moving Picture World are the results of their handiwork and much of the advertising literature used by picture makers in giving publicity to their subjects is embellished by the sketch artist. Readers of The World will recall the catchy sketches used for some time in the advertisements of the Gaumont Company; these were produced by Vincent Trotta, who was in the employ of that company for some time, but has recently left them to seek other employment.

Vincent Trotta.

Vincent Trotta is a brother of Joseph Trotta, an artist of considerable repute. He has had wide experience in commercial drawing and designing, having worked with several of the leading photo engraving companies of New York. He has also supplied cartoons for Life and many other New York publications. While with the Gaumont he designed many posters for both Gaumont and Melies subjects. He possessed the commercial instinct to a remarkable degree and has a fund of good ideas which seems inexhaustible. If skill, adaptability and a genial disposition count for anything Mr. Trotta should be a valuable assistant in the planning of the advertising campaign for the product of any enterprising manufacturer.

ELECTRICITY TO DRY FILM.

The New York Edison Company, purveyor of electricity for heat and light in New York City, reports that the Standard Film Print Company of Yonkers, N. Y., is using electricity to advantage in the process of drying film. Four electric heaters of 3 k. w. each have been installed beneath the drying drums. On a dry day these heaters do the work in half an hour that took several hours to do without them. A corresponding advantage is gained on wet days.

War's Black Mark.

European Trade Strangled and Throttled—Britain Hopeful, But in Doubt.

By Evan Strong.

THE first shrill blast of the war trumpet sounded the doom of the continental film business; Great Britain suffered a momentary suggestion of panic. European trade outside the British Isles has been throttled and completely strangled in the grip of war, and it is mournful faces the inhabitants of the London film world wear today. In Germany, Russia, France, Austria, Belgium, and the Balkans business was shut down in a moment. The workers were called to the service of their country; the people were in too serious mood for entertainment. Foreign offices in London were denuded of men, reservists fled to their own lands with one accord. Firms unaffected by this began to reckon the chances, and for several days progress was stopped, the fates of business for many hung in the balance. Strenuous, feverish efforts were made to restore confidence and to convince the theaters that supplies would not be curtailed. To some extent these efforts were successful, but murmurs are still heard on all sides "If it lasts a year, six months even, what then?" and the latest announcement that Lord Kitchener anticipates an eighteen months' campaign is being taken very seriously.

The fears are great, a series of reverses to the allied arms may result in a panic which would have the effect of closing down the whole business. This is the pessimistic side—there is the other side which we may consider later.

Fear of Economic Consequences.

What have been the immediate results of this awful call to arms of Europe? In Germany and Austria, in Russia and the Balkans, cinematography is a thing of the past; a forgotten thing, dead as a stone; in France no one has a thought for films; in Belgium the cinemas have been blotted out—a huge red cross covers each one of them; in that fair land they are being utilized as hospitals, they are being filled day by day with wounded and maimed warriors. In Great Britain the theaters are open as usual—the scorching breath of war does not drive across the North Sea. In England there is only imagination and doubt, actual effects are not to be seen here. The people are buoying themselves up in the usual stolid British way, assuming to ignore events, but there is, below all this appearance, a fear—a fear of economic consequences which must inevitably follow the track of a huge campaign of this nature.

Firms which are supplied from America and England have hastened to issue reassuring reports of their ability to overcome all adverse circumstances, and carry on business as usual, but while their arguments are strong their faith is weak. They are becoming demoralized—the shortage of ready money is the telling factor. Manufacturers and agents can sell their films, but can they obtain their money? True, there is extended credit, the payment of large sums can be held up, but the moratorium does not cover rates, taxes, rent and wages, no slight matter for a large office. And the result: Wholesale discharge of employees, hesitation, doubt, and the concomitant interruption of the smooth running of routine work. Those expenses which are so essential in the film trade have been wiped out and with it the assistance which was given to theater managers. These latter are beginning to ask why, if the firms are prepared to go on as usual, this should be so. The answer is but chilly silence.

Sooner or later, unless drastic measures are taken, unless the big firms are prepared to back up their press utterances and earnest assurances, there will be panic, and all that American and English film interest have to gain by the death of continental competition will be lost.

America's Opportunity.

This is the time for America to spend money, to use her resources to keep the market open. Once panic seizes the buyers, or the theater proprietors, good-bye to all the building of years; we shall be thrown back to beyond where we started. It is a foolhardy policy to restrict and restrain business now. This is the moment to show the strength of the American and British film trade. If it can be proved to the cinemas that Uncle Sam and John Bull between them can, with apparent ease supply all film that is necessary, the continent need not look to Great Britain as a rich market after the war. American taste is nearer British taste, the continent will stand no earthly chance if the market at this propitious moment is entrenched. Never was greater mistake made than this show of weakness. Bad spirit will follow; prejudice will do incalculable harm.

If the cinema proprietor had fear at the first alarm that attendance would diminish, he has now recovered his confidence. The public is strung up to the last hole, feeling is tense, there must be some relief, some relaxation. The people are already looking to the cinema for that relaxation. The first week of the war with all its flurry of mobilization certainly had effect on the pay box, but there was a change the second week. The public flocked to the cinemas, the managers put on smiling faces and seemed to have forgotten the vague doubts of the preceding seven days. Of course, the public wished to be taken away from war for a few hours; they have money, even those whose breadwinners are taken have the government allowance, food is at the same rates, there are no extra calls on the purse—naturally the few pence are available for the cinema, and into the pay box they will go so long as the cinema is open. The reasons are obvious and the chief is that the public must have relaxation.

One or Two Effects.

The immediate effects of the war have been strange. For instance there is a boycott of all German theaters in Great Britain. This was engineered by an important evening newspaper, which foraged through the records at Somerset House and discovered that one great company, the London and Provincial, which has numerous theaters in the capital and throughout the country, has but one British name on the list of directors and shareholders, the rest are German, mostly inhabitants of Mannheim. Following this "All British" notices in red have appeared outside many theaters. The chief theater in London, the West End Cinema, Piccadilly, has been hard hit by the boycott along with others.

Another and more serious result is the attitude of a host of managers who have suddenly started to rent old stock. First and second run houses upon which the buyers base their business have, of a minute, begun to rent fifth and sixth run stuff. It is difficult to book first run and this militates against the position; the buyer's demand is restricted. Perhaps these matters will right themselves, but it is well not to take a too optimistic view of the situation. If the American film merchants set about convincing the British market; if they will spend money now in the hope of future returns so well and good, there will be no need to fear collapse. But they must strike now—this very moment. They must stand firm in the face of a black outlook. The situation properly handled will recover, treated half-heartedly it will rapidly become worse. Great Britain is too rich a market to lose. London itself views 250,000 feet of sample every week. If this is multiplied by five only it gives at 4d. a foot a mass of money well worth looking after. It is up to the American to show his grit.

War Pictures.

A foolish rumor spread at the outbreak of the war that the British government would allow no war pictures at theaters. This naturally has been officially denied, and at the present moment war pictures are being shown in every cinema. But not pictures of the present war. It is very doubtful if there will be any. The British government has tabooed the camera at the seat of war and has impressed upon the allied powers the need to observe this. The writer has just returned from the front where he had been with a cameraman. The taking of pictures was rigorously prohibited, it was impossible to get permission to photograph anything, and the work was dangerous. There are several men hanging on the heels of the various armies, hoping against hope that an opportunity will occur for a picture. If they get any thing at all it will be at the greatest risk to their lives. They are brave fellows, and out to do all they can for their firms; if they fail in their exploit these firms must take all the circumstances into consideration. Any pictures will be "poached" pictures; the handle will be turned by a man expecting a bullet from friend or foe, or at least arrest, at any moment. This is no spectacular war; it is a war for existence, and the forces in the field are leaving no loophole which may make for defeat. If the cameraman gets in the way he will be ruthlessly smashed. It is a question whether he will ever get near any action.

BACK FROM VISIT TO HONOLULU.

Margaret Joslin, the famous "Sophie Clutts" of the Essanay "Snakeville" comedies, returned recently from a visit to Honolulu where she has numerous friends. Miss Joslin says the natives of Hawaii are unusually strong for motion pictures, the "Broncho Billy" dramas and the "Slippery Slim" comedies being among the most popular. G. M. Anderson, the hero of the western thrillers, is cheered whenever he appears on the screen, she says, while the villain of the photoplay gets more than his share of the hisses.

A BRIGHT comedy-drama, "The Blue Coyote Cherry Crop," by C. W. L. Ennis, visualized by Director Ashley Miller, presents a phase of life that rings true. It illustrates in a gentle sort of way what has often occurred when the recipient of advantages freely and generously bestowed turns on a benefactor with what is worse than ingratitude, an accusation of fraud. Those who have administered estates for the best interests of heirs to a property have all to often suffered from imputation of guilt or blame.

Cherry is the daughter of an old miner who dies in the West while she is in a fashionable eastern boarding school. The father has exhausted his resources for the sake of his motherless child and leaves nothing for her continued maintenance and education. With his last breath he enjoins "the boys" to look after his daughter, and they promise to do so. Realizing that she would not accept charity, they establish a sort of benefice, contributing part of their earnings for that purpose, and allowing her to think that she is receiving dividends from some imaginary stock left by her father.

The duty of keeping up this pretense falls upon Jack, one of their number, and he acts as a supposed executor of her father's estate, sending her regular reports to make the payments seem authentic. A so-called "dividend," nothing more nor less than a contribution of active kindness, is accumulated in a box used for that purpose when a villain breaks in and makes way with all that has been saved. Jack sells his watch to help Cherry and informs her that the regular dividend has been reduced.

Cherry lays the matter before a young lawyer, one attracted by her handsome revenue, and they journey to the mine in company in order to make an investigation. A severe trial for Jack ensues. Rather than reveal that he and the boys have been supporting the young lady, he is ready to assume all responsibilities laid on his shoulders. The villain who stole the accumulated savings attempts to heap further injury upon Jack and unintentionally reveals the truth. Assuming that Jack has been squandering money, he asserts that the young miner has been sending every cent he had to some "girl" in the East, even selling his watch to provide her with funds. This disclosure leads rapidly to a finer understanding and Jack gathers a veritable crop of cherries in the final scene.

"The Girl Who Lived in Straight Street."

A Two-Reel Hepworth-American Film Production With Pleasing English Setting.

WITHOUT being in any way a powerful offering, this proves to be quite an entertaining photoplay. It is enacted by a capable cast of performers and has an English setting. In the cast are Chrissie White, Allma Taylor, Cyril Morton and Stuart Rome.

The plot first takes up the character of Stella Leighton, an orphan girl, living in a quiet English thoroughfare known as Straight street. The girl becomes interested in her young married neighbors, Michael and Phoebe. The young husband loves his wife dearly but is unable to provide her with all the necessities of life. When their son is born the father in desperation appropriates some of the firm's money. For this he is imprisoned.

Scene from "The Girl Who Lived in Straight Street."

In prison Michael makes an appeal to Stella to look after his wife, who has gone on the stage as soon as she could leave her child. Phoebe is invited to a party which is attended by Michael's own brother, Hilary. It seems a little improbable that Hilary would not know his brother's wife, but this is the way the story runs. He is attracted by her and makes improper advances. Stella, having learned that Phoebe went to the party, now puts in appearance and informs Hilary that he has just insulted his own sister-in-law.

Hilary is very much disturbed to find that Phoebe is Michael's wife, and immediately tries to bring about a meeting between his parents and Phoebe, hoping to reconcile them to the fact that she is their daughter-in-law. In this difficult task he is aided by Stella, for Michael had greatly grieved his parents when he wed against their wishes.

By the combined efforts of Hilary and Stella a reconciliation is brought about and when Michael is released from prison he receives a glad welcome home. Stella herself has by this time won the heart of Hilary, who proposes to "the girl who lived in Straight Street" and is of course accepted.

This photoplay has a sort of running plot, which remains almost at a dead level all the way through. None of the scenes stands out strongly from the others and none of the actors does more than ordinary capable work.

"The Mystery of the Poison Pool"

Five-Reel Release of Picture Playhouse Film Company With South African Setting.

Reviewed by Robert C. McElravy.

THIS five-reel production, written by J. Searle Dawley, abounds in adventurous episodes, piling one breath-retarding incident upon another, and yet it is for the most part so sincerely acted that the events seem real. Two men, James Gordon and E. A. Turner, perform some truly wonderful outdoor work in this offering and the effects they achieve are usually legitimate rather than being mere efforts at sensation.

The one unfortunate feature for some exhibitors is the introduction of a huge python snake in the first reel. This is perhaps the least convincing incident in the production and may easily be eliminated without detracting from the story.

Considerable care has been taken to keep the supposed African setting intact and, while the scenes were actually taken in Bermuda, the producers have succeeded in conjuring up a sustained suggestion of the veldt country.

In the opening scenes Cameron, a rough diamond prospector, is discovered in the hands of a band of cannibals. He ties a locket containing his mother's picture to a bush, thinking help may arrive. In this he is not mistaken, as Corporal Walton of His Majesty's police, soon discovers it. Thus begins the unfolding of a plot much stronger and more complicated than the average one, uniting the various threads of an adventure offering. Walton throws a rope over a high cliff and there is a heroic rescue scene. As Cameron reaches the top of the precipice the snake appears, an incident that may well be eliminated as above stated. Some exhibitors will prefer to retain this on the theory that the appearance of a reptile in such a setting is justified. That is a matter to be determined by the temper of the spectators before whom the picture may be shown.

Cameron and Walton become separated by the natives without learning each other's identity. A year later both love the girl missionary, played by Betty Harte. A visitor from the diamond mines at Kimberley appears and is sent to Cameron's cabin. Cameron is tempted to kill him and make away with the 30-karat diamond he carries. He refrains as a result of Betty's religious teachings. But later when the girl goes to his cabin the visitor is found murdered and the stone gone.

One of the best things in this offering is the manner in which the murder mystery is introduced. Even the spectator has no inkling of how it came about, and the consequence of this is that good suspense is maintained through the numerous exciting scenes. Cameron, fleeing through the bush, is captured by Walton. He later saves Walton's life, after finding the locket containing his mother's picture on his person. The scene at the poisoned pool, where Cameron struggles with the delirious Walton to keep him from drinking, is compelling in its intensity. Both men are stripped of their shirts in this struggle and later Cameron carries Walton home upon his back. The girl then saves Cameron from execution for the murder, by discovering the real criminal dead at the pool.

This is a strong offering of its type. Many of the scenes would have been mere melodrama in less competent hands, but are given a strong touch of realism by the performers named above.

Fox Academy's New Policy

Excerpts from Grand Opera to Be Presented in Conjunction with Special Feature Photoplays.

WILLIAM FOX, well known impresario of New York City, who has blazed many an amusement trail, is serving Academy of Music audiences in the Fourteenth Street community of the Greater City with grand opera in homeopathic doses with moving pictures as the sugar coating for the pill. On Monday, August 31, he inaugurated a new policy at the Academy which seems destined to make that well-known temple of amusement more successful than it has ever been before—and the Academy has had days as palmy as those of any theatre in New York.

The feature of the new program at the Academy each week is to be a grand opera tabloid presented by the International Grand Opera Co., an organization comprising about a dozen splendidly trained vocalists who have had wide experience in the work they are doing. In addition to the grand opera tabloid each week, there are to be other high class vocal numbers, the selections coming from the grand opera, as well as a program of the very best photoplays obtainable.

From 8 o'clock until 11 o'clock Monday evening, the Academy was crowded, each of its 3,100 seats being occupied by an enthusiast who had come to express his approval of the new program of entertainment. The opening number was the "William Tell" overture by the symphony orchestra of thirty-five pieces which has been organized for the house. Then followed "Sealed Orders," the big feature photoplay which proved so successful some weeks ago when first shown around New York and has been constantly growing interest since that time because of the war situation in Europe. The grand opera excerpt from the "Cavaleria Rusticana" followed and was received with wild applause. The picture presented was a strikingly beautiful one. The orchestra has been placed on the Academy stage behind a rustic fence and just in front of another small stage which, while it looks like a toy in the spacious theatre, is sufficiently large to accommodate a dozen people and take a complete set of scenery. The general effect of the little stage upon a stage, with the brightly colored scenic setting, etc., was striking. Mme. Anna Frery, Sig. Giuseppe Mauro, and Mms. Amelia Sedelmeyer were the principals appearing in the scene from "Cavaleria" and sang in pleasing voice. The Hearst-Selig Pictorial, a scenic subject, and "Well, Well," a Joker comedy, were the other motion pictures shown. The prologue from "Pagliacci" was splendidly sung as another big musical feature of the program.

To direct the destinies of his new venture at the Academy Mr. Fox has engaged the services of Fred. M. McClintic, widely known in the motion picture trade by reason of his previous association in the capacity of manager of a number of the higher class photoplay theatres. The initial program certainly reflected great credit upon all those who had to do with its creation and Mr. McClintic says that there are even bigger and better things planned for the future.

TO REPRODUCE "BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS."

Motion pictures will play an important part in the reproduction of the "Battle of New Orleans" that is to be refought Jan. 8th, 1915, on the identical battle ground, exactly one hundred years from the time General Jackson and his "backwoods rabble" hurled back the seasoned veterans under Packenham.

This celebration, which is under the jurisdiction of the Louisiana Historical Society, will mark the end of the "Hundred Years of Peace" series of celebrations and the fighting over of the historic battle will be the principal attraction. The scenario is now being written by Stanley Clisby Arthur, of New Orleans, who is the chairman of the committee on motion pictures for the Historical Society.

"The Voice of Innocence"

A Two-Reel Kleine-Cines Presenting a Dramatic Story of Second Marriage.

Reviewed by Robert C. McElravy.

THIS two-reel subject is a study of second marriage and the attending misfortunes which sometimes follow. It is enacted by a French cast of unusual excellence, four principal characters carrying the entire story. The scenes comprise some attractive interior home settings, garden walks and a number of prison views.

The movement in the first reel is leisurely and establishes the relationship of the characters in a natural, effective manner. The father of the girl becomes infatuated with his beautiful stenographer. The girl is in love with her father's secretary. She discovers her father's love and is unfavorably impressed with the woman. No particular reason is shown for her repugnance, and it would have helped the first reel somewhat if Beth had been given some occasion for her dislike.

At the beginning of the second reel the father has married his stenographer. She immediately proceeds to make things unpleasant for Beth, and in a short time the girl discovers that Mrs. Landis is trying to lure away her lover, Frank.

Beth confides her suspicions to her father, who refuses to countenance anything reflecting upon his wife. Mrs. Landis is present at this scene and in a fit of rage seizes a revolver and shoots at Beth. The shot goes wild and wounds her husband so seriously that he loses the power of speech and becomes a paralytic.

The subsequent scenes furnish something of an innovation in the way of curtailing obvious situations. The detectives appear and conduct their investigation. Beth is charged with the crime by Mrs. Landis, who has artfully arranged matters to throw suspicion upon her. Instead of the usual trial scene, Beth is shown immediately entering upon her sentence in a prison for women.

The detectives evidently remain still unconvinced of the girl's guilt, for they continue working on the case. The husband's refusal to eat and drink from his wife's hand gives them additional suspicions. Later the wife confesses her guilt, believing the crime could not be fastened upon her owing to her husband's condition. This feature seemed a little unconvincing. An operation upon the husband restores his speech and very soon thereafter the girl procures her freedom and the wife pays the penalty for her action.

This production is commendable for its compactness and the manner in which it works up to a strong climax and then disposes of the subsequent incidents in as few scenes as possible.

KIEWERT, OF BIO-CARBONS, RETURNS.

Carbon Man Had Exciting Experience in Getting Away from War-Ridden Europe—Trying to Get Carbon Supplies.

Robert W. Kiewert, president of the Charles L. Kiewert Company, importers of Bio Carbons, returned to the United States last week by way of Quebec, after a rather adventuresome trip to Europe, where he had gone to arrange for certain improvements in the Bio Carbon service. Mr. Kiewert stopped in New York for a few days before going on to Milwaukee where the headquarters of his company is located. He reports that the foreign carbon factories have all been closed by the war and will be obliged to remain closed until the present situation is cleared up. While the stock of bio-carbons in this country has all been distributed Mr. Kiewert is using every effort to get through several shipments that have been help up by the difficulty in getting transportation.

Speaking of some of his experiences in the war zone Mr. Kiewert said that he was in Berlin at the time the declaration of war was promulgated. He had taken the precaution to secure his passports the day before and so was able to get away promptly with the first rush. Ten thousand trunks were at the railway station when he went to board the train to Belgium, but Mr. Kiewert hustled his own baggage into the car and got out safely. He had to stand nearly all the way, reaching port nearer dead than alive. On the way across the channel to London the steamer was fired upon for failing to display her colors and the shell burst very close to where Mr. Kiewert stood on the deck.

The ship finally arrived and Mr. Kiewert got to London where he partook of the first food he had had in forty hours.

SIDNEY OLCOTT BACK, TOO.

Among the Americans who returned on the White Star liner Adriatic, which arrived Saturday, August 29, were the members of the Sidney Olcott Feature Company, who have been at Beaufort, County Kerry, Ireland, for several months taking pictures with that strong flavor of the Irish bog. Mr. Olcott declares that it was only through his close friendship with the White Star people that his company received good accommodations, though they had to pay nearly double the regular passage rates. He said that everything was in a turmoil in Great Britain and that it is with the greatest difficulty that Americans secured transportation home.

Although no one wanted to be chased by a German warship Mr. Olcott had saved some negatives and was daily on the qui vive for events. Fortunately he was disappointed and the Adriatic reached port without any mishap or adventure.

Miss Grant, leading woman of the Olcott company, was so glad to get back to the United States that she declared nothing would ever tempt her abroad again. She left New York last week for a visit to her home in Seattle, where she will remain for several weeks.

KLEINE BRANCH OFFICE BUSINESS BOOMS.

George Kleine's branch offices are now equipped to meet the needs of picture theaters of every kind. In addition to many two and three-reel subjects and the great Kleine multiple-reel successes, every office is now provided with prints of two newcomers, "Spartacus" and "The Lion of Venice." Each office has been thoroughly drilled in the Kleine system of efficiency and is capable of offering the uttermost service. Orders are taken care of promptly. The services of the Branch Manager and the Kleine Publicity Department are at the call of the exhibitor. In this way the Kleine product has been made a by-word among the better class of exhibitors who appreciate the value of a service that consists of more than the mere shipping of prints.

"Jess of the Mountain Country"

Little Stars Twinkle Brightly in World Film Picture of a Good Story, Played Wholly by Children—Really Charming.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

IT will not be easy to tell exhibitors just what this picture is or tries to be. Of course, to begin with, "Jess of the Mountain Country," the story which the picture sets forth, has exceptional qualities as a story. Some may presume that the producer who put on a version of this story, played entirely by children, and with a little girl only seven years old in the role of the delightful heroine, Jess, did so with the sole object of making comedy of it. That may even be just so; but in any case he has made his little players act well. This acting and the story as these children act it have a touch that is all their own. It is amusing, but it is just as charming as amusing, and we heartily and wholly commend it as an offering of entertainment for any really human audience, especially of the better class. It certainly gave this reviewer real pleasure.

Now, of course, it isn't the same story as would be told by older actors; but, as we write it, we are the more vividly reminded how effective the love passages and friendship scenes in it are, on account of the sincerity and simplicity of these little people. The story is a romance of a rich youth who falls in love with Jess, a ragged, mountaineer girl. Ednamac Wilson, she's only seven, who plays the part, rides like an equestrienne and gallops about with perfect ease just as any cowgirl actress. In the love scenes her animated face glows like some bright flower. The role of the hero, Jack Gibbons, a raw youth just home from college, had insurmountable difficulties for a younster like Antrim Short, fourteen; but in the character's simpler moments he is very commendable. Jack's sister, May Gibbons, is played by Gertrude Short, perhaps a year or so older, and is also very well done. Perhaps the best played role of all is "Shorty" Grandon, taken by Marion Emmons, and we say so because this player shows observation. There is more natural and convincing mimic, imitation of life in his acting.

"Shorty" has a sister, a blase society girl, who is played by Utanah La Reno, and she also shows observation astonishing in one so young. The role of the farmer, played by Willard Gardner, is at many moments a clearly imitated part as far as walk and bearing go and exhibits natural ability though of a somewhat simpler kind. We also want to mention the little darkie servants, played by Eilcen Gooden and Alfred Boyd, though there is no one in the cast who does not deserve high praise.

But it is the producer who we feel most like praising. It was a somewhat bold attempt to undertake this picture with children, but we count it a success, because he has not only kept the acting pertinent to the story and kept the scenes simple and natural, but has co-ordinated all the complicated elements with a mental balance that makes the humor effective and charming. The photography is also commendable.

Miss Edna Flugrath

MISS EDNA FLUGRATH is a brilliant young American actress, formerly with the Edison Company, and now a member of one of the Stock Companies of the London Film Company, Ltd., of London, England, whose American representatives are the Cosmofotofilm Co. of New York City.

She takes the part of "Lady Betty," daughter of Lord Talbot, Secretary to the British Prime Minister, in the film entitled "England's Menace" which is creating such a sensation in New York just now, having been shown for the first time in America at the Million Dollar Strand Theatre on Broadway for the week ending August 29. All who have been fortunate enough to see this remarkably timely film have witnessed Miss Flugrath's wonderfully clever enactment of her difficult part, which, among other things, involves a flight on a motor cycle at top speed, a feat accomplished with the utmost dexterity by Miss Flugrath, in spite of the fact that she had to learn to ride a motor cycle in order to take the part. She has been with the London Film Co. several months and is looked upon already as a "very bright and shining light" with a brilliant future.

Miss Edna Flugrath.

Miss Flugrath began her stage career as a child, playing in "Newport News" with Peter Daly and appearing as Heinrich and Little Minnie with Joseph Jefferson. After a long and arduous training she joined the Metropolitan Opera House forces as premiere danseuse, where she very successfully substituted for Anna Pavlova on several occasions. Her last appearance on the stage was in "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm." She was a member of the Edison Company for about a year but in that short time she won a well-deserved place in the esteem of the photo-play-going public. Her absolute fearlessness has been shown time and time again when she has been called upon to perform feats which required unlimited courage. As the sweetheart of "The Dam Builder" she swung across a deep chasm dangling from the end of a wire cable and climbed down the side of the great Ashokan Dam; then in "Between Orton Junction and Fallonville" she galloped along a railroad track between two approaching locomotives, her horse stumbling over the ties and threatening to throw her at any moment; in "The New Member of the Life-Saving Crew" Miss Flugrath calmly floated out to sea on an upturned rowboat and "A Perilous Cargo" found her scrambling aboard a burning schooner which a few minutes later was blown to pieces by dynamite. And she loves it!

Her charming impetuosity, boundless enthusiasm and her deep sincerity of purpose, are accountable in part for Miss Flugrath's popularity, not a little of which is due to her dauntless spirit and a rare gift of personal charm. Miss Flugrath thinks England a beautiful country and has been happy there.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

What Do the Great Reels Show.

THE intimate place that moving pictures have gained in the minds of men and women the world over is often revealed when one least expects it. So closely are they interwoven with local, national and world events, they have become the media through which the world's joys and sorrows are all powerfully visualized.

The screen in some respects has become the master of the printed page. Its fleeting figures and their phantom action may outline history that is yet to be written. Brave deeds and acts of chivalry are photographed by them on the minds of men with a permanence that the span of human life fails to obliterate. They touch life on all sides with a vividness all their own—the stern, the loving, the joyful, the sorrowful, the peaceful and the warlike.

In this hour of world-gloom, the following tribute to moving pictures by Nicholas Vachel Lindsay, in a recent issue of the Chicago Herald, is a pathetic sermon on the fearful slaughter of men now taking place on European battle-fields:

THE GOODLY, STRANGE LANTERNS.

No prophet, though mighty, forecasted
These lanterns of wisdom and mirth,
These innocent, stuffy, brief conclaves,
These shadow-tales, sweeping the earth.
(What do the great reels show to-night?)
To see the films flashing a legion
Of freemen make haste to the show.
The wealthy are eager and early,
Their autos outside in a row.
The newsboys, the Sunday school children,
The preachers, the weavers of song,
The slum-dwellers, villagers, farmers,
The broken, the hopeful, the strong
Rejoice at these goodly, strange lanterns
Then pour forth to ponder or sleep.
These restless Kinetescope vigils
Our proudest, best patriots keep.
(What do the great reels show to-night?)
O films more beloved than red liquor.
White gates, wellnigh free as the park.
First doors, since mankind made the tavern,
To draw such tired feet, after dark.
Oh, lamps gilding gutters with beauty,
World-gossip, world-splendor and joy,
Equality's wide-flashing art-fire
And Edison's goodliest toy.
But what do the great reels show to-night?
Fairy tales for the heart's delight?
Bits of science, made so plain
They stir the dull ditch-digger's brain?
What do the great reels show to-night?
A civic pageant, brave and bright?
What do the great reels show?

Advertising That Does Not Pay.

The big, romantic, biblical spectacle, "Joseph and His Brethren," is now on at the Auditorium, this city. We wish it well, and that ungrudgingly.

But there is a crow to pick.

In the advance newspaper advertising of the opening of this dramatic attraction, the press agent of Leibler & Co. went out of his way to decry moving pictures and to assail men in the business. In the Evening Post, of August 27, the press agent's advertisement, which occupied seven and one-half inches, single column space, contained the following insulting references:

"Ye Gods! That it should be necessary to pay good money to advertise the fact that The Leibler Co.'s production of 'Joseph and His Brethren,' etc., etc., etc., is Not a Motion Picture! Yet we are compelled to do it."

Then the advertisement goes on to state that out of 1,400 people, who had bought seats in the first day's advance sale, "not fewer than 400 asked the stupid, humiliating question: 'Is "Joseph and His Brethren" a motion picture play?' Indicating, of course, that the 'movie' men have hawked their wares in a spirit of willful misrepresentation, trading upon the methods of the legitimate play-producers, until the public is explicably confused and suspicious, etc., etc."

The press agent must be reminded that he maligns not only moving picture men in his advertisement, but legitimate play-producers as well when he assumes that his methods are the methods of legitimate play-producers. And he also insults the intelligence of the men and women patrons of "Joseph and His Brethren" at the Auditorium, by accusing them of asking "stupid, humiliating questions."

Abuse is the last resort in controversy of the man who is lacking in convincing argument. In this case the press agent of The Liebler Co. is lacking in reason and good taste. Moving picture men can well afford to smile at his silly sally.

Weekly Picture Programs for the Studebaker.

The Studebaker Theater will continue as a moving picture theater throughout the year, under the management of Jones, Linick & Schaefer. This well known firm has closed with the Paramount Picture Corporation, which distributes the products of the Famous Players Film Co., the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co., and the Bosworth, Inc. The theater will open on Saturday, Sept. 5th, with "The Lost Paradise," in which H. B. Warner appears in the leading role.

Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Co., was in the city Friday and Saturday, Aug. 28th and 29th, and closed arrangements for the booking of the product of his company by the firm mentioned. Mr. Zukor expressed the opinion while here that Chicago is ahead of New York in the appreciation of the better class of moving pictures.

"Chicago is the best moving picture city in the country for the big producers," said Mr. Zukor. "This is probably because the moving picture game really got its start here, for it was in Chicago that the first photoplays really were presented. At the present time New York is not showing the appreciation of the expensive film productions that may be observed here."

On being asked for an opinion on the effect of the European war on moving pictures in this country, Mr. Zukor said: "I do not attempt to guess at what the effect of the war will be upon us here. Some have declared that it will help the film exhibitors in this country and hurt the regular stage. This is on the theory that because of the distraction of the war, people will not go to the $2 attractions, but will go to the 10-cent shows instead. I question the wisdom of that guess. I believe that if grieving over the war will cause a man to stay away from the regular theater, it will also cause him to refrain from going to the picture theater.

"I think there is no question of the success of Jones, Linick & Schaefer, who will show our pictures here at the Studebaker, in planning for weekly changes of program. Why shouldn't the big film theaters do the same thing in this particular that the vaudeville houses do?"

Uncle Sam's Moving Pictures.

Word came from Washington recently that the Department of Agriculture has engaged in the making of educational films, which will be exhibited in colleges, universities, state agricultural experiment stations, and in many rural centers.

This work is in charge of the division of the department which has to do with publications. It has been planned to distribute these educational films free, and for exhibition in regular moving picture theaters.

The most recent moving pictures taken by the Department were those showing forest service in the Far West. Rangers are seen in action, and Indians on reservations, and picturesque mountain and woodland views have been secured. Various industries are also treated of in these films, such as the strawberry industry, the dairy industry, etc. The preparation of paper, from the log to the sheet, is the subject of another interesting film, which was made at Madison, Wis.

One of Uncle Sam's feature films on the list is entitled, "Seeing Washington," a film of 2,000 feet, taken when boys of various clubs visited the Capital last fall. Other features show the great variety of animals at the national zoo.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The Selig Polyscope Company's office in London, and the Eclipse Company, of Paris, have established a courier service between the two cities. Two couriers cross the Channel every other day on Selig business. Of the Selig prints used in Europe at the present time, half are printed in London and half in Paris.

W. J. Raiche, manager of the Cozy and Lyric theaters, Marinette, Wis., called at the World office last week. He reported excellent business at both theaters. Mutual programs are offered at the Cozy and Universal at the Lyric, the seating capacities of which are 525 and 610, respectively. Mr. Raiche stated that he is doing very good business with serial features, such as "The Million Dollar Mystery," "Trey O' Hearts," etc. Mr. Raiche engaged the Opera House, Menominee, Mich., recently, to run "The Spoilers." The Opera House seats 1,100 people, and although 100 folding chairs were added to the regular seating capacity, over 200 people were turned away. The admission was 25 cents.

The Peerless Film Exchange, 34 W. Randolph St., this city, has purchased the state rights to "The Greyhound" and "Northern Lights" for the states of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and Iowa, from the Life Photo Film Co. "The Greyhound" is now running at the Zeigfeld. Harvey Brient, general manager of the Peerless Film Exchange, states that it is the intention of the company to release one feature every week, starting some time in September.

Moving pictures are largely employed in the education of the youthful Chinese emperor. They are not all confined to the educational type, however, as a complete series of Selig's jungle pictures were recently added to the list.

George Kleine's four-reel war film, entitled "European Armies in Action," which is having such a heavy run, received a special commission from the San Francisco censorship board last week. San Francisco has determined to bar out vigorously all films calculated to excite racial feeling at this time; but owing to the impartial presentation of the different armies in the Kleine film the censors saw their way clear to pass it. This particular film shows the military and naval forces of England, France, Germany, Switzerland, Belgium and Montenegro. The subtitles have been carefully written so as to give no offense to the different nationalities.

"Safety First," in which moving pictures have largely figured to educate the public, is likely to be made a regular study in the public schools of Chicago, in the near future. Coroner Hoffman's biennial report, emphasizing the importance of public safety devices and precautions, has been recommended as a class book. This report has already been accepted in many colleges and schools throughout the state.

News comes from Minneapolis that an armed bandit recently held up an employee of a bakery company there, and seized a satchel containing $2,000, the company's weekly pay roll. He dashed two blocks to a waiting automobile and escaped, while a dozen persons looked on, thinking it was a moving picture scene.

Anthony Novelli, the well-known photoplayer in Cines-Kleine photo-drama, has joined the Italian colors, according to advices from Milan. He is a commissioned Italian officer. Signor Novelli is best known to moving picture theater goers in this country as the Vinitius of "Quo Vadis" and the Anthony of "Anthony and Cleopatra."

Robert R. Levy, who is seeking the republican nomination for clerk of the Criminal court, is best known to the trade as the president of the Revelry Theater Co. and manager of the theatre of that name at 342 E. 47th St., this city. Mr. Levy has gained a reputation as being one of the aggressive business men of the south side. He is proprietor of the Forty-seventh Street Drug Co., 331 E. 47th St. He is a member of several fraternal organizations and of the Hamilton and Illinois Athletic Clubs. He was born in New Orleans in 1873, and came to Chicago with his parents when two years of age, and has made his home here ever since. Chicago exhibitors should make it a point to do all in their power to assist in his success at the coming primaries.

In a brevity in the last issue it was stated that Miss Kathlyn Williams wrote the scenario and served as sole director of "In Tune with the Wild." This was an error caused by confusing "The Leopard's Foundling" with the feature in question, the scenario of which was written by E. A. Martin, a Selig Western director. Miss Williams has written a novelette based on Mr. Martin's scenario of "In Tune with the Wild."

FLORIDA LEAGUE MEETING.

The third semi-annual convention of the Florida State Branch No. 33, of the M. P. E. L. of America, will meet at West Palm Beach, September 14, 15 and 16th. Headquarters will be at the New Bijou theater, and business will commence Monday, September 14th, at 10 a. m.

We extend our invitation to you or any of your representatives, and will very much appreciate your attendance. Anything that you can do to materially assist this convention will be greatly appreciated by the League.

A fine program has been gotten out by the Board of Trade at West Palm Beach, and rates will be obtained at all hotels.

Signed,

A. H. LA BELLE, Sec'y & Treas.

Independents Propose Organization

Under Leadership of William Fox a "Board of Trade" Is Incorporated and Officers Elected—Promoters Hopeful of Success.

RESPONDING to a circular letter issued by William Fox, of the Greater New York Film Renting Exchange and other amusement enterprises, about fifty motion picture men representing independent manufacturers, independent exchanges and picture theatres gathered at the Hotel McAlpin, New York, Saturday, August 29, to consider the advisability of forming a trade organization. Mr. Fox called the meeting to order and stated the object of the meeting in a rather lengthy address, in which he rehearsed his own troubles with the Motion Picture Patents Company for the purpose of illustrating the necessity for organization. In substance Mr. Fox said:

Undoubtedly you understand the necessity for those of us who are not in sympathy with the method of the Motion Picture Patents Company, the Universal Film Mfg. Company, or the Mutual Film Company to organize a central body, to keep in closer touch with the situation than perhaps many of us have up to this time. I have carefully investigated trade conditions in other industries and I cannot find any business, with so many millions of dollars invested as there are in the motion picture business, that has not a Board of Trade or a Chamber of Commerce to protect its interests. While it may not be necessary to remind many of you of conditions which existed in 1908, still there may be some of you here who may not be as familiar with the situation as I would like you to be and, therefore, I would briefly recite the condition in which the film industry found itself toward the close of the year 1908 and what happened subsequent thereto.

The formation of the Motion Picture Patents Company began an era of oppression and tyrannical rule that was selfish, unpitying and remorseless. When it was organized the exchanges and the exhibitors were assured that its purpose was beneficent and that the exchanges then in business and the exhibitors would be protected. You know that these promises were not kept and that instead of being of benefit it was the instrument of destruction, for having gotten control of the business through the agency of the Patents Company, the manufacturers who are now in the trust created the General Film Company, which accomplished the result which was the object of its formation, and that is to get a complete monopoly of the industry. In this connection it is a matter of history that those in control of the General Film Company destroyed many a worthy man who had built up a business as a result of a life time of toil if he did not yield to the exactions of this big powerful combination. Many a man who had his last cent invested in the motion picture business was pauperized because the General Film Company wanted his plant as part of the monopoly it set out to obtain.

As a result of the operations of the General Film Company when the month of November, 1911, came every rental company in the United States was wiped out of existence, excepting my company, the Greater New York Film Rental Company. Fortunately for me, I was in a position where I could refuse their offer of one hundred thousand dollars, to sell out, and as you know I conducted the fight on principle. The manner in which I was treated is illuminating as to the methods that were employed. After they had disposed of all the other companies by either buying them up or driving them out of business, I was offered one hundred thousand dollars to sell out, which you know I refused to accept. Thereupon they cancelled my agreement and threatened not to supply me with any more films. They began new negotiations with me to buy me out and when they thought they had me acquiescent they said that so long as I was willing to sell they would withdraw the cancellation of my agreement, thus clearly demonstrating that the cancellation of my agreement was merely for the purpose of compelling me to sell and when, thereafter, I notified them I would not sell they again cancelled my agreement.

As you know, I took the matter to the courts through my counsel, former assistant corporation counsel, Gustavus A. Rogers, and Mr. Saul E. Rogers, and made a complaint to the Department of Justice; and we went before Attorney General Wickersham, and after he had the facts brought to his attention of the hundreds of cases of the wrong-doing of the Motion Picture Patents Company and the General Film Company, he, after giving them an opportunity to be heard, declared that in his opinion they were violating the Sherman law, and proceedings under that act, as you know, were begun. The testimony in that case has been closed and a hearing tentatively set for Sept. 14 before Judge Dickinson in Philadelphia, but adjournment was made from Sept. 14 to Nov. 4 of this year.

Don't you know that if I had lacked courage and had submitted; that had I, as the last man attacked submitted, the monopoly would have been so complete that not a single man in this room would have been in business to-day. And yet none of you who are present did anything to help me either financially or even wrote me giving me your moral support. I have determined that this condition of affairs is unjust and that it is your duty, even at this late day, to come in so that we might act in a united fashion. And yet you know and must realize that until Attorney General Wickersham and his very able assistant, Mr. Grosvenor, began the conduct of the government suit it was then, and then only, that the market was opened to the independent manufacturer of films, whereas before that you had no chance at all. You know that the Patents Company said to the exhibitor if you exhibit a picture that is not licensed, you will exhibit no more of our licensed pictures.

I had millions of dollars invested in New York theatres and could not exhibit independent films in them. I was told the moment I did that they would erect theaters right next door and put me in the condition they wanted me in. Then when I found that the Kinemacolor pictures had a certain novelty about them, I inquired of the government whether I could exhibit them in my theaters in conjunction with the licensed film. When they said yes, I said: Gentlemen, you can all do your worst, I am going to run Kinemacolor. From that date on independent pictures were permitted to run together with licensed pictures in the same theaters. There is no proper organization to fight the Trust, that cases come up here and there that get no proper support, and that therefore the Patents Company always have won out. When the Universal Film Mfg. Company was sued they did not ask everybody to chip in and help. They did not say we have been served with papers, are sued, let us get together, this is an action that belongs to all of us manufacturers, and they did not go to Kenyon & Kenyon, the ablest film attorneys in the country, who have made a special study of the subject. No. They went to a set of attorneys who did not know anything about the situation. I claim that the Universal did not defend this suit as vigorously as they might have, and that they are open to the suspicion that they are all working in conjunction to hold the market—the Universal, the Mutual and the Patents Company. This would not be the case if we had a proper Board of Trade to take care of such actions. Should one of the members of the Board of Trade be sued it is easier for twenty to chip in one thousand dollars each than for one to spend the whole twenty thousand dollars.

The Patents Company has proper representation in Washington, while the other manufacturers have not, and therefore, when anything comes up, they have somebody to look out for their interests and nobody to oppose them. Therefore, everything goes if they want it to go. On Sept. 14 there was to be an argument in Philadelphia with reference to whether or not the Motion Picture Patents Company and their allied manufacturers did violate the Sherman law. This could have been argued six months ago, but they asked for postponement after postponement, but the hearing is now set for Nov. 4, and I am reliably informed that it will be argued on that day without any further postponement. I believe it is only fair we should have representation if the government wins, and when a decree is to be entered we should have something to say as to what the form of that decree shall be. The reason the meeting was called was so that we could have legal representation in every state in the union, to present our sentiments at every hearing in relation to the motion picture business.

At the conclusion of his remarks Mr. Fox introduced Gustavus A. Rogers, who has been his attorney in the numerous suits brought by and against Mr. Fox. Mr. Rogers spoke at some length upon the desirability of organization, calling attention to the necessity of united action in the matter of pending trust legislation before Congress, stating that up to the present no appearance had been made in behalf of the independent interests except by himself. Matters of this kind, he said, should be handled by all the concerns interested through the proper organization of the trade.

Following Mr. Rogers remarks were made by Jesse L. Goldberg, of the Life Photo Film Company; H. M. Horkheimer, of the Balboa Film Company, and Louis Selznich, of the World Film Corporation, who related their several experiences and emphasized the need for a board of trade.

With the matter well in hand Chairman Fox was elected temporary president of the organization, and Walter Sammis was named as temporary secretary. Mr. Fox then explained that he had already taken the precaution to have the organization incorporated and he presented the meeting with a charter, regularly issued by the Secretary of State of New York under the "board of trade act" to the "National Independent Motion Picture Board of Trade, Inc." The purpose of the organization as stated by the charter is as follows:

We, the undersigned, being desirous of associating ourselves together for the purpose of forming a non-stock membership corporation to exercise the powers and functions of a Board of Trade, affecting the manufacturer, leasing and exhibiting of motion pictures, as more particularly described hereinafter, and pursuant to and in conformity with acts of the Legislature of the State of New York, relating to Membership Corporations, do hereby certify and declare that we are all of full age, two-thirds of us are citizens of the United States, and all of us residents of the State of New York.

We do further certify and declare as follows:

First—That the particular objects for which said corporation is formed are as follows, viz:

To foster trade and commerce, and the interests of those engaged either as manufacturers, distributors and exhibitors of motion pictures; to reform abuses relative thereto, to secure freedom from unjust or harmful exactions, to eliminate unfair competition and restraint of trade, and combinations in restraint of trade; to obtain legislation necessary to correct certain present harmful conditions to the motion picture business and to regulate trade and commerce in that business so that the same shall be free, open, unrestrained and fair to all; to diffuse accurate and reliable information as to the standing of manufacturers, distributors and exhibitors and other matters; to procure uniformity and certainty in the customs and usages of trade and commerce; to obtain a standardization of machines, films, appliances and appurtenances to the said business; to settle and arbitrate differences between and among its members and to promote a marked enlarged and friendly intercourse between and among the members threof.

Second—That the corporate name by which said corporation hereby to be formed shall be known and distinguished is and shall be National Independent Motion Picture Board of Trade, Inc.

Third—That the territory in which the operations of the said corporation are to be principally conducted is all of the States, territories, insular possessions, and all other possessions of the United States of America.

Fourth—That the principal office of the said corporation shall be located in the City of New York, County of New York and State of New York.

Fifth—That the number of directors of said corporation shall be five (5).

At the suggestion of Mr. Fox committees were then appointed on by-laws, ways and means and election of officers, and the party adjourned to partake of a plentiful luncheon arranged for the occasion.

Upon reconvening the meeting took up the question of membership upon the report of the committee, but the subject with others was finally referred to the committee on by-laws consisting of these persons: William Fox, L. J. Selznich, A. H. Sawyer, Arthur N. Smallwood and Edward Roskan.

In the matter of the election of officers the following board was chosen:

President—William Fox, Wm. Fox Amusement Co., 126 W. 46th St.; Vice-presidents, A. H. Sawyer, of Sawyer, Inc., 1600 Broadway, N. Y.; J. M. Shear, Solax Co, Fort Lee, N. J.; H. M. Horkheimer, Balboa Feature Films, Long Beach, Cal.; B. K. Bimberg, Schuyler Amusement Co., 82d St. and Broadway, N. Y.; H. S Schwalbe, Electric Theatre Supply Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

Treasurer—Winfield R. Sheehan, Box Office Attraction Co., 126 W. 46th St.

Directors—William Fox, Wm. Fox Amusement Co.; L. J. Selznich, World Film Corporation; A. H. Sawyer, of Sawyer, Inc.; H. M. Horkheimer, Balboa Feature Films, Long Beach, Cal.; Louis Rosenbluh, Greater New York Film Rental Co.

Permanent headquarters have been established at 220 West Forty-second Street, twelfth floor.

Mr. Fox has since said that these officers are temporary and that changes in the board will undoubtedly be made. He intimated that Mr. Sheehan would not, for business reasons, retain the office of treasurer. A meeting of the executive committee is to be held to dispose of this and other matters.

Edwin Barbour

MOTION pictures have no more interesting or lovable "old man" character than "Uncle Ned" Barbour. His wonderfully human portrayals of the roles assigned to him have won him as high a place in the silent drama as he held for years upon the legitimate stage, and many photoplay patrons are asking for his history.

This is what Mr. Barbour says about himself:

Edwin Barbour.

"I was indifferent as a country school teacher, unpromising as a lawyer, so with a little money at my command I bought a half-interest in a fly-by-night theatrical outfit and became a manager. Finding that it took real money to pay royalties I conceived the idea of writing my own plays. 'Antietam,' a war play, was the first, and, if possible, the worst; but they endured it for a while and in kindness I slipped by. And then I became an actor. Some of my company wanted money occasionally while I must act without—and I did. After a while the rough edge of real experience rounded me out and I found myself among those who knew nothing of my humble origin, and lo! I was a real actor.

"By keeping my head shut about many things, and by a bit of judicious bragging here and there, I finally forced myself on to the notice of several important managers who allowed me to get by with such parts as Seth Preene in 'Lights O' London,' Dunstan Kirke in 'Hazel Kirke,' etc., without creating any special disturbance. In fact, I became spoken of as the 'old man' of the company before I had passed my twenty-sixth birthday. In the meantime I had dramatized Rider Haggard's 'She' and it had created much comment and made a lot of money on the road. About three years ago I drifted into Lubin's haven of rest, where I have been kindly permitted to remain ever since."

In mentioning his work as author and producer, however, Mr. Barbour modestly neglects to emphasize the fact that more than a dozen of his plays were the biggest hits of their day, "Northern Lights," "Antietam," and "The White Squadron" striking the chord of public approval so strongly as to bring forth dozens of imitations.

Uncle Ned did not come to the movies because he was "done" as a legitimate actor, but because the same energy that made him leave his home in Kansas at the age of fifteen and join the army to fight Indians in the West, is still with him, and like another "Young feller" he wanted to get in on something new and make a go of it.

Besides his excellent acting he has contributed many valuable scenarios to the Lubin Company. Probably the most successful of his photoplays is the five-reel feature, "When the Earth Trembled," and Uncle Ned is only getting started.

Edward Thanhouser Home From Europe

Talks Entertainingly of Pictures and Picture Houses on Both Sides of the Sea.

By Hanford C. Judson.

WAR caught Mr. Thanhouser, with Mrs. Thanhouser and their children, on a walking trip. They had reached Switzerland after a pleasant jaunt from southern France when war and mobilization, calling the workers one and all from every city, town and little village, left life at a dead standstill. There was nothing to do but come home. Fortunately, starting in time, they got their baggage through without loss. From Lucerne, where they chanced to be, to Genoa, where they caught the SS. Principe di Udine, is a short trip; but their trunks were four days late, though they managed to come in on time for the ship. Well out at sea the Udine was stopped by a cruiser. It was an exciting experience and might have been more so if the ship's flag had not been of a neutral nation.

To illustrate how the war has interrupted all the normal life of Europe Mr. Thanhouser told of an experience he had trying to get some of his papers from a safety vault. There wasn't an employe in the bank who could open the safe for him, and it was necessary for him to get the president of the bank himself to come. Every theater and picture house in Lucerne, he added, has been closed by order of the authorities. Neutrality in Switzerland is very important, and he commented that perhaps there was some apprehension that an offering might excite the emotions of some and cause a disturbance. But, he added, none of the countries involved has any money to spare for amusements. It is a grim life and death struggle, and all their energies are bent to weather it through. He thinks that, no matter how the war turns out, this will be so for a good long while. Bread and butter will long be more important than pictures in Europe. Picture making has absolutely ceased. The actors are at the front, and some of them won't come back. At present only old men, women and little children are left to do what they can in the fields. Most of the crops will have to rot where they stand, for there is no one to get them in.

Mr. Thanhouser had many interesting things to say about the general progress in the European motion picture business and art. The war has caught all this in a choking grip. Speaking of these things pleasantly in his parlor at the Great Northern Hotel in New York City, as though these advances and this progress so painfully made and so eagerly labored for were still going on, it is probable that neither Mr. Thanhouser nor the interviewer vividly realized how grim and terrible a picture of war's destruction his account was drawing. These valuable activities have ceased; perhaps they are being destroyed. And, of course, what is true of the motion picture business is true of all kinds of activity, and especially true of all kinds of artistic and scientific activity.

Mr. Thanhouser thinks that one of the most important and hopeful advances in all the motion picture business was being made in Germany. Some of the best pictures he has ever seen were recently made in Germany. There producers and players have been growing more and more skillful in setting forth heart-stirring things by means of repose and mental suggestion and in escaping from that restlessness and continuous motion which must, of course, tend to make the picture's message less sure of itself and shallower. Some of the best German pictures, he thinks, have been made by the Mestere Company, with Hetty Porter as the leading woman.

In France, too, he found improvement, and particularly in the work of the Gaumont Company. The best improvement in their work, he sees, has been in the quality of the stories; but there has also been progress all along the line—acting, stagecraft and photography. He was delighted with the show offered at the Gaumont Palace in Paris which seats as many as the Hippodrome, here in New York, yet exhibits to a full house every night and sells standing room—all at high prices. The well balanced variety of the show pleased him. There were black-and-white pictures, colored films and singing pictures with short scenics and educationals; but no songs or anything that wasn't photographic. He added, though, that he had just come from an afternoon at the Strand Theater in New York City and was enthusiastic over the way the pictures are handled there. It is the best conducted picture house that he has yet seen.

In England he finds that picture makers have proved their misty climate is not the impossible handicap to good photography which many have long supposed it to be. Some recent English photography is as clear and as good as that made on the Continent or elsewhere. Many fine and interesting offerings have recently been turned out in English studios.

He finds that architecture and decoration of the picture houses are considered far more important abroad than these things are on this side of the sea. Art Nouveau is markedly in fashion there, and especially in Berlin, where there are picture houses decorated with a grace and beauty that are never seen here. He thinks, too, that we in America have not taken the same care in choosing and balancing the program as abroad, where an evening's entertainment is apt to be more satisfactory as a whole. He is not at all sure that our feature films are, as a rule, just what the people want. Of course, he said, any reasonable length of film at all will be a delight, if the story warrants that length; but he finds that in making of many features we, on this side, have been too often tempted to pad out for mere length's sake. Yet some of our new features he finds greatly pleasing. He finds, too, that our big features have led us in America to make flattering progress in the handling of big subjects. He is optimistic as to the picture business in the future here in America, both artistically and from a business viewpoint.

REEL FELLOWS WANT CLUB HOUSE.

The long needed place to spend Sunday has been solved by The Reel Fellows of Philadelphia. They have formed a social club where the prominent film men of Philadelphia and adjacent cities who are members can bring their wives and friends to witness the different entertainments which The Reel Fellows' committee will provide. At the first business meeting of The Reel Fellows, held on Sunday, Aug. 30th, at the Ridge Avenue theater, the following officers were elected: E. L. Perry, president; S. Libros, first vice-president; Ben Zer, second vice-president; Sigmund Lubin, third vice-president; Howard G. Bobb, fourth vice-president; Wm. Fox, fifth vice-president; Jack Levy, treasurer; Jay Emanuel, secretary. The Board of Directors consists of all the executive officers and Stanley Mastbaum, Joseph Hebrew, Lewis Swaab and Dave Sablosky.

After the election of officers, a moving picture of the first outing of the Reel Fellows to Atlantic City on Sunday, Aug. 16, was projected and received much enthusiasm. Plans are already under way for the building of a permanent club house.

Miss Gauntier Returns from Europe

Recites a Harrowing Story of the Mad Rush of Americans to Get Home.

GENE GAUNTIER is back—and she states emphatically that she never wants to see the face of the Statue of Liberty again—at any rate until this dreadful war has passed into history. When the Olympic slipped into her dock Saturday afternoon, she stood on the deck of the second cabin, frantically waving the little American flag she had carried away with her, vainly scanning each face for a familiar one, but for the first time in her fourteen trips she was friendless—her cable, her wireless, to say nothing of her letters, had never reached. And after a wild dash across Sweden, Norway, the North Sea, England and the Atlantic Ocean, she reached New York without even a nickle to telephone friends to come for her. But let Miss Gauntier tell her own story:

"I was in Lyckorna, Sweden, a summer resort on the North Sea, when news of the declaration of war reached us. And almost simultaneously the banks closed. My brother-in-law banks in Berlin, and had two days previously sent all surplus cash over. Of course I began to worry immediately about getting home, for already the North Sea had been mined and all ports closed. The telegraph and telephone systems had been taken over by the government, which was mobilizing, and all day long, without cessation, the church bell tolled, bringing all landstormmen from the fields and fishing grounds, in carts, on bicycles, or afoot. The trains were taken over to transport troops—for Sweden, with a population of only 5,000,000, has an army of 500,000. And an intense fear of the Russians, who have eyed her so greedily for years, has called all her forces to arms to defend her neutrality. The cry 'The Russians are coming' means more to the Swedes, and especially to the women, than 'The Turks are coming.'

"After trying to get into communication with the U. S. Consuls at Gottenburg and Stockholm, and failing, we gathered together all our financial resources and went up to Stockholm, where my sister had to report for rehearsals at the Royal Opera on the 14th. We found the orchestra, the chorus, the head regisseur and kapelmeister, to say nothing of the singers themselves, had been called. Here, also, I found that no passage could be booked before late in October, and heaven knows what will have happened on the Atlantic by that time. Also, the American Consul would not register me as I had no passport nor letter to show I was an American citizen. As I have carried two passports until they were outlawed, one of them through Turkey and Italy during their war, and had never had to even show them, I had failed to provide one on this short trip. It was nearly my undoing.

"For weeks the several thousand Americans had been meeting at the Embassy, working together in their efforts to get passage home. Some had gone by steerage on the Scandinavian line, but this company would not take women, the accommodations being too horrible. I had been in Stockholm but five days when I happened in the Reisebureau just as a cable was received saying the Olympic had been put into commission again, and would book a number of second-class passengers. Among us we did not have enough money to buy my passage to Liverpool and pay for my steamer ticket, but I had an inspiration. I paid a deposit of three pounds and they cabled for my reservation. At the same time I cabled my firm to pay in my passage at the New York office and cable the ticket to Liverpool. Then began a race with time to catch the boat.

"I left early Wednesday morning, expecting to breakfast on the train, but found all diners were taken off, and was compelled to fast all day. Many times we changed trains, and at Christiania I was crowded into a stateroom with two berths and occupied by three women and two children. Arrived at Bergen, where we were to embark to cross to Newcastle, I found that of the whole trainful, I was the only one whose trunks had come through—all others were forced to leave baggage in Norway. The trip across the North Sea was filled with suspense. We ran on a much wider course to the Shetland Islands and down the coast of England. A fog and blanketed lights and full speed did not add to our peace of mind.

"At Newcastle we were held up for British officers to come aboard to arrest a German disguised as a priest, and lock into a stateroom a young German table steward. We were corralled into a small saloon and the doors locked and portholes blanketed while we passed the forts and, with half an hour to make the last train to Liverpool, were sent back as we were going up the gangplank to show our passports to the American Consul. Then my heart sank, for I would be left behind with only a ten dollar American bill and Swedish paper which could not be cashed. An American business man who stood beside me, heard my despairing groan, and whispering to me to keep up my courage, rushed me to the smoking room, where we were first of the crowd, pushing and shoving, and vibrating nervousness. Everything was confusion, and to that I owe my escape. As the Consul turned for my passport the gentleman thrust out his—'Is this your wife?' asked the consul, but my benefactor, thinking he referred to the passport, nodded—just then an officer appeared and called the Consul—the crowd surged, the gentleman grabbed his passport and me, and we fled in the ensuing confusion. I sank into the carriage limp, while he returned to the boat for my trunks, and we started with barely time to catch the train. A mile away he suddenly asked, 'Are those your trunks?' and with a groan, I looked and answered, 'No.' A wild dash back to the pier, and a wilder one to the station, my watch in my hands, seeing the precious minutes tick away—and we arrived to find the train late in starting, and tumbled into a carriage as she moved out. And still my trunks were with me.

"The scene in Liverpool on our arrival is beyond description. The Olympic was moored out in the Mersey as the Government had taken the docks for transports. These were teeming with confusion, the Franconia was about to sail and the four thousand who were later crammed onto the Olympic, together with hundreds of truckloads of trunks, and thousands of spectators, made it a scene not to be forgotten. Richly gowned and bejeweled women crying hysterically, some fainting in the packed crowd, men with grips and suitcases and an occasional trunk on their backs—porters loaded down, and numbers crying to be taken on to sleep on the decks, made the scene unforgettable. Everyone must show tickets or cable reservations, and many who probably had passage, but nothing to show for it, were turned back. I had my reservation from Stockholm, with three pounds paid on it, and got by. But only as far as the purser on the ship. After waiting an hour in line for my stateroom assignment, I found there was no ticket cabled for me—my cable had never reached them I found out afterward. I had no money, and there were a hundred clamoring for my place, and the tender was waiting to take back any who might have escaped on board without tickets. There was nothing to do but play the dear old American game of bluff—and I did. Assuming my most ingenious air I stated there must be a mistake, as I had the assurance of the office in Liverpool that a ticket had been cabled me from Mr. Lindsey, the White Star agent in New York; that he would be at the pier undoubtedly when we arrived, and explained who I was. They instantly remembered our many picture taking expeditions on the Adriatic and other boats, and I was saved from stranding in a foreign land.

"The trip across was not unlike the crossing of the North Sea; all portholes and decklights were blanketed, wireless was not erected till we were well out, and we ran through heavy fog and rain most of the time. Twice at night we were chased, but twenty-five knots an hour put distance between our pursuers. Rumor said we were to be landed in Halifax, and not until the day before did we really know we were coming in to New York.

"There was no one to meet me. They had received no word for weeks and had cabled for my whereabouts continually. We never received any of them. So I had to borrow a nickle to telephone the studio I was waiting at the dock for a welcome. I don't think they have recovered from the shock yet."

CLARK HERE BUT WENT.

Frank H. Clark, of the Pittsburgh Inquest Circle, was in town last week, but had to hustle back to Atlantic City, where his wife was waiting for him. Mr. Clark is writer of half of the railroad series with Edward W. Matlack that Kalem is preparing for Miss Helen Holmes. Mr. Clark brought with him five hundred Pittsburgh stogies. He took back with him 490, smoking the rest himself. Outside of that he is more or less a regular author, but it is almost impossible to write a regular story while smoking a Pittsburgh stogie.

GRAND THEATER CHANGES OWNERSHIP.

The Grand Theater, situated in Putnam street, Marietta, Ohio, changed ownership recently. W. J. Vandivert will be the new proprietor, and his son, Walter, will be the manager. The former owner, O. J. Sybert, who has managed the Grand for over four years, retired.

Detroit to Have Duplex Theater

Enables Patrons to See Beginning of Multiple Reels Regardless of Time of Entering Theater.

PLANS have been completed for the construction of the Grand Boulevard Theater on the south side of the Boulevard, about 300 feet east of Woodward avenue, Detroit. According to its architect, Fuller Claflin, of New York, Chicago and Detroit, who is a theater specialist, and who has built several theaters in this city, Detroiters are to be given a chance to enjoy the advantages of a photoplayhouse relatively as far in advance of motion picture theaters of the usual type as the automobile is in advance of what it has supplanted.

The Grand Boulevard Theater is to be built as a "duplex theater," and the advancement claimed for it is in relation to the remedy of an objectionable element in motion picture exhibitions which only duplex theaters can offer. The remedy of this objectionable element lies in the fact that duplex theaters afford those entering after a long photoplay has started an opportunity of witnessing several short picture plays until the long one starts again, whereas in other theaters those entering similarly object to being forced to see the last part of a multiple reel picture before they have seen the first part of it.

Not only do those seeing the last part of a long play first fail properly to understand the story, but they have had the first part spoiled for them by reason of their knowing how it will end. The duplex theater affords an opportunity for remedying this difficulty through the fact that it consists of a first and second auditorium, in either of which those entering at any time may seat themselves. If a long photoplay is on the screen before the first auditorium at the time one enters, he seats himself in the second auditorium, before which he will find a screen on which he will see short productions till the long play starts on the screen before him, at which time the run of short productions will start on the screen before the first auditorium on which the long play has just finished, and vice versa.

Regardless of the time of entering, one may thus always see the beginning of a long play, and while waiting for its commencement be entertained by short productions such as he would otherwise see at its conclusion instead of as a preliminary. In duplex theaters the auditoriums are separated as to sound but not as to a view of each auditorium from the other one. In effect, they constitute what might be termed a single auditorium transversely divided near its center by a proscenium arch faced by seats on each side of the arch.

Those seated on either side of the arch look through it at a picture screen behind those facing them. As the width of the arch is little less than the width of the theatre, one sees through the arch almost as much of the opposite section of the auditorium as if it were undivided by the arch. Connecting the sides of the proscenium opening at its bottom is the usual orchestra pit, stage front and footlights, the arch, orchestra pit, stage front and footlights all being double, or two-faced, having the same appearance in both first and second auditoriums. The effect in a duplex theater is therefore that of two auditoriums facing each other and separated by a shallow stage, at the back of which is the picture screen, the screen and the opposite auditorium being viewed through a stage setting of scenery of the usual type at the sides and top of the proscenium arch. But between the wings and the borders of this setting, in the space through which the pictures are viewed, is a soundproof plateglass screen, consisting of extraordinarily large sheets of glass, one-piece in height and three pieces in width, with ground and polished edges so closely fitted together as to make an invisible joint.

There are two lines of glass forming this screen, the bottoms of each line being considerably further apart than their tops, the vertical surfaces of the sheets thus being thrown at such angles to the lines of sight from the seats as to avoid all reflection from the pictures back of anyone sitting in the seats. The dead-air space between the double lines of this glass screen acts as a sound deadener, and soundproof partitions otherwise separate the first and second auditoriums at all other points.

Consequently the orchestra may be playing in one auditorium and the pipe organ in the other, without interference with each other; and orchestra and pipe organ can be played alternately in either auditorium to suit the nature of the picture which is being viewed from each, respectively. Only one orchestra and one pipe organ are necessary in a duplex theater, the orchestra passing readily from one orchestra pit to the other one as the pictures change correspondingly, while soundproof shutters open and close openings from the organ loft to either auditorium at the will of the organist.

The picture booth for the simultaneous projection of pictures for both auditoriums is located within the lines of the proscenium arch and directly above the soundproof plateglass screen on the stage. The projection of the pictures from this booth into each auditorium, respectively, is in opposite directions onto a screen toward the back of the auditorium.

One of the features of duplex theaters is that no seats in them can be placed within fifty or sixty feet of a picture screen, thus doing away entirely with seats too near the screen for a satisfactory view of the picture. It is intended by the projectors to make the Grand Boulevard Theater the finest photoplayhouse in the Middle West, irrespective of what it is believed it will prove to be as a duplex theater. In this latter connection it is intended that Detroit shall have in it something as an attraction never before offered in a motion picture theater.

MORE PATENT SUITS.

The Mutual Film Corporation, the American Film Manufacturing Corporation, the Majestic Picture Company, the Reliance Picture Company, the Keystone Film Company, the Broncho Motion Picture Company, the Domino Motion Picture Corporation and the New York Motion Picture Corporation, are named as joint defendants in an action brought by the Motion Picture Patents Company in the United States District Court involving the Edison reissue patents controlled by the latter.

The Motion Picture Patents Company also commenced separate actions against Eberhard Schneider, the Cornet Film Company, Willard B. Cook, doing business as the Pathescope and the Dramascope Company, Inc., to protect its rights under the same patents.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"SPARKS OF FATE" (Essanay).

"Sparks of Fate," a thrilling two-reel drama, is to be released by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company Friday, September 18. This picture is without a doubt one of the strongest dramas ever released by the Essanay, and it contains thrills and excitements from beginning to end. Such modern devices as wireless telegraphy and hydro-aeroplanes help to make the production out of the ordinary, to say nothing of the highly commendable work exhibited by the players.

Francis X. Bushman, who plays the leading role, is at his best. Bryant Washburn also does splendid work, and the way in which he handles the extremely difficult part which he has to play, will bring praise from the most severe critic. Pretty Ruth Stonehouse, as usual, does remarkable acting, and in this production especially, more than lives up to her wide reputation.

The story begins with Frank Graham and Wilbur Hayes, two wireless operators at Coast Station No. 4, who are both in love with Mary Donald. The two young men are of exactly opposite dispositions, Wilbur being of a jealous nature and selfish, while Frank is always cheerful and will sacrifice many of his pleasures for the sake of others.

Mary is undecided as to which one she really loves, and when she tells Wilbur this, his jealousy gets the better of him and he tries to start a quarrel with his rival. He does not succeed, so suggests that they play a game of cards, and that the loser is to leave town immediately.

This seems fair to Frank so he agrees to the proposition. The game is played in the presence of the old captain of the S. S. Melba. Wilbur wins by cheating, but is seen by the captain whom he bribes to keep quiet. Frank is heart-broken, but true to the agreement leaves town the next day on the S. S. Melba. That night an explosion takes place in the boiler room of the steamer, and to add to the horror of the situation, a storm blows up. The wireless operator on board the vessel is struck by lightning, so Frank takes the key and flashes the signal for help. Wilbur in Station No. 4 gets the signal, but knowing that Frank is on board the Melba, decides to leave him to his fate.

Just as the old vessel is about to sink, the old captain, conscience stricken, tells Frank that he was cheated by Wilbur. The next day Frank is seen clinging to a piece of wreckage by an aviator. He is picked out of the water half drowned and taken to a hospital where he is delirious for several days. He is confined to his bed for a long period, and in the meantime Mary has decided to marry Wilbur.

One day Frank happens to be reading a newspaper and finds an article stating that the wedding is to take place next day at 5 p. m. Frank is determined that Mary know the truth concerning his rival's underhanded work, so engages the aviator who had saved his life, to speed him to the scene of the wedding in hydro-aeroplane. After a wildly exciting flight, Frank arrives at his home town just before the marriage is to take place, and reprimands his rival for the dishonest methods he used to win Mary. She hears this and her love for Wilbur turns to hate. Frank then draws Mary tenderly to him, and Wilbur leaves the town in disgrace, realizing that had he played honestly he might have won a sweet little wife.

"A GENTLEMAN FROM KENTUCKY" (Victor).

That the best man will win out in the end and that fate is not always as cruel as is usually supposed is brought out in a striking way by "A Gentleman from Kentucky," a Victor two-reel drama, which dates back to the time when the gentlemen of the South were hard drinkers, hard fighters, and masterful lovers.

Warren Kerrigan plays the role of Jack Randolph, who is a Southern gambler, and makes his living by gambling with the aristocracy. He is in love with the daughter of Col. Ben Hastings (M. B. Robbins), who has a proclivity for gambling, but is opposed to a gambler for a son-in-law, and has forbidden his daughter Nell to see Jack. A serpentine character by the name of Extra Hoover, who preys on those whom want places in his power, had acquired much land and many houses, which he rented to the so-called "White Trash." At one time when he was forcing a poor couple to leave their house, Jack happens to be passing and, seeing their poverty, comes to their aid. The wife succumbs to her ailment, owing to the exposure, and because of this Jed, the husband, is driven insane, and goes gunning for Hoover, who is playing cards at the tavern with the Colonel and Jack.

The Colonel accuses Hoover of cheating and Hoover starts to draw, but the Colonel beats him to it. Jack grabs the Colonel's arm, but the gun explodes at the same instant that Jed pulls the trigger of his gun from the outside. Jack thinking that the Colonel has killed Hoover, takes the smoking pistol from his hand and forces him to escape. Jack is placed under arrest and is condemned to death. On the day of the execution, Jed, who has recovered, reads in a paper that Jack will hang for the crime. The gallows is erected and the dawn sees Jack awaiting his fate. But chance intervenes and Jed arrives in time to confess to the crime. Jack is now released and naturally wins the hand of the Colonel's daughter.

Warren Kerrigan plays the part of the gambler, while the rest of the cast is made up of Vera Sisson, George Periolat, M. B. Robbins and C. Raymond Mye. The release date is September 14th.

"WHEN YOUTH MEETS YOUTH" (Kleine).

A heart interest drama of absorbing quality, which has as its climax a sensational duel scene, will be marketed by George Kleine when his two-part feature, "When Youth Meets Youth," is released through the General Film Company Tuesday, September 15. The splendid company which supported Miss Lyda Borelli in Mr. Kleine's "The Naked Truth," the summer attraction at the Candler Theater, New York, is seen to extraordinarily good advantage in this sterling photoplay.

The story concerns a wealthy banker who disowns his son and then becomes engaged to a young woman who imagines herself in love with her elderly suitor. The girl meets the son, living under an assumed name; the call of youth to youth is sounded, and the inevitable occurs. When the father, his son and the young woman are brought together by a series of unforeseen circumstances, a startling climax is enacted.

In addition to its compelling dramatic features, "When Youth Meets Youth" is characterized by superfine acting, beautiful, romantic settings and excellent photography. The quality of the ensemble can best be indicated by a statement that it is in every way fully up to the Kleine standard.

"THE WOMAN WITHOUT A HEART" (Eclectic).

This three-part Eclectic drama is the story of a woman of the tenements who treads rough shod over the hearts and feelings of those nearest her, intent only on one thing, the selfish satisfaction of her own desires for luxury and a good time. From the time that she deceives her fiance, a young mechanic, into giving her money for her wedding outfit and uses it instead to clothe herself for the conquest of wealthier men, to the time when she leaves her mother dying and goes to a ball, her career is one of broken hearts and outrageous callousness. "The Woman Without a Heart" is a powerful story with an obvious moral and is interesting all the way through.

FAVORITE PLAYERS SECOND RELEASE.

For their second release the Favorite Players Film Company has secured the rights to make a photo dramatization of Richard Harding Davis' famous story, "The Man Who Could Not Lose," featuring Carlyle Blackwell in the leading role, scenario by Robert A. Dillon.

MRS. GRAHAM BROUGHT WAR SCENES.

What probably constitutes the first real war moving pictures arrived Saturday, Aug. 29, on the S.S. Olympic, and were grought over from Europe by Mrs. J. C. Graham, wife of the general manager of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

The whole film is not over 200 feet in length and cost altogether $1,400.00, as it was all two cameramen were able to get in three weeks' time.

According to a letter received by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, which was brought by Mrs. Graham, from the caremamen at the front, a cameraman is in danger of instant death if he attempts to take pictures at the seat of trouble now in Europe. A ban has been placed on all moving picture impedimenta, and neither the Allies nor the Germans will permit a cameraman anywhere near the center of action.

This piece of film shows the transfer of some prisoners which were taken at Bruges, which was then the seat of trouble in Belgium, and shows the carnage and devastation that are at present taking place.

STRAND WAR SERIES.

The Strand Film Company, of 145 West 45th street, has completed arrangements with Mr. H. Winik, 35 Little Newport street, London, W., to secure a series of special war pictures which will be distributed in the United States and Canada at the rate of a thousand feet a week, and will be released one week later than the London release date.

The enterprise of the Strand Film Co. and Mr. Winik will enable the vaudeville and motion picture theaters to exhibit actual and authentic war scenes, independent of any program, as the Strand War Series will be distributed exclusively through independent and feature exchanges. The first series of pictures, which will be ready Monday, will be shown at the Strand theater, New York, during the week of September 6th.

NOTICE.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of Sawyer, Incorporated, held August 14th, 1914, at the office of the Company, No. 1600 Broadway, the resignation of William H. Rudolph as director, vice-president, general manager and assistant treasurer of the corporation was accepted.

The present officers of the corporation are: A. H. Sawyer, President and General Manager; Frederick H. Tinker, Secretary and Treasurer.

WHITMAN OFFERS MANUFACTURING FACILITIES.

The Whitman Features Company, which has studios and factory facilities at Cliffside, N. J., offers its accommodations to the trade when companies have no facilities of their own. First-class work at moderate prices is guaranteed.

CHANGES IN UNIVERSAL PUBLICITY STAFF.

Several important changes are about to take place in the publicity department of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. George Gray will go to Los Angeles, Cal., about September 12 to look after the publicity at Universal City. George Stevenson, who has been editor of the Universal Weekly for some time, goes to London to handle the publicity of the Trans-Atlantic Film Company. Paul Gulick, a well known newspaper man who has been doing special work for the Universal for some time, will take Mr. Stevenson's place.

GREAT NORTHERN OPENS RENTAL OFFICE IN MINNEAPOLIS.

The Great Northern Film Company has opened a rental office in Minneapolis, Minn., where all the Great Northern features may be obtained in territory adjacent to that city. So many requests for their pictures have been received of late from that part of the country, and not having a regular distributor in that territory, the Great Northern Company decided to open their own exchange to supply exhibitors in Minnesota, Wisconsin, North and South Dakota with their popular features. The office opened on September 1, with a large number of big productions, and is already doing business.

DAVE THOMPSON BACK WITH THANHOUSER.

Announcement is made by the Thanhouser Film Corporation that David H. Thompson is to appear in moving pictures again. A year ago the Thanhouser company decided that it needed someone to handle its "extra" people and cast the pictures, so Dave was selected because of his good judgment of actors and general knowledge of the business.

"AS WE FORGIVE THOSE." (Lubin).

Harry Chandlee has in this subject written the most pathetic story of his life, one that will bring tears to every heart. All a mistake, but it wrecks lives and costs lives because a silly woman is not content with honest simplicity. The wife thinks that she is too pretty to be the partner of a working man and leaves husband and child with a man of better condition, but black heart. Retribution is dealt out to the sinners, but the forlorn husband tracks the earth to find and wreak vengeance on the wrong man. Years pass and the opportunity comes when the nemesis sees his innocent victim leading a meeting in prayer. He is about to fire the fatal shot when the line catches his ear "As we forgive those who trespass against us." The revolver drops from the demented man's hand and exploding ends the sad and unfortunate life. The picture is made by Col. Joe Smiley, who also plays the leading role; Lilie Leslie, Justina Huff and John Smiley have excellent parts.

Producing Companies Organized

Warner's Program to be Provided by the United Motion Picture Producers, Inc.

The producing companies which are responsible for providing the big complete program to be released by Warner's Features, Inc., met last Saturday and perfected their organization. The name adopted for the new company is the United Motion Picture Producers, Inc. The officers elected are Ludwig G. B. Erb., president; Gilbert P. Hamilton, vice-president; Leo C. Stern, treasurer. The office of secretary was not filled at the time the meeting was held, but Herbert Blache, of Solax, has since been elected to that position.

The idea is that by operating under a general governing body, the individual companies will obtain better results and greater benefits than by independent operation. Each individual company, of course has a voice in the general management, so that the rights of each will be maintained while promoting the good of all.

The United Motion Picture Producers, Inc., will decide upon the specific work to be done by the component companies. Instead of a manufacturer proceeding on his own account, regardless of what the others are doing, to produce a drama or a comedy or a Western picture, he will produce on assignment from the general organization. These assignments are made only after a full conference, and the various classes of productions are so distributed as to assure the utmost variety in each weekly program released by Warner's Features, Inc.

The new program will be ready for first release in about a month, and Warner's Features, Inc., are now ready to receive applications for bookings.

In this connection, P. A. Powers, president of Warner's Features, Inc., stated that in addition to the program the concern would handle big features of four or more reels. This places Warner's in a position to provide exhibitors not only with a complete weekly program, but also with special features of the highest class for either long or short runs.

C. E. Buchanan, of Atlanta, Ga., was in New York for a few days last week. He left for Atlantic City where he stopped on his way home.

Universal's $50,000 Gift

Puts "Richelieu," a Special Feature Production, on Its Regular Program.

FOR several weeks the Universal Film Manufacturing Company has been advertising "Richelieu" as a "Special Universal feature." This involved an extra price being charged to the exchange. Conservatively speaking, it is said, there are not less than 10,000 exhibitors in the United States using Universal service today, and if each of them paid $5 one can readily realize, that when President Carl Laemmle ordered "Richelieu" withdrawn as a special feature and placed on the regular program as a 101 Bison release, $50,000 would be distributed as a gift among exhibitors.

Mr. Laemmle holds that $50,000 would be an honest profit on the amount of money which was invested to produce the magnificent film production, "Richelieu," but instead of pocketing the profit that would have come to it by charging an extra price per foot to the exchanges, the Universal is deliberately handing over to the fortunate exhibitors $50,000 on a silver platter.

The decision to put "Richelieu" on the regular program without extra charge was brought about by a conference between President Laemmle and the exchanges when the present unsettled condition in the amusement field, owing to the present war in Europe, was discussed. While at the present moment there has been no decided effect on the American market generally, there is a certain amount of retrenchment and nervousness in the industrial field and to enable the Universal exhibitors to start the fall season off right with a film production that would ordinarily be booked into a legitimate theater, it is going to be released to them on the regular program without an additional rental price tacked onto it.

While it is claimed both the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and the Universal Exchanges will lose $50,000 they are perfectly willing to do this, if it will encourage the Universal exhibitors and will make them feel that co-operation between the exchange men, the manufacturer and the exhibitor is one of the potent factors that has been instrumental in making the Universal such a tremendous success.

FAKE FILM MAN AT LARGE.

Galveston, Texas, Aug. 27, 1914.

Editor Moving Picture World,
New York.

Dear Sir:—I have been done by a moving picture fake and I think, for the good of yourselves and hotel men, a notice through your columns would be of great benefit to all. All of the moving picture men I have come in contact with have been clean, and gentlemen of highest type, except this man.

His registration here was: P. Flex, Niles, Cal., and he arrived Aug. 17 and left Aug. 19. Received mail while here in envelopes of Coquille Film Co., N. O., La. One of these letters contained a check on The Citizens Bank & Trust Co. of La., printed at bottom, Coquille Film Co., signed in ink, F. W. Carter, Pres. Sec. and Treas., same returned unpaid. Coquille Film Co. wired as follows:

8/24/'14. N. O. La.

"Man unknown to us further than he came here ten days ago hunting job and while here must have stolen bank checks. Cashed two here, both were turned down because no such name as Carter authorized to sign. We wired Coquille of Mecca Hotel, Houston, about him several days ago."

Name of Flex used here, he is about 5 ft. 4 in., weight 135 or 140, clean shaved, wears eye glasses, dark hair, wore palm beach suit and blue serge. Coquille of Mecca Hotel, Houston was wired, I think, because the N. O. La. firm learned he was by same name. Your kind consideration of a notice on this rascal will be appreciated.

Yours truly,
S. A. RUTHERFORD, Manager.

LIBERTY TO MAKE NAVAL PICTURES.

N. Edward Milligan, head producer of the Liberty Philadelphia Studio, is making preparations to leave for Newport, R. I., with a large company, with the intention of filming a number of stories containing the naval atmosphere. He has a number of his own multiple reel scenarios in which the United States Navy figures prominently. Bennie Zeidman, manager of the advertising and publicity department of the Liberty Motion Picture Company, while on a vacation at Newport, R. I., a number of weeks ago, arranged with the authorities of the naval institutes of that city for the Liberty Company to come there to produce stories in which their co-operation is necessary.

"FOR HIS FATHER'S LIFE" (Eclair).

The trade paper reviewers who saw the production entitled "For His Father's Life" at a recent censorship showing declared it to be one of the strongest Western dramas filmed this year. "For His Father's Life," featuring Joe Ryan, Mildred Bright and Will Sheerer, will be released by the Eclair Film Company, Inc., on Sunday, September 13, and contains more punches than the usual three-reeler. A wonderful jump from horseback to a moving train, a race with the fast express, a rough-and-tumble fight on a hand car and a fifty-foot drop with a lasso are a few of the really thrilling incidents which make this picture continuous action from start to finish. The story is clearly told, and the parts are handled by capable artists.

CALLED OUT POLICE RESERVES.

The Grand theater, on Grand and Chrystie streets, New York, which has a 2,000 seating capacity, opened its season as a high-class photoplay theater on Friday evening, August 28, with the "Sins of the Parents," featuring the world's famous emotional actress, Mme. Sarah Adler, with a star cast, for a 10-days' engagement.

For this occasion the entire house was decorated. A special box was decorated in honor of Mme. Adler, who witnessed the first performance, and saw herself for the first time, in the role of Laura Henderson.

The audience gave Mme. Adler an enormous ovation after the exhibition was over. One could hear only a roar of hurrahs and bravos. The house was packed to the dome.

The success of "Sins of the Parents" is mainly due to the powerful, realistic story which is based on a big theme, full of gripping situations, and dramatic climaxes.

The success of "Sins of the Parents" spread so rapidly throughout the East Side, that on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the management of the Grand were compelled to call out the reserves from the Eldridge street police station, to hold the enormous lines of those that could not be admitted to the theater.

"Sins of the Parents" is the record-breaker in the history of the Grand theater. On Sunday, from 1 p. m. to 11 p. m., the management announced, they handled 11,240 people that paid admission.

NOTICE.

We wish to inform the gentleman in Chicago who sent us an unsigned letter that the confidential information given has been known to us and proper and active steps have been under way for some time to deal drastically with such people as mentioned. NICHOLAS POWER CO.

THE NEWMAN PLANTS BUSY.

The Newman Manufacturing Co., manufacturers of brass frames, railings, easels, etc., who operate three factories, one at 717 Sycamore street, Cincinnati, Ohio, one at 101 Fourth avenue, New York, N. Y., and one at 108 West Lake street, Chicago, Ill., are reporting excellent business, and are running full capacity. This is cheering information, in view of the general conditions now in existence throughout the country, and their men on the road report an encouraging outlook for fall business.

The Western, Central and Southern States particularly are showing marked improvement in business conditions, and the Eastern and New England States will come along in due time. It is remarkable the number of new theatres which are now in the course of construction, mostly large and attractive theaters. S. J. Newman, secretary of the firm, who has a wide acquaintance among theater owners, reports that the majority are of the impression that business conditions will show a great improvement this coming fall.

NEW LASKY RELEASE.

"The Making of Bobby Burnit," Winchell Smith's comedy, made from the famous novel of the same name by George Randolph Chester, featuring the former star of "Brewster's Millions," Edward Abeles, will be the second release of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company through the Paramount Picture Corp. This subject will be one of the first of the Lasky releases under five reels and in addition to Mr. Abeles will boast Theodore Roberts and Bessie Barriscale in prominent parts.

The entire production was staged at the Lasky studios, Hollywood, and is in four parts. It will be released through the Paramount company September 17.

PREDICTS BANNER YEAR FOR EXHIBITORS.

Herbert Blache, the motion picture manufacturer, exchange owner and practical film man, who also stages his own productions and has recently completed ambitious multiple reel offerings of Tom Terriss in "The Chimes," and "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," and James J. Corbett in "The Burglar and the Lady," recently made the following prediction about the theatrical season just started.

"Assuming, of course, that the theater manager recognizes the importance of intelligent advertising and that his theater is properly conducted, the strength of the pictures he is able to present to his patrons determines the amount of his box office receipts.

"A hasty review of the developments of the past year in photoplay production promises the exhibitor and the theater-going public a harvest of photodrama offerings. Famous theatrical stars and noted authors by the score have enlisted in the army of motion picture creators in the last few months and will continue to add the result of their labors to the heightened efforts of the able photodrama producers of proven ability.

"Plays and books that have proven their popularity beyond a doubt are being carefully prepared for the screen and the coming season will see them enjoying once more the public worship which their merit deserves, while the theater reaps the box office returns."

Notes of the Trade

THE All Star Feature Corporation will present James A. Herne's "Shore Acres" and has engaged a cast which would do justice to any Broadway theatrical offering. Charles A. Stevenson is cast in the role of Nathaniel Berry, William Riley Hatch, who played Capt. Williams in "Paid in Full," and Peter Galbraith, in "Pierre of the Plains," the all-star features, will play the part of Martin Berry. Conway Tearle is cast as "Sam" and E. J. Connelley is cast as "Blake"; Violet Horner, formerly with the Imp, Reliance, Biograph and Vitagraph companies, will play "Helen" and little Madge Evans will portray the part of "Mildred." Others of the cast are Philip Traub as "Bob," Harry Knowles as "Captain Ben" and Mrs. Evans. John H. Pratt, under whose personal supervision "Shore Acres" is being made, is now at Block Island with his company where the entire island was turned over that the production might be accurately pictured. William A. Thompson is in charge of the camera with his two assistants, and George Kleine is master of properties.

With the thermometer registering eighty-nine, one of the warmest days we have had this summer, the photoplay production "The Littlest Rebel" opened at B. F. Keith's Crescent theater in Brooklyn last Monday evening to capacity business. The audience soon forgot the intense heat for the heat of the battle raging before their eyes on the screen. All were pleased with the picture.

A clever and original idea has been executed by the Players Post Card Company in the line of advertising for exhibitors. They are offering to the theaters throughout the country a new novelty in the way of post cards for the popular moving picture stars in pen and ink drawings. Exhibitors should find in this new line a very distinctive and prosperous advertising scheme in advancing the coming features to be shown at their theaters.

Harry Benham, under the direction of Frederick Sullivan, Thanhouser, is to be featured in a series of twenty reels, written especially for him. Benham recently in "Harry's Waterloo," took all the parts in the script and appeared in one scene four times in different characters, one of which was a woman. King Baggott has completed a protean release, but Harry got there first.

The Whartons have produced a picture to be released through Eclectic with a scene calculated to make people gasp. To get this remarkable picture it was necessary to stop traffic on a busy trolley line for a number of hours, secure permission from a city to damage an iron bridge, and buy a big trolley car outright. Thurlow Bergen, Elsie Esmond, William Riley Hatch and M. O. Penn are in the cast.

Cora Williams, the Edison comedienne, has developed five new swimming strokes since the bathing season, opened at Rye Beach, N. Y.—also a coat of tan that may require some time to remove.

James Cruze and Marguerite Snow (Thanhouser) are to be featured at the close of "The Million Dollar Mystery" in a new serial under the direction of Howell Hansel, who directed 40 of the 46 reels of the "Mystery" serial.

The New York Sun of Sunday, August 16, discusses the chances of the cameramen in the European war and expresses the opinion that the difficulties in the way of securing first class pictures will be greater than ever before, because of the hostility of the combatants toward both photographers and correspondents.

A cablegram received by the Photo Play Productions Company from Mimi Yvonne, dated Tuesday, August 25, states that the child actress is safe in London and will sail for this country within a week. Mimi's interpretation of Virgie in Edward Peple's Civil War drama, "The Littlest Rebel," has won for her a huge and lasting popularity.

B. F. Keith's Bronx theater opened Monday, August 31, with high class feature photoplays. Program will be changed on Mondays and Thursdays. "The Littlest Rebel" will be the leading feature to open this beautiful playhouse. An excellent program has been booked for the first half of the week. For the last half "The Boundary Rider" and an excellent Pathe program will be seen.

Bookings for Edward Peple's Civil War drama, "The Littlest Rebel," are keeping the Photo Play Productions Releasing Company busy. It must be good.

John William Kellette is free-lancing, his connection with the Whitman Features having been severed, and Harrish Ingraham, leading man, has taken up the unusual position of lead and author. Mr. Kellette was engaged to make adaptations of "Jane Eyre," "Lena Rivers" and "Tempest and Sunshine," all four-reelers. He is connected with the Smallwood Film Corporation as script writer of industrials, having completed "Does Prohibition Prohibit," "For the Baby's Sake" and "Through the Looking Glass, with John Dough."

Sidney Bracey, the "Jones, the Butler" of "The Million Dollar Mystery," Thanhouser, has put his yacht into commission and it bears the name of "Evelyn," in honor of Mr. Bracey's June bride.

Irving Cummings developed a mild case of blood poisoning while working in Phil Lonergan's story, "The Varsity Race," in which Muriel Ostriche plays the ingenue, and the story has been delayed on that account. Carroll Fleming directed it and many of the race scenes were taken in Philadelphia.

Rene Farrington, daughter of Frank Farrington, the "Braine" of "The Million Dollar Mystery," has suddenly jumped into the spotlight in her delightful character acting as lead of "Princess." A short time ago she appeared as a slavey in one of Arthur Ellery's comedy scripts and her work was so good that she was retained. Her latest work is the ingenue lead in "Sis," by Phil Lonergan.

Carl Louis Gregory, under direction of Lloyd F. Lonergan, chief of production, Thanhouser, has taken Mignon Anderson, Morris Foster and John Lehnberg to Yellowstone Park to stage dramas. They expect to be away till September 15.

Boyd Marshall and Mayre Hall in "His Winning Way," booked for release under "Princess," September 4, took the leads in a most sprightly comedy showing these juveniles at their best. The "Jefferson of the Screen," Riley Chamberlain, played the part of the grouch. John William Kellette wrote the scenario and Arthur Ellery produced it.

Carroll Fleming, late of the New York Hippodrome, is directing "The Madonna of the Poor," a script by John William Kellette dealing with Italian life, in which John Rinehart and Muriel Ostriche play the leads, supported by Dave Thompson. It's a Thanhouser.

Will H. Stetson, general manager of the American and European Film Company, has just returned from a trip through New York, Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine and Massachusetts, and reports that the motion picture business is excellent, and that the five reel feature, "Evangeline," based on Longfellow's poem, which his company controls in half of the United States, is getting its share of the gate money.

In the recent series of Christy Mathewson pictures in which "Big 6" is appearing for the Universal exclusively, Julius Stern makes his debut as a screen star. Although he has been engaged in the business for six years, this is the first time the picture fan has had an opportunity of seeing this well known manager of the Imp-Victor forces.

G. M. Anderson, the famous "Broncho Billy" of Essanay Western photoplays, has now accomplished a feat which does not necessitate risking his life to perform, but, to perfect, has taken long and tedious practice. In a drama called "Broncho Billy Butts In," Mr. Anderson rolls a cigarette with one hand, while with the other he holds a man at bay with a gun.

Dr. H. L. Stafford, well known in the magazine world as a writer of fiction and contributor of technical articles, and who is at present connected with the scenario department of the Universal's Western studios, has been assigned to the post of special scenario writer for Henry McRae of the 101 Bison company. The first scenario to be prepared by Dr. Stafford in his new capacity is a picturizing of "The Law of the Range," a story by William Groves Barrows, published by one of the best known Chicago houses.

The good old days when the villain of the melodrama basked in the hisses of the audience have disappeared, according to the experiences of Bryant Washburn, the most successful "man of dark deeds," of the Essanay company. Although Mr. Washburn is usually cast for the villainous part in most of the Essanay dramas, it seems that he is just as popular as the heros.

A beautiful four-part subject under the title of "Bartered Lives" will be released by George Kleine through his branch offices in the course of a few weeks. This subject features the European actress, Miss Hesperia, who recently captured first prize in the European contest for the most popular woman in film. Miss Hesperia plays a dual role. The double exposure work is unusually clever, and will mystify many people.

George Kleine's big six-part spectacle, "Spartacus," is booking heavily throughout the country at present. This is one of Kleine's "Roman Cycle" series, and a member of that family headed by "Quo Vadis" and "Antony and Cleopatra." The spectacle employs nearly 7,500 people and possesses the largest reproduction of a Roman arena ever seen in motion picture. "Spartacus" is playing many big theater dates in addition to picture house engagements.

No more startling film has left the Universal's Hollywood studios in some time than "A Daughter of the Redskins," the second of the film staged under the direction of Henry McRae, of the 101 Bison company, during that company's stay in the Sequoi forests near Hume, Cal. With such people as Marie Walcamp, William Clifford, Rex De Rosselli, Sherman Bainbridge, Val Paul and Lule Warrenton Mr. McRae has succeeded in producing a film that portrays the early life of the Western pioneers in a way seldom equaled.

Jacob Wilk, who is now in charge of the publicity work of the World Film Corporation, is a graduate from the William A. Brady staff. For the past five years he has been with that famous producer, acting as business manager and representative. During the summer, Mr. Wilk has managed stock companies in Duluth and Denver.

There is no chance to talk depression to M. E. Hoffman, the "live wire" of the World Film Corporation's general offices. He has found so much work in the offices because of the demand for the Shubert-Brady releases that his department has been augmented by the addition of Charles D. Shrady and Jacob Wilk.

* * *

Unique in thought and treatment is a spectacular child comedy-drama which is now being staged under the competent direction of Lloyd Ingraham, of the Powers (Universal) company. The picture is entitled "The Autocrat" and deals with a mother's dreams after having punished her little son for a trifling misdemeanor. It is a story that will be of much interest to the little folk and bears a striking object lesson which fathers and mothers will do well to remember.

Jerome Sobel is interested in a new feature. It was released August 30 at 68 Edgecomb avenue and will be known as Adelaide Janet Sobel. The little girl will be the subject of Jerome's thoughts and conversations when he is able to talk about things other than the activities of the World Film Corporation. He is buying cigars also.

Lewis J. Selznick has been elected a director of the newly organized National Independent Motion Picture Board of Trade, which came into being August 29.

Justice Saunders, well known in judicial and political circles in New York, appeared in his premier picture at the Universal studios recently in one of the "Universal Boy" series. Judge Saunders, although accustomed to being in the public eye, was rather reticent about posing before the camera and it was necessary to retake twice before His Honor appeared natural upon the screen.

Lewis J. Selznick, general manager of the World Film Corporation, is to make another business trip to Cleveland, Buffalo, Detroit, Toronto and Montreal. Later he will make a tour of inspection of the offices from Pittsburgh westward, including a visit to the Pacific Coast branches.

Thanks to the demand for the Shubert-Brady releases of the World Film Corporation, the Philadelphia, New York and Chicago offices are using three prints of each of the releases.

The state right sales of the Sterling Camera and Film Company's production, "The Land of the Lost," has surpassed all sanguine expectations. The excellence of this feature is attracting the attention of particular buyers from every point as it is a distinct photographic triumph and multiple feature with a unique theme and a story calculated to please all the people all the time.

The Essanay company announces the production in the near future of "The Slim Princess," by George Ade. Although Miss Elsie Janis had an unusually successful run in the play, the motion picture scenario has been adapted from the story, which first appeared serially in the Saturday Evening Post. The Essanay comedy-drama will be in four acts, with Miss Ruth Stonehouse in the leading role of the princess of slender proportions. Mr. Ade himself will pay particular attention to the staging of the production.

The Progressive Corporation struck it rich when their quick-witted cameraman on board the Progressive, their three-masted schooner, took pictures of the English warship Essex chasing a steamer which happened to be outside of the three-mile limit. The Progressive Corporation intend to use this interesting picture in a new film play that the company is producing.

Joseph H. Trant, known to his many friends in and out of the newspaper world as "Teddy," has joined the Progressive Corporation. His publicity work for Gov. Foss of Massachusetts attracted the attention of the paper world and the politicians throughout the country. "Here's luck to you 'Teddy' in your new field."

Edward Abeles, who has just completed his appearance in "The Making of Bobby Burnit," of the Lasky Feature Play Company, is en route East with the negative. Mr. Abeles will take a turn in vaudeville under the Lasky banner during the coming season. "Ready Money" will be his next photoplay vehicle.

For the first time in a long while James Cruze and Marguerite Snow appeared in a single reel comedy-descriptive, "From Wash to Washington," the scenario of which was written by Lloyd F. Lonergan, the Thanhouser director of productions.

Howard G. Bobb, vice president and general manager of the Liberty Motion Picture Company, Inc., gained his knowledge of the motion picture business in a very peculiar manner. Resigning his position as president of a prominent Philadelphia pharmaceutical company, he secured a minor position in a motion picture laboratory, where he studied the film business. He remained there until he acquired the technical end of the game. He later secured a number of wealthy Philadelphians to finance him and he started the Liberty Motion Picture Company, which has been in active operation for a number of months.

Richard C. Travers, who plays the lead in Edith Huntington Mason's filmized novel, "the Real Agatha," is shown at the opening of the charming Essanay drama playing golf at one of the country clubs of which he is a member. Although the scenario did not exactly call for it, Mr. Travers made a 250-yard drive when the scene was being taken. The Essanay star has been playing almost professional golf recently and has arranged for a match with Champion "Chick" Evans in the near future.

INDIANA.

SINCE the Church Federation and the Chamber of Commerce served notive on Mayor Bell that they did not like to see him handling the charity fund created by the motion picture exhibitors of the city, the exhibitors have been in the position of the boy who stuffed pillows in the seat of his trousers in anticipation of a warm reception when he returned home, if an undignified figure of speech may be employed.

A meeting of the exhibitors was called, and it was decided that nothing could be done except to sit tight and wait for what might happen. The Mayor has not tooted a horn to announce his action, but the exhibitors see in the moving of the Joe Bell Charity Fund, hurriedly so named, to the business of William Eisenlohr and the naming of Eisenlohr as manager of the fund, an action to meet the demand of the Chamber and the Church. Yet the picture men will not suffer, for the dispensation of charity is to be continued. Mayor Bell seems to hold to the opinion of the exhibitors that the two civic bodies do not represent the people and that the closing of the theaters on Sunday as they wish, will not be a popular move.

The cooler weather of the last few weeks, the heavy rains, and the war in Europe, seem to have aroused a taste for excitement that is coining money for the picture men, after an unusually dull summer. Nearly all of the houses closed temporarily have been reopened. All in all the moving picture business is rapidly getting back its normal healthy tone, though two companies have been forced into court. Their troubles, however, were not due to general conditions so much as to local causes. The two mentioned are the Hyde Park Amusement Company, running the Garrick, and the Iriquois theater. On the whole it is believed the business in general will benefit by such instances, as tending to induce more caution on the part of investors, too many of whom have rushed into the field without sufficient investigation of the possibilities, and the exercise of the good business judgment always necessary in embarking in any other line.

The Orpheum Theater, Michigan City, has been redecorated and cleaned, and after being closed more than a month, reopened with "The Spendthrift."

Mayor J. O. Batchelor of Marion, has served notice on exhibitors that he will not tolerate Sunday opening. Somebody told somebody else and that somebody told the Mayor, whereupon the Mayor delivered his ukase.

The Airdome at Warsaw, put on an amateur night with surprising results. The affair drew more than a thousand paid admissions.

Manager Polezoes of the Lyric, Goshen, has made some improvements to his projection booth.

Huntington exhibitors were thwarted in their effort to open Sunday by the Huntington police, who were on the job with a threat to make arrests at the first attempt to sell tickets. The exhibitors rather than disappoint the crowds, as they would have been forced to do in event of arrests, did not offer to put them on sale. The Chautauqua has been running Sundays, as have a number of other businesses in Huntington, and the exhibitors feel that they are being discriminated against in an unfair way. In serving notice that they would keep open they made a public statement they were only doing so in order to get a test of the law, but the activity of the police was so great, that opportunity to give a performance was not available.

Dr. E. C. McBride, Terre Haute, plans a new picture house on East Wabash street. He will spend about $4,000 on the structure, the plans for which are now being drawn by R. W. Leonard, architect.

"We try mighty hard to please and welcome suggestions" is a line run in all of the Luna-Lite theater advertising at Marion. The Luna-Lite is making money and their attitude as expressed in the line may be the reason.

"Only 600 seats for sale, and last night there were 613 paid admissions," is the way the North Vernon Airdome heads an advertisement, which urges the fact that there are always seats for the second show.

R. S. Schrader, formerly of Louisville, has succeeded J. C. Mack as manager of the World's Film Corporation branch in Indianapolis.

Manager Moore of the Irvington theater, Irvington, put a film on exhibit in the lobby of his theater for the benefit of those of an inquiring mind in the college suburb. It was the center of much spectacled scrutiny. Manager Moore was kept busy explaining that the film was 1,000 feet long and contained 16,000 photographs, which were displayed one at a time, by a light of 4,000 candle power, which flashed off and on 16 times a second. The stunt was only another of the several that Manager Moore has put on to interest the Irvington population and make his house an Irvington center of attraction. His methods of meeting the peculiarities of the Irvington population along the lines of least resistance have already been noted in these columns. His efforts has made a success of a house in which other managers have twice failed.

The Popular Amusement Company, Elkhart, has been incorporated with $10,000 capital stock to operate theaters. The directors are F. Palmer, W. A. Gray and M. Kempner.

The Colonial theater, Mt. Vernon, was turned over free of charge to the St. John's Altar Guild for one night, and a goodly sum was realized, the attraction drawing about 1,200 persons.

An advertising scheme that works two ways, one to build patronage for the new Era theater, Columbus, and the other to build circulation for the Columbus Herald, is that of giving an admission to the theater for six consecutive coupons clipped from the paper. The idea may be worth something to exhibitors in other localities. The Herald is so well pleased with the arrangement with the New Era theater that they have continued to run the coupons daily for more than two months. The theater is crowded for every show.

W. C. Milliron, who recently bought the Rex theater, Rensselaer, is planning to give three reel shows for five cents. He has installed 150 new opera chairs, a new electric piano, and cleaned and renovated the entire establishment.

The Greenfield Business Men's Amusement Company, Greenfield, has been incorporated, and announces a purpose to operate theaters and street fairs.

The Mecca theater, Marion, has removed a part of the roof in the rear and with the installation of some electric fans declare they have a constant supply of cool, fresh air, making the place more comfortable than out of doors.

The Orpheum, Evansville, is making a play of the fact that they serve "The Million Dollar Mystery" to patrons for five cents. Nearly all other houses boost the prices.

The Starland theater, Anderson, has equipped a pretty rest room for women, fitting it up with a satin finished walnut dressing table, chair and appointments to match. A supply of needed toilet requisites is included. This theater also is building up a mailing list of patrons. A box near the door for dropping in cards which are distributed has been catching a white shower. Occasionally postcard announcements of something special in the way of a program is to be used. The Starland also announces a Saturday schedule of five shows, beginning at 2 p. m. and running continuously until 9 p. m., when the last one starts. Two programs are given, graded at ten and twenty cents, the better one coming the last three days of the week.

Noble B. Davis & Co. will remodel the Davis Hotel store room, Jasonville, and start a moving picture house. They will call it the Coldale. Between 500 and 600 seats will be provided. A Powers 6A has been bought.

Herbert Johnson, Lafayette, owner of the Luna theater, has added the Majestic, Paris, Ill., to his string of picture houses. The new houses will be opened Sept. 1, after making some extensive repairs.

The Lyric theater, Vincennes, is being repainted and repaired, and opened August 23. The background for a number of landscapes on the exterior is white, giving the theater a clean, attractive appearance that is inviting.

The Angela theater, Alexandria, has donated the use of the house for one night to the Kappa Alpha Phi fraternity, which expects to use the proceeds to equip new quarters.

The New Grand, Corydon, has installed a new Powers 6A machine. It is one of the best machines on the market, says Manager Terrell.

R. C. Green, recently manager of the Lyric theater, Ft. Wayne, has been named to manage the Grand, Anderson, Ind., by Allardt Brothers, who control the Anderson house. Mr. Green will take charge September 1.

Among the new incorporations are the Tri-City Theater Company, South Bend, and the Twentieth Century Amusement Company, Gary. The Tri-City company was incorporated to operate three big theaters which are to be transformed into "movie" houses. The directors of the company are C. J. Allardt, H. J. Lederer and J. F. Devine. The houses are the Auditorium, South Bend, the Bucklen of Elkhart and the Jefferson of Goshen. The directors of the Gary company are E. G. Elbe, M. Elbe and W. O. Kennedy.

The World Film Corporation has taken out incorporation papers in Indiana for $50,000 of its capital stock.

The Maxwell Motor Car Company assembled two hundred of their salesmen in Indiana at the Claypool Hotel, Indianapolis, for a motion picture lecture that brought the factory to Indianapolis, the most interesting part of it to the salesman.

Cash McNary, Tipton, has sold his moving picture house, the Habit theater, to E. E. Hiatt, of Frankfort. Mr. McNary is chief of police at Tipton, and he found his theater was interfering with his official duties, so offered it for sale.

Charles Henney, North Manchester, Ind., has granted the use of his airdome as headquarters for the Boy Scouts of North Manchester. The boys are good boosters and Henney feels that he will be well repaid.

F. W. Van Dusen, of Chicago, gave an organ recital on the new $5,500 instrument in the Jefferson theater, Fort Wayne, Ind., opening night.

The license ordinance in Brazil has been amended as a result of the efforts of exhibitors, so as to permit them to give ten-cent shows at least ten times a month without the payment of an extra license fee. The ordinance is designed to get traveling shows of higher price.

W. B. Helmick has been named by the Allardt Brothers syndicate as the manager for the Sipe theater, Kokomo. Mr. Helmick was formerly associated with George W. Sipe, who has leased the house to Allardt Brothers, and the naming of Helmick simply continues his management of the house, which he has handled for fourteen years.

After fighting each other for patronage by the use of extra attractions such as singers and other talent, the Kokomo exhibitors have agreed to stop the profit-destroying practice. The first move is to cut out singers in all the houses. No more singers will be heard by Kokomo movie patrons.

Many manufacturers are sending the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce films of their plants for exhibit at the free motion picture show to be a feature of the Made-in-Indianapolis week, Sept. 7 to 12. There will be many visitors in the city for the State Fair that week and the Chamber of Commerce believes the time opportune for catching the Indiana eye with the exhibit.

Frank Bonfer has opened a moving picture show at Sunman.

The Colonial theater, Farmersburg, is rapidly nearing completion. J. H. Drake and J. M. Hopewell expect to be able to open early in September. The house seats 500. They have a five-year lease.

Charles Fallow is to succeed Edward F. Galligan, resigned, as manager of the Nelson theater, Logansport. Mr. Galligan goes to the Masonic theater, Louisville, to assume charge. Manager Fallow has been associated with Mr. Galligan in the house management for several years.

George L. Fries of Kankakee, Ill., sold his theater, the Arc, Monticello, to Mr. and Mrs. J. O. Worth of Monticello. Charles McCall, who managed the house for Dr. Fries, has been retained by the Worths.

The Grand, Evansville, has opened for the season, and announces it will use two comedy films each night, in addition to vaudeville.

The Luna and the Lyric, under the same management, Lafayette, have a slogan "It Pays to Cross the Street." The two houses are opposite each other. The slogan is now appearing in all their advertising.

The Coldale, Jasonville, has opened. It is a new house and seats 300.

Walter Easley will open the New Princess, Rushville, Sept. 7. A number of alterations have been made, and the house will present a very attractive appearance to the first nighters.

DETROIT.

ON Thursday night, August 13, the board of directors of the Washington theater, located on Washington boulevard and Clifford street, held a meeting to discuss plans for the coming season. The board was undecided whether to inaugurate another season of stock or accept the offer of a lease from John Kunsky, of the Casino Amusement Company. After arguments pro and con, it was finally voted to lease the theater to Mr. Kunsky, the annual rental being in the neighborhood of $25,000. The theater was completed July, 1913, is one of the handsomest in the city, and as for its location, it is unquestionably one of the best. It is only a stone's throw from Grand Circus Park, where three large new buildings have been erected in the past six months, only two blocks from Woodward avenue, and only a few blocks from every city car line. It will make an ideal picture house. Mr. Kunsky plans to improve the interior of the theater and will open it early in September with feature films at prices slightly higher than any of the other picture houses. The policy will practically be the same as at the Liberty. According to present plans, Howard Pierce, now manager of the Liberty, will go to the new Washington; T. D. Moule, manager of the Columbia will take Mr. Pierce's place, while M. W. Schoenherr will again assume the management of the Columbia.

Detroit is getting ready with her decorations for the G. A. R. encampment, which takes place the latter part of August and the first week in September. The entire downtown district will be festooned with colored electric lights and white columns. Several moving picture concerns have already arranged to make films of the various events. The parade will be the main feature of the encampment. It is anticipated that 150,000 people will come to Detroit for this event.

Motion pictures by the Ford Motion Picture Department were made of the Industrial Parade given under the auspices of the West Michigan Avenue Improvement Association on Thursday night, August 20, which proved a huge success.

It is reported that Louis R. Grosslight, the pawnbroker, has the lease of the building occupied at present by the Casino theater on Monroe avenue and which adjoins his place of business. He takes possession after the first of the year, and plans to enlarge it by using a part of his store, thus raising the seating capacity to 600.

The Orpheum theater opens its doors Labor Day with vaudeville and a picture at the end of each show. There will be 150 box seats in the theater, most of them at the front of the first balcony. The lower floor will contain 800 orchestra seats; the balcony 700 more, and with those in the gallery will make the total seating capacity 2,130. The building is of steel, brick, stone and concrete. There are over 40 exits. Scenery has been furnished by the Lee Lash studio of New York. The color scheme is turquoise blue, cream and gold. Harry Williamson is house manager, and A. E. Whitbeck, general manager.

An improvised theater will be one of the features at the Michigan State Fair, which takes place in Detroit, September 7 to 18. In this theater will be shown moving pictures of the Ford Motor Company's factory.

Cameramen and other film men have been in Detroit the past week to get pictures of the various events in connection with the G. A. R. encampment which brought close to 100,000 strangers to the city. The big event was the parade on September 2. The entire city was decorated with flags, bunting and emblems, while the downtown district closely resembled a national exposition with its massive white columns and strings of electric lights extending from one to the other. It was the biggest gathering and the most noteworthy that has been seen in Detroit for many years, and the streets even during the big Elks convention never looked prettier.

The business during the G. A. R. week at the theaters, particularly the picture houses downtown, was enormous and broke all records. The cool evenings had a great deal to do in stimulating business. Another reason was that every house had some special attraction. At the National a picture called "The Battle of Sholoh" was shown. At the Columbia in addition to pictures and vaudeville there was an extra attraction consisting of "Five Old Veteran Boys in Blue" who played old-fashioned tunes in the old-fashioned way on the fiddles which they carried through the Civil War. Special war and G. A. R. pictures were shown at most of the other places; in fact, everything and anything that would bring back to memory the days of 1861.

It is the idea of John Kunsky, who took a year's lease on the Washington, to make it the home of the best pictures now being produced. For that reason he sent Howard O. Pierce, who will be the manager of the Washington, to New York City on August 25 and had him look around for new ideas. Mr. Pierce returned a few days later and was "chuck full" of them, many of which will be carried out in the Washington. The Washington will be like "home" to Mr. Pierce as he was connected there as assistant manager more than a year ago when that playhouse was showing dramatic stock. The Washington opened Monday, August 31, with "The Call of the North" in which Robert Edeson has the leading role. This was a Jesse L. Lasky production, and will be followed the week of September 7 with Dustin Farnum in "The Virginian." There are three performances daily—at 2:30, 7 and 9 p. m. Prices for the matinee are 15 cents while evenings will be 15 and 25 cents. There is a special augmented orchestra, and a high-class musical program will be rendered each week. A good musical program, by the way, is a hobby with Mr. Pierce. He believes that good music which harmonizes with the pictures is just as much of an attraction as the pictures themselves. In fact the Liberty theater where Mr Pierce was formerly manager today has the reputation for its fine musical program. A pipe organ is also to be installed at the Washington. A balcony entrance has been tunneled from the first mezzanine floor, so that the public will have no hesitancy in going in the balcony as was the case in the past. The Washington has a seating capacity of 2,000, and is one of the most beautiful theaters in the middle west. New hangings, new carpet, new decorations, new stage settings from cellar to dome have been installed in the playhouse so that in every way it has the appearance of being an absolutely new enterprise. The stage setting represents the Capitol grounds of Washington and is very realistic even to the fountain, which is real. The screen is practically the entrance to the Capitol building. The Washington will show five reels of pictures, and two or three reels of lighter subjects, mostly comedy. The theater will show Paramount features exclusively.

The roof of the new Kenilworth theater is completed and the interior is now being rushed. The theater is expected to be opened early in October.

John H. Kunsky, of the Casino Amusement Co., has returned from a visit to Mackinaw Island. He had intended to remain there for sometime but was called back owing to negotiations pending on the Washington theater.

A strike has been averted between the musicians' union and the Detroit Theater Managers' Association. At a meeting on August 25 an arrangement was made whereby the musicians will continue at the same wages until the first of October, at which time it is likely some other arrangements will be made, that will be mutually satisfactory. The musicians have asked for an increase in wages of about 25 per cent.

The Garland theater, owned by the Casino Amusement Company, will discontinue business within the next thirty days. The building has been leased by the Woolworth Company of New York, which will alter and operate it as a five and ten cent store.

The Esperanto Feature Film Co., with offices in the Equity building, expects to release its first production early in October. The finishing scenes are now being worked out. The exact name of the story has not been decided upon. Frank H. Pipp, a former newspaper man, who is producing the picture, says that the total cost of it will be about $20,000. There will be 180 scenes, most of which were taken in the Agawa canyon which is located about 150 miles north of the Canadian Soo. Mr. Pipp took with him camping outfit and company of twenty-one persons, principal among whom were Norman Hackett, well known as an actor, and Miss Sue MacNanamy, who played in several dramatic stock companies, both of whom are residents of Detroit. The company has its studio in a former school house, situated about nine miles from the city, out Woodward avenue.

According to James J. Brady, collector of Internal revenue at Detroit, the moving pictures will be taxed should the government decide to impose special taxes owing to the European war.

The Greenwich Co. is erecting a building at Grand River and Avery avenues, the downstairs of which will be used as a moving picture theater to be called "The Plaza," while the upstairs will be for lodge meetings. It will be completed in October.

The Greenwich Co. recently completed the Victoria theater at 1009 Michigan avenue for Herman F. Zink, who is a well-known politician on the west side.

The Columbia theater, which plays vaudeville as its main attraction, is making a strong feature of pictures, which open and close each show. In fact, Manager Schoenherr says that the pictures oftentimes receive more applause than the vaudeville, and attributes the big business done every day at the Columbia to the special picture program. On Monday and Thursday, a reel of Pathe war news is an added attraction; on Tuesday and Wednesday, the Ford-Detroit Weekly is an added attraction; on Friday, a single reel of Mary Pickford is an added attraction, while on Saturday and Sunday, the program consists of an Animated Weekly feature, a war subject and a Ford Sterling comedy.

All is in readiness for the opening of the new Orpheum theater which takes place September 7, playing vaudeville and pictures. There will be three shows daily, with four on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays.

Daniel H. Kenney has been elected president of the Grand Boulevard Theater Co., and Harry L. Hurlbert, secretary and treasurer. The company will erect a duplex theater at 3067 East Grand Boulevard.

The Ingersoll-Gaukler Company has decided to spend $125,000 instead of $70,000 on its moving picture theater to be erected on Jefferson avenue, just east of the Belle Isle Bridge approach.

Henry Kohner, 316 Free Press building, is taking bids on a theater and store building to cost $12,000. It will be of brick, one story high, 45 by 127 feet in size.

The Progressive Film & Equipment Co., recently organized, with W. D. Ward at the head, has been capitalized at $10,000. According to the papers filed with the secretary of state, the principal stockholders aside from Mr. Ward are, A. W. Blankmeyer, H. F. Fowser and H. P. Schwartz.

Architect C. Howard Crane has let for the Majestic Theater Co., the general contract for the erection of the theater to Frank Farrington Co. The theater is to be located at Woodward and Willis avenues.

SMITH.

KANSAS.

P. H. WOLFE, proprietor of the Majestic theater at Wilson, Kansas, has opened an airdome there. The Majestic, which is being renovated, will be reopened early in the fall for its winter combination business of vaudeville and moving pictures. The airdome will fill out the moving picture season.

Trade unionists are trying hard to secure the application of the Sunday closing law to the theaters. Though the moving picture houses are not particularly alarmed over the possibility of having to close on the Sabbath, there is a possibility that the movement may affect them.

F. C. Smith, the new manager of the Orpheum at Topeka, has made a start towards fine success with his plan for the house. He runs four reels, and has four acts of vaudeville. The charge now is 10 cents for any seat in the house. Lew Nathanson resigned the lease and management August 1 and the first show under Mr. Smith was August 10, matinee.

The city authorities of Hutchinson have devised a method, they believe, by which Sheriff K. C. Beck's moving picture show can be stopped on Sunday. They are planning to extend the city limits to include the island, now outside of town, where the pictures are put on. Hutchinson does not allow moving pictures on Sunday. Three weeks ago Sheriff Beck got around the law by placing his machine on an island in the Arkansas river, which is government land, the stream being navigable. The screen was planted in he stream half way between the banks, and the spectators were in the park on the land side, within the city limits. It is not illegal to watch a moving picture show on Sunday—it is only unlawful to give the show. The city authorities threatened to stop the show on the island, and August 8 Sheriff Beck got an injunction restraining the police from interfering. The sheriff served the injunction himself. The extension of the city limits, which is being arranged for, will again put the show under the authority of the city officials, and then the matter will get into court upon the interference of the police with the court's injunction.

Electric theater, Kansas City, reopened Sunday night August 16, after two months spent in enlarging and improvement at a cost of $30,000. Among the items of the work done were installation of 22 boxes, an asbestos curtain, the removal of the operating box and heating plant outside the building and the increasing of the seating capacity by the addition of floor space to 1,800. There is also now a nursery for children. It is said to be the largest combination house in Kansas at which the admission is 5 cents.

The film "John Barleycorn," received a strong support of the temperance people in prohibition Kansas. When it was shown at the Iris theater in Topeka, the temperance society of the Methodist church, through its secretary, Deets Pickett, of the research department, gave general publicity to the value of the picture as a temperance lesson.

The Aurora and Grand theaters in Lawrence co-operated most effectively in making the two bargain days arranged by the merchants popular with the visitors. These theaters through arrangements with the newspapers which distributed the tickets provided free admission for shoppers on the afternoons of the bargain days. The compliment was to the people who came into Lawrence, and the tickets were partly the gift of the merchants.

"A Million Bid," the big Broadway star feature, was so popular when shown at the Holland in Wichita that a return date was demanded by the management.

The Crescent theater at Neodesha has made a point of presenting an extra educational film every Monday night during the summer. When school begins the educational film will be put on Friday night.

Fort Scott scenes and Fort Scott people are in a moving picture taken in August, and the presence of city officials in the cast gives the film a color of authority. City Engineer Fisher and Sheriff Cowan are among the participants, and Fort Scott is eagerly awaiting the showing of the picture there.

The Airdome in Chetopa came into the serial story game August 20. He announced that he had previously been deterred from putting on the big stories because of the cost; but he believed the people wanted these stories, and if they gave the patronage, he would get the films. The first to be shown at the Airdome is the Universal big feature entitled "The Trey o' Hearts." Two reels will be shown each Thursday.

The publicity department of the International Dry Farming Congress, Wichita, has adopted this year a novel and surely a most effective method of advertising the big congress and its many features—and most of all, of advertising Wichita and the attractions that the visitors will see there. Instead of billboard placards and signs, the management will send out to hundreds of picture show houses films showing the buildings and streets and special features of Wichita, and of the structures that will house the exhibition, besides portraits of the officers of the congress. The pictures are being taken by C. I. Howel of the Kansas Motion Picture Co.

BROWN.

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE American theater on Market street, near Seventh, is being redecorated and this house will be opened early in October under the management of Ed Homan. It is planned to show musical comedy, vaudeville attractions and moving pictures. The house will probably open with a number of feature films until arrangements can be perfected for other productions.

The Bell theater, 538 Columbus avenue, has been reopened by Frank De Caesar as a vaudeville and moving picture house, a specialty being made of Italian productions.

Sol Pincus, who for some time has been publicity man for Grauman's Imperial and who recently took up work of this kind for the Savoy theater, now conducted by D. J. Grauman, has succeeded Frank Donnellan at Loew's Empress, and will handle the press work for all three of these big houses.

The Austin & Briggs' Wild West Show has established headquarters at the Ocean Beach Cowboy Park and is giving a regular program. In addition to performing hair-raising stunts the members are also appearing in Western photoplays made in public, these being under the direction of the Macograph Company, which has established a studio there.

The exhibiting room recently established by the Eclectic Film Company at its headquarters at 67 Turk street is proving to be very popular with exhibitors and is filled to overflowing whenever a showing is announced. For the convenience of the trade the time of showing new subjects has been changed from morning to afternoon, the exhibitions commencing at 1.30 o'clock. Manager Frank L. Hudson is much pleased with the results of the innovation.

Louis Greenfield is going ahead with the plans for the new Quality theater on Fillmore street, and this house promises to be one of the finest in this section of the city, which is noted for being an amusement center.

M. B. Dudley and Geo. F. Cosby have secured the Gaiety theater for one week and will present the wonderful educational production, "The Panama Canal from an Aeroplane." Robert G. Fowler, the aviator, will lecture on the canal as the pictures are shown. This will be the last run of moving pictures at the Gaiety for the present, preparations being under way for a resumption of musical comedy.

The Unique and Odeon theaters on Market street have been fitted up with new player pianos, and an increased attendance at both houses has marked the improvement in the music furnished.

Charles Stillwell, manager of the Silver Palace theater, has scored a decisive victory over Chief of Police White and is now privileged to show war pictures at any time he may desire. He was recently granted a temporary injunction against interference from the chief of police and at a later hearing of the case a permanent injunction was given by the court. This victory is especially significant in that it was won without the assistance of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, though the benefits that will come through the settlement of the question will be enjoyed by all of the members of that organization. It is not anticipated that the chief of police will make any further efforts to suppress the display of films depicting war scenes, either original or acted.

The California Motion Picture Corporation has rebuilt its studio recently destroyed by fire and has completed work on "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." Blanche Chapman, who took the part of Mrs. Wiggs, has left for Winnipeg to take up her regular stage work.

CHURCH.

MISSOURI.

THE outdoor services of the Christian First Methodist churches at Brookfield, at the airdome, with moving picture accompaniment have proved very attractive. People have come in from the surrounding country, and on a recent Sunday evening a dozen touring cars were parked in front of the theater. The comfort of the place has drawn much patronage for the moving picture shows during the week.

A new open air theater showing films was opened in Springfield August 20, the Delmar Garden. This place has been completely remodeled and redecorated, and the promise is made that the best pictures will be shown and good music offered. The admission is 5 cents; under previous management the price was 10 cents.

The Ramo Film Co. has just reopened its branch house at Kansas City, the address being 417-418 Gloyd building. J. D. Thatcher, Jr., formerly with the Universal and Warners, but more recently with the World Film Corporation, is special representative of the Ramo Film Co. The firm had opened a branch in Kansas City two months previously, but it was temporarily discontinued. Mr. Thatcher is getting things started again in good shape, and says that business is exceptionally brisk.

The Globe theater in Kansas City opened its season August 20 under the management of W. E. Newkirk, formerly manager of the Haymarket theater in Chicago. The Globe will inaugurate a new policy this season; the price of admission will be 10 cents all over the house. It is a combination theater, with great stress laid on the pictures.

The Grand theater at Brookfield recently admitted free all children who came on the special day, and gave each a present beside. Mothers were asked to bring the small children who couldn't come alone—and the house was packed.

There have been no more enthusiastic witnesses of the How travel pictures anywhere than the hundreds of Boy Scouts who saw the show in Kansas City as the guests of the Kansas City Post. They filled the lower floor and the balconies at the Grand opera house. During the intermissions the boys sang songs and cheered, and they had a royal good time.

The Jefferson theater at Springefild has done a rushing businss in flies this sumer. It gave fly swaters away to visitors, and it admitted free any boy who brought 100 dead flies. The mosquito season is now on—but the manager has said that there is no need to stimulate the slaughter of mosquitoes.

BROWN.

NORTHWESTERN NEW YORK.

THE new Hippodrome, on Main street, near Chippewa, Buffalo's largest playhouse, was opened for the first time Saturday, August 29. According to printed reports, the theater and the site cost nearly a million dollars. The seating capacity is 3,000. High class moving pictures and operatic singers are featured. A. R. Sherry is manager. His staff is Isidore Moses, assistant manager; John Carr, treasurer; Emmett Ludiche, director of orchestra. Mr. Carr was formerly assistant treasurer of Shea's theater, Buffalo. According to Mr. Sherry, the Hippodrome will have the exclusive right to show the Paramount Film Co.'s pictures in Buffalo. There is an eighteen-piece orchestra and a $30,000 pipe organ. The prices of admission range from 10 to 50 cents. The Hippodrome is owned by the Shea Amusement Co., which has vaudeville theaters in Buffalo, Toronto and other cities. The company is headed by Michael Shea, a pioneer theatrical man, known as the founder of vaudeville in Buffalo.

The Mark-Brock Theatrical Enterprises of Buffalo are building a number of moving picture theaters—three in that city, one in Syracuse, one in Olean, N. Y., one in Lynn, Mass., and one in Worcester, Mass.

A. R. Sherry recently managed a two-weeks' engagement of Annette Kellermann in "Neptune's Daughter," a moving picture production, at the Majestic theater, Buffalo.

Upward of seventy licenses have been issued to moving picture operators in Rochester, N. Y.

Advertising of the Batavia, N. Y., agricultural fair has been shown on the screens of moving picture theaters in that city.

Buffalo churches must obtain licenses from the city if they wish to run moving picture shows to entertain Sunday school children or illustrate lectures or sermons. This opinion has just been given by Assistant City Attorney Frederick C. Rupp to Alfred H. Martin, who represents Calvary Presbyterian Church of that city. Mr. Martin asked for an opinion. Calvary church desired to install a moving picture machine.

William Whiston of Buffalo has been appointed a booking agent for the George Kleine attractions.

A. R. Sherry managed the Kellerman pictures shown recently at the Majestic theater, Buffalo.

Manager Schlesinger of the Academy theater, Buffalo, which plays vaudeville and moving pictures, is taking advantage of the European war to advertise his shows. He recently had a display of modern rifles in his lobby. There was also a large map of Europe. Small flags of the countries involved were placed on the map at points where battles are being fought. Sherman's statement about the seriousness of war was displayed on a large sign. Manager Davis of Keith's theater, Buffalo, also showed at the front of his house magazine pictures and other scenes of the war.

Charles W. Denzinger has been appointed manager of the Olympic vaudeville and moving picture theater, Buffalo. At one time he managed the Kinemacolor plant in Los Angeles. He has also been in charge of these houses: Family, Ottawa; Majestic, Toronto; Empire, Cleveland. Several years ago he was treasurer of Shea's theater, Buffalo.

A $45,000 theater, seating 1,000, is to be built in Seneca Falls, N. Y., by business men of that city. The house will have an entrance in Fall street. C. Merritt Curtiss, who designed the Eckel theater, Syracuse, will draw the plans.

It is reported that Fitzhugh Hall, Rochester, a moving picture house, has been taken over by the General Theaters Co., Buffalo. The name of the house has been changed to the Winter Garden. The building is being improved extensively.

BILLY BISON.

WISCONSIN.

THE PRINCESS THEATER on Wisconsin street in Kenosha, which has been under lease to the Perfection Film Company of Chicago, is now under the management of a company headed by T. A. Blaise and Charles Weeks, both of Chicago. The new concern took over the five-year lease held by the Perfection Company with the consent of the Kenosha Elk's Association. The policy under the new management has not been fully outlined but it is not unlikely that some vaudeville will be given in connection with the picture programs which have been running at the theater.

Pitcher & Sorensen have sold the equipment of the moving picture show at the Armory theater in Ripon City to H. L. Lawless, proprietor of the Ripon theater, who in the future will operate both photoplay houses.

"Our attendance is running 100 to 250 per cent larger than last summer" is the announcement made by the elated Monroe theater at Monroe. The Monroe is not laying off because there is a chautauqua in town. "We believe that as many of you as possible should attend," says the management. "Chautauquas are good for a town, just as a good hand is good for a town. Both should be fostered, but—please don't forget our superfine pictures."

"News from the front" is a good wartime caption used by the Bijou theater of Marinette. "News from the front row informs us that our pictures are just as clear and plain as the last row in the house. Try it."

The Wisconsin state fair board may enlarge upon the moving picture plan of advertising tried out this year. Results from the short film made are so encouraging that this fall greater length will be allowed and competent lecturers and entertainers sent out on tour to attract business for the 1915 exposition.

Witherspoon street's dream of a $75,000 moving picture theater has been shattered by the announcement that the plans have been suddenly changed and that the promoters secured a location near Nassau street, Princeton, N. J. There are two rumors afloat regarding the erection of this theater. One is that the promoters have allied themselves with the University Store, which has purchased the Waitt property on Baker street and will erect the theater with a Nassau street frontage and when completed will be used as a picture house. The other report, which seems more probable, is that the theater will be built in the rear of the Waitt property with a frontage on Baker street.

Another house has been added to the roster of moving picture houses in Allentown, Pa. The new venture is the "Nedson," at 10th and Allen streets, and will be opened on Monday, August 31. The proprietors of the establishment are Harry S. Kaiser and Richard George Boynton. New feature films will be shown daily.

The exhibition of motion picture films that are immoral, sacrilegious, or in any way objectionable, can legally be prevented in the State of Pennsylvania, according to a decision handed down by Judge Martin in Common Pleas Court No. 5. The ruling sustains the validity of the act of June 11, 1913, creating the State Board of Censors of which J. Louis Breitinger is the head and E. C. Nivan an assistant. The present action, testing the act, was brought by the Buffalo branch of the Mutual Film Corporation, the Mutual Film Corporation of Pennsylvania and the Interstate Film Company, the Overbrook Theater and the Pittsburgh Photoplay Company. The plaintiffs contended that the censorship act was unconstitutional and an unlawful interference with the interstate commerce. Judge Martin, in deciding that the act was not unconstitutional, declares that it is purely an exercise of police power of the State enacted to conserve the morals and manners of the public, and as such its purport is within the scope of legislative authority.

CONGDON.

PENNSYLVANIA.

THE Mullen Theater at Vandergrift, Pa., had a pay day Friday, August 21. Every paid admission received a pay envelope that contained real money from one cent to two dollars, and there was plenty to give away. At seven o'clock the pavement in front of the theater was crowded, every one waiting to receive his pay envelope as he passed through the door. Of course this plan of pay day has caused much excitement among "movie" fans, for every one goes with the hope of receiving a "fat envelope" and it is the talk of the town. The scheme has made the Mullen Theater very popular along with the idea of showing life-sized pictures of the babies of the town on the screen every night. The management wishes to photograph all the babies in the town and to show them on the screen in order to award some mother for having the prettiest baby in Vandergrift.

A record-breaking crowd attended the opening of the remodeled and reconstructed Keystone Theater at Tarentum, Pa., Monday, August 17. The attraction was the motion picture drama "The Third Degree," in five parts, which seemed to please the observers greatly. Each person received a souvenir fan.

On account of the grand opening of the remodeled Buffet, Manager Reed of the Nixon Theater, in Tarentum, Pa., invited everybody to enjoy four reels of pictures Tuesday, August 18. A fine "menu" was prepared for the grand opening, and the public was cordially invited to attend. Everybody was welcome to walk in the theater and enjoy the four reels of pictures at their leisure.

F. N. Hait, commercial agent of the Lehigh Valley, Pittsburgh, received advice recently from headquarters that moving pictures of the freight transfer at Manchester, N. Y., would be exhibited in Pittsburgh so that Pittsburgh railroad men would have the opportunity to view the workings of the transfer. The Olympic Theater, Fifth avenue, and the Rex, Penn avenue, East End, will show the pictures. This picture will appeal to the traffic men in all parts of the country as the Manchester transfer is equipped with every modern device to facilitate the handling of great quantities of freight and represents the latest in its class.

A. Baltimore of New Castle, Pa., has just finished remodeling his picture theater, and it now fills all the requirements of the state law. The entrances and exits were enlarged, and the auditorium will now accommodate its large patronage. Two machines will be operated instead of one. Due to the high class performances he presents, Mr. Baltimore has built up a large patronage. Only high class pictures will be shown, and continuous exhibitors will be run in the future.

G. Stratigos will open a new moving picture house at 112 Electric avenue, East Pittsburgh, about the first of September. It is Mr. Stratigos' intentions to conduct a high class house and to have everything run on a modern plan.

The Health Sanitarium at Crescent, Pa., recently installed a Power's 6 A. Cameragraph.

Ground was broken recently for the new moving picture theater to be erected on Broadway near Haywood street, Sharon, Pa. The Farrell Building Company was awarded the contract for the structure by T. J. Burke of Pittsburgh, and it is expected that the house will be opened this winter. It will seat about six or seven hundred persons and when it is completed will cost in the neighborhood of $10,000 or $12,000.

The Imperial Theater on Beaver avenue, Pittsburgh, has changed hands. A. R. Robinson of the Robinson Realty Company is the new lessee, while Thomas R. Eichholtz, the old manager, will continue as such. This is a fine picture theater which opened last Spring in the Manchester section.

The Homewood Theater at 820 Homewood avenue, Pittsburgh, is being enlarged and improved. The rear of the house is being extended back forty feet, making room enough for sixty more seats, a total capacity of four hundred. Worthington & Watson are the owners, and H. J. Soost is the manager.

H. Clay Berger, who, for several years was in the employment of the Weiland Film Company, is now the new manager of the Keno Feature Film Company at the corner of Fourth avenue and Ferry street, Pittsburgh. Mr. Berger enjoys the acquaintance of most of the exhibitors hereabouts, and should make good in his new position.

Louis Heppinger of Clairton, Pa., is talking of buying a new picture theater and is looking for propositions in Washington and Carrick, Pa.

Judge Thomas J. Ford set the 31st of August for the sale of assets of the Pitt Theater Company, Pittsburgh. The sale was requested by James F. McHenry, who was named receiver. After taking over the theater and conducting picture plays for two weeks, Mr. McHenry reported to court that he deemed it unprofitable to continue business. This house has been exhibiting feature films this summer.

Thomas Crissey and David Jonathan of Hooversville, Pa., has recently opened a new theater in this town which has proved a successful undertaking. The house is packed at every performance.

Calendar of Quality Releases

A CALENDAR of quality releases, five Biograph productions a week, commences on Monday, September 14th. A motion picture production is judged by its photographic quality and its quality for entertainment.

You have never seen a Biograph production of poor photographic quality. The equipment necessary to maintain this high standard of photographic quality is ample for the producing of five releases each week.

You have seen Biograph productions of only ordinary interest, but you have also seen Biograph productions that have never been equaled by any motion picture ever produced. Between the two we have reached an average which has made you feel confident that every time you ran a Biograph the production would entertain. It is this high average that will be maintained throughout these five releases.

You may feel assured that when you run a Biograph it will entertain your audience and if it does that both of us have accomplished our object.

Charles E. Hoover has leased a building at 112 East Ohio street, North Side, Pittsburgh, and will install a motion picture theater in the first floor.

J. B. Ross is the new manager of the Manor Theater in Irwin, Pa.

The C. L. Saxon Company, Pittsburgh, has sold for F. L. and C. J. Simersl the leasehold and business of the Palace Theater on Market street, Steubenville, Ohio, to G. B. Meyers, for $3,000. MANLEY.

IOWA.

PROMOTERS for a "legitimate" theater for Fort Dodge, who are said to have met with only lukewarm encouragement, attribute the reluctance of the citizens to invest in such an enterprise to the moving picture shows. People with money, which they want to earn a reasonable interest, apparently feel that the photoplay is satisfying the amusement needs of the public, and regard a theatrical house in one of the smaller cities as an uncertain venture.

L. T. Todd has moved his moving picture show in Mt. Ayr to a new location.

Tegtmeier Brothers have installed moving picture equipment in the opera house at Westgate and are giving moving picture shows.

With a completely altered interior Manager A. C. Thompson has reopened the Star theater on Main street, between Fourth and Fifth streets in Dubuque.

Manager Williams of the Isis theater at Lake City has secured the Hungate building on the west side of the square as a location.

Mike Ford of Cedar Rapids has taken a ninety-nine year lease on sixty feet of land on Third avenue, to be used as a site for the erection of a new moving picture theater and office building.

The unusual modesty of Manager F. J. Hemminger of the Parkside theater at Clinton ought to bring him some business. He listed the films for three shows recently, accompanying them with no more than the conservative statement: "All very good programs."

Harold Packard has purchased the interest of C. O. Sawyer in the moving picture show at Hull, and the house will not be operated by the firm of Cawood & Packer.

An interest in the new Palace theater, which has been operated at Waterloo, Ia., by the Ford & Diebold corporation of Cedar Rapids since last April, has been purchased by W. L. Myers, who has been managing the house since its opening. The success of the Palace as a moving picture house is attributed in a newspaper statement by Mr. Myers to the use of newspaper publicity and feature films. Mrs. Myers, who is an accomplished musician, will become the organist at the Palace.

George F. Clark has been made manager of the Majestic theater at Des Moines, which opened the latter part of August as a five and ten cent house.

The Airdome at Fairfield gives away an automobile coupon with each ten cent ticket.

L. O. Brewer has assumed possession of the Iris theater at Hamburg, which he recently purchased.

Miller & Schulkin are erecting a modern moving picture theater, to cost about $8,000, at the southwest corner of Fourth and Jennings streets in Sioux City. September 17 has been fixed for the date of completion of the new Princess theater on Fourth and Jackson streets in Sioux City. A children's play room and nursery, check room, retiring rooms for men and women, and boxes and loges for private parties are some of the features of this modern picture playhouse, which will have a seating capacity of 1,600.

A moving picture show has been opened in St. Peter's Hall at Cosgrove by Lottis and Frank Rohret.

Arrangements have been made to film the style show which will be held in Muscatine in September. The picture will be run in one of the local houses.

G. D. Smith has sold his interest in the Happy Hour theater at Cherokee to A. G. Ferris.

Peculiar engineering problems will confront the builders of the new moving picture theater to be erected at Waterloo for W. S. Butterfield and Marcus Heiman. The new house will be built over a mill race at the end of the Fourth street bridge and the difficulties will lie in the construction of the foundation. The plans have been drawn and it is the hope of the owners to throw the house open for use about Thanksgiving Day. A large pipe organ will be installed.

William Fraser, proprietor of the Fraser theater at Spencer, who purchased the moving picture theater of J. A. Meadows at Sioux Rapids, resold it to Mr. and Mrs. Hulgar Christensen of Spencer, who will operate it. Fraser has purchased from C. M. Pinneo the Unique theater in Spencer and will operate both the Spencer picture houses.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

KENTUCKY.

FIRE, which started at 6 o'clock on the morning of August 24, completely destroyed Hopkins Theater, one of the oldest theaters in Louisville, which had been devoted to moving pictures for several years. The theater was built in 1872 by the Liederkranz Singing Society, at a cost of $100,000. For years it was known as Leiderkranz Hall, but was later called Music Hall, after the Liederkranz Society built a new home at Sixth and Walnut streets. The Hopkins Amusement Company, of which A. C. Seuever, of St. Louis, is the head, purchased the building about ten years ago, and for the past few years have operated it as a motion picture house. For years it was one of the leading vaudeville houses. For a number of years prior to the time the Hopkins Company took control, the building was used principally for conventions, concerts and boxing matches. In June, 1899, the Democratic convention was held in which William Goebel won the nomination for Governor of Kentucky over General Wat Hardin and Capt. W. J. Stone. This memorable convention, which had a tragic sequel in the assassination of Governor Goebel, went down in political history as the "Music Hall Convention." The fire is supposed to have started from crossed wires and when first discovered the dome of the theater was in flames. Manager Harry Bilger stated that the property was partly covered by insurance. He was unable to estimate the property loss on the theater, but believed that it would amount to about $75,000. Mr. Bilger is also manager of Fontaine Ferry Park, which is also operated by the Hopkins Amusement Company. The quarters of a number of local unions which had occupied the upper floors of the building were destroyed. For a time it appeared as if the whole block would be consumed, but the firemen managed to hold the fire inside the walls. Nothing but the walls were left of the building, and it is improbable that it will be rebuilt, as the location has not been an especially desirable one for several years past, since the theatrical houses opened further out in the city.

The Buckingham Theater, Louisville, will open its burlesque house on August 31, and will also show pictures. The theater caters almost entirely to men, and has a very large patronage Smoking is allowed at all times and drinks are sold in the house during weekdays.

The Masonic Theater, at Fourth and Chestnut streets, Louisville, will open shortly as a burlesque house. Last season it was operated as a motion picture house, and it is probable that some pictures will be shown this season, but the policy of the company is not known.

Kentucky exhibitors are very much perturbed over the shortage of carbons for motion picture houses. Letters have been received by the big exhibitors from the carbon houses, notifying them that no further shipments can be made. The carbons come from Germany and the stock is said to be exhausted. Carbons cannot be purchased at any price in Louisville, and the small exhibitors out through the state who were caught short are up in the air. However, it is said that they will use the cheaper grades of carbon, which are made in this country. The carbons made on this side, however, fail to throw the strong white light of the imported stock and a good deal of dissatisfaction has been expressed over having to use the domestic article. A number of the local houses have purchased carbon extensions, which allow for using up the stumps.

Rowland Clark, of Lebanon, Ky., was recently in Louisville, where he tried to secure a stock of carbon. Fifty sticks were the best he could do, however, and he is hard pressed for a supply. Manager D. Levenson of the Novelty Theater Company, had just received a shipment of 5,000 sticks before the war broke out, but he has disposed of as much of it as he can afford to dispose of.

"The Man on the Box," the great Lasky production in which Max Figman takes the leading part, made a tremendous hit with the patrons of the Majestic Amusement Company, Louisville. The house was jammed during the days this picture was shown. The book was popular here a few years ago, and the pictures were more popular.

Miss Georgia Ludwig, formerly booking clerk of the Kinemacolor Company, of Kentucky, which was operated by Lewis J. Dittmar, of the Majestic Amusement Company, Louisville, has taken a like position with the new S. & P. Film Company, which recently located on Green, between Fourth and Fifth. The new company is going well and has taken on ten houses in Louisville and twenty out in the state in the last ten days. Fireproof safes have been installed in the exchange for storing all reels. The safes are divided and labeled, comedy, drama, etc., and the arrangement is unusually good. Four inspectors are employed in going over the films and handling the shipping. A Cole automobile was purchased recently for handling city business. Charles Pressy, one of the officers of the company, left last week for Kokomo, Ind., to handle the Kokomo Exposition, which he has been promoting.

D. Levenson, manager of the Novelty Theater Company, reports that business has improved considerably during the past few days. The revived film, "Love's Refrain," in which Mary Pickford and King Baggot took the leading parts some years ago, was shown at the theater during the past week, along with the big Universal feature, "Trey o' Hearts." The combination was a great one and the house was unable to handle the crowds which were attracted.

J. J. Hebbert, manager of the Louisville office of the Warner Feature Company, left last week for Bowling Green and other Kentucky points. He is out after bookings for the new three-reel Warner production, "Across the Border."

The K. & W. Motion Picture Company has returned to Louisville and is now located at 460 South Fourth street. The firm is composed of G. H. Kendrick, a son of one of Louisville's leading jewelers, and R. H. Williams. The boys have just returned from a long trip to Mexico and Central America, where they have been taking war pictures. The pictures were sold to New York concerns as rapidly as produced. The company is now handling commercial work mostly, but recently made the film "Army Life," which was done on contract, and showed the First Kentucky Regiment, of the National Guards, at Camp Fort Nelson, near Lexington, Ky., while on their annual outing.

The Mary Anderson Theater, Louisville, which was formerly the Keith Theater, has installed a large Wurlitzer Unit Orchestra, to be used with the photoplays which will hereafter constitute the entire bill at the old vaudeville house. The National Theater, which is now in the Keith circuit, will continue to run some pictures along with vaudeville.

The Colonial Amusement Company, of Harrodsburg, which recently opened its theater is doing very well. Signal lights have been put up in front of the building on Main street to flash the beginnings of each performance.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

CINCINNATI.

THE steady increase in the price of carbons, due, of course, to the European situation, is causing exhibitors considerable uneasiness, as no top to the market is in sight, the present figure being $14 per 100, as compared with the usual price of $4 a hundred.

President Harry E. Aitken, president of the Mutual Film Corporation, while in Cincinnati recently predicted general and unprecedented prosperity for the American film business as a result of the war in Europe, increasing attendance at motion picture houses everywhere being the first and most significant part of this predicted improvement in business. That American producers will be forced to extend themselves in the manufacture of big features, to take the place of pictures of this sort which have been coming largely from abroad, is another phase of the matter of large importance, according to Mr. Aitken, whose opinions in this connection are of special interest in view of his interests in England and continental Europe.

Some wild and woolly western pictures of a remarkable nature are in the possession of J. W. Thompson, of Laredo, Texas, formerly of Zanesville, O., who was in Cincinnati last week making booking arrangements for these films. They consist of several reels of pictures taken in Dimmit County, Texas, of the smuggling affairs which attracted so much attention there some time ago, several persons being killed and a large number of smugglers captured. Mr. Thompson left Ohio in 1873, and has been in Texas ever since, his present trip being his first back to his old home. He has the Ohio rights to the pictures referred to.

The Pathe five-reel feature showing travel and hunting scenes in Central Africa, including elephant, giraffe, hippoppotamus and crocodile shooting, met with a really enthusiastic reception at the Orpheum, in Walnut Hills, on Sunday night of last week, expressions of commendation from persons in the audience being strong and numerous. The picture has high educational value, the section showing the journey of a letter from the heart of the wilderness to civilization being especially interesting. Besides this big subject, the Orpheum showed a pair of Biograph comedies and some other matter, making up a program a little longer and considerably better than usual.

Messrs. Edward and Harry Hart, well-known theatrical men, have secured options on a pair of fine corner sites in Norwood, the city adjoining Cincinnati, one of which will be used in the construction of one of the finest and most up-to-date motion picture and vaudeville houses in or around the Queen City. Among other novel features which have been announced are an electric fountain to be placed in the vestibule and an automatic organ for the entertainment of patrons during intermissions, which will cost in the neighborhood of $10,000. John McAlfrick, of Boston, one of the leading architects of the country, is preparing the plans for the house, upon which work will probably be started this fall.

The balcony at the Lyric theater, of Dayton, O., has not only been filled regularly recently, contrary to the experience of most exhibitors whose houses have such a seating space, but the second balcony as well has been crowded almost daily, which constitutes a high compliment to the policy of the management to exhibit only first-class pictures. It has been decided on account of the constantly large houses attending to keep the second balcony open regularly hereafter in order to take care of everybody. Five and ten cents are the prices charged, the lower floor seats being held at the higher figure, of course, while children are admitted for five cents, and adults also, to the balconies. An idea which has also proved popular at the Lyric is the distribution of souvenir pictures of popular photoplay stars.

Mayor Fred A. Hartenstein, of Youngstown, O., announces that he has been notified by the Ohio board of motion picture censors, as have, presumably, other municipal executives, that after September 1 no film may be shown in Ohio unless it complies fully with the statutes under which the board is acting. This action, it is said, has been under consideration for some time. Youngstown exhibitors are not worrying much over this apparently important and far-reaching announcement, however, as they are almost without exception careful in their selection of films, and expect for this reason to be hampered very little by the censorship.

ANOTHER theater—the Garden at Cleburne, Tex.—has found that the public would rather see good pictures than vaudeville. Miss Clements, the owner and manager, discontinued the variety attractions and suffered no loss in patronage. On the contrary, the first three nights after the change was made there was an increase in attendance.

The Broadway theater at Muskogee, Okla., has started a policy of one act of vaudeville and from three to five reels of pictures which will run until the regular fall vaudeville season opens.

A petition signed by a hundred women of Muskogee, Okla., was filed with W. N. Patterson, safety commissioner of that city, protesting against the showing of moving pictures of the life of Al Jennings, the former bandid, who is a candidate for governor. The protest declared that the films would incite imaginative boys to acts of crime.

Hereafter the Majestic theater at Tulsa, Okla., will be known as "The House of Features." The program of regular releases will give way to multiple reel subjects, including a number of the George Kleine features.

A moving picture advertising scheme patterned after the Booklovers' and Song Lovers' contests conducted by large newspapers, has been exploited in the southwest. Major L. P. Berry and Gen. Will Surrige of Little Rock, Ark., appeared before the Business Men's League of Hot Springs, Ark., and asked the co-operation of that organization, inasmuch as trips to Hot Springs were to be included in the prizes. The plan is to publish a series of scenes illustrating various moving picture titles in some St. Louis papers, and the person guessing the most of them to be awarded the capital prize. Books containing the names of 1,800 titles would be sold to the contestants at 75 cents each. The plan met with the approval of the league, which was asked to guarantee the expense to amount of $5,000.

A special musical program was given at the Empress theater in Oklahoma City, Okla., when the American "The End of a Perfect Day" was shown. The story was written by Rev. Clarence J. Harris of Oklahoma City, who entertained a small party of friends. The song, "The Perfect Day," by Carrie Jacobs Bond, gave the idea for the photoplay and with this as a basis E. Chouteu, organist, made up an appropriate accompaniment. The film showing the breaking of the ground for the Oklahoma building at the San Francisco Exposition was also shown at the Empress under the auspices of the Oklahoma Panama-Pacific Exposition Commission.

The Queen theater at Dallas, Tex., is featuring its ticket books in its "Queen Theater News," which is published on half-pages of local papers. These books of fifty tickets are sold for $4 and are good for the best seats at any time—even when the admission is twenty cents.

A soap company in Palestine, Tex., offered $100 in gold to the person, church, or society turning in to the Best theater the most wrappers from its brand of soaps.

Construction of Callum's adobe theater at Alpine, Tex., has been rapid. It will seat 600 persons.

The pictures of the world tour of the Giants and White Sox was almost a local feature at the Best theater in Bonham, Tex., because it showed the events of the day the teams spent in Bonham.

Patrons of the Queen theater at Bonham, Tex., were furnished with a card something like a meal ticket. When $5 worth of admissions were punched out on this a free pass for a week was issued. The first card which was punched out entitled the holder to a brass and copper jardinier.

The Lyric theater at Sherman, Tex., was closed a portion of the week during the old settler's picnic, but opened for the Saturday matinee. The King theater was open from 9.30 a. m. to 11 p. m. during the festivities. The Gem theater went after busines from the visitors with special programs.

The new Lyric, the $30,000 theater at Brownwood, Tex., has been taken over by J. M. Robb & Son of Big Spring.

W. J. Lytle and others have leased the Brady theater at San Antonio, Tex., for fifteen years for $300,000.

A local educational and scenic picture in the nature of a trip through Arizona with Governor Hunt was featured by the Starland theater at Douglas, Ariz. It showed the state prison and the work done on the roads of that state.

John Secord of the Majestic theater at San Antonio, Tex., recently furnished a four-reel program for a private show in the lodge room of the local Elks. Well-selected programs, given in this manner ought to create business for the theater.

J. C. Sims, former manager of the Star theater, is operating the new moving picture theater which has been opened at Yukon, Okla.

Jud Ryan has opened a moving picture show at Bowie, Ariz.

The Cozy theater at Houston, Tex., has reopened under new management feautring moving pictures, vaudeville and musical comedy.

Middle-aged women are proposed for membership on the board of moving picture censors which is urged upon the city ocffiials at Enid, Okla. A committee of attorneys was named to draft an ordinance providing for a board of not less than three nor more than five members. An unusual feature of this movement is that it suggests that the candidates for this board be compelled to pass an examination as to their fitness. The city has no funds for paying salaries, and it is probable that exhibitors will fight any attempt to have the cost of the inspection paid by the moving picture houses.

The Colonial and Savoy theaters at Greenvill, Tex., have booked the entire output of the General Film Company to be used in the two houses.

The Panther City Amusement Company of Fort Worth, Tex., has reduced the admission to its moving picture show at the Airdome, Seventh and Throckmorton streets, to five cents.

A stock company has been formed, it is reported, to erect a moving picture theater on the site of the Alamo Plaza at San Antonio, Tex., which has been leased by Carb, Parker & Carb, real estate men of Fort Worth.

F. J. Huff has sold the Queen theater at Soper, Okla., to E. A. Ingle.

The Bijou and Amuseu theaters at Wagoner, Okla., are now under the same management, the Bijou having been sold to Humphrey & Son.

W. T. Cutter has closed the Amuzu theater at Hinton, Okla.

The Joie theater at Fort Gibson, Okla., has been sold to W. P. Stockton of Van Buren, who will operate it as a moving picture house.

MICHIGAN.

MUNICIPAL officials of Sault Ste Marie went in a body to attend the opening of the Temple theater in that city. Cook & Beardsley did a first night business of 2,200 admissions and had to turn away people. The initial program featured the Vitagraph "Love, Luck and Gasoline"; local pictures of the Fourth of July parade and the interesting Ford's Weekly.

The Gem theater which has opened for the fall and winter season at St. John will be operated this year as a five-cent instead of a ten-cent house.

Gilligham & Smith of Grand Rapids have let the contract to C. Hoertz & Son of that city for the erection of the new Vaudette theater on Monroe avenue to cost about $10,000. Construction commenced Sept. 1 and is expected to be completed early in October.

Phillip Lynch, owner and Fitzpatrick, McElroy & Pelley, lessees of the Bijou theater on East Main street at Benton Harbor, have made arrangements to remodel the house at an expenditure of $25,000. The building will be lengthened twenty feet, increasing the seating capacity to 1,000 persons. Walls and floors will be fireproof. The operating room will be enlarged and improved and two new Simplex machines installed. Construction will begin in the middle of September and the house will be closed from that time until about the first of November.

"There are many pictures that could well be presented on Sunday, too, pictures that would be good for the mind and assist in the progress of civilization," says the Ishpeming Iron Ore.

The Northern Michigan Forest Protective Association began at the Lyric theater in Houghton its campaign of educating the people of the copper country in the prevention of forest fires. A thousand feet of films showing the big blazes and how they could be avoided were taken by the forest rangers.

Lou Delane has moved his moving picture show into the Mary Green building at Oxford.

W. F. Pump has purchased the moving picture show at Utica from H. S. Dusenbury. He has moved it to a new location.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

A WEEK or two of rainy weather has caused many of the moving picture exhibitors in the District of Columbia to complain and to believe that theirs is the only business against which nature owes a grudge. They seem to lose sight of the fact that last winter as a whole was the top-line period in the moving picture business, and the gains thus made more than offset the present losses. As an evidence of how poor business has been, many of the theaters that have heretofore been closed immediately upon the arrival of warm weather will this year run the full twelve months without even a shut down for renovation or any other reason. Regardless of the fact that in this city competition is exceptionally keen, the exhibitors en masse expect one of the best of seasons during the coming months and are preparing accordingly that they may get their share and perhaps a little bit more of the patronage.

A. Dresner, who left this city the first of the month for the dual purpose of sticking his head into the matrimonial yoke and incidentally to accept the position of manager of the Pittsburgh branch of Warner's Features, Inc., was given a great surprise when he was presented with a purse of gold by the Screen Club of Washington, D. C., of which he is the president. It is needless to say that Mr. Dresner is one of the most popular exchangemen that the city has ever boasted of and his going to a new field is a matter of deep regret.

The going of Mr. Dresner does not, however, bring a stranger to fill the chair of manager of the Washington Film Exchange for H. F. Lavalle, the new "boss," was at a previous time associated with the Universal interests in this city, and is remembered by many of the exhibitors. Mr. Lavalle has had considerable experience in the moving picture business and has been connected with the Mutual and Universal companies in Wilkesbarre and Philadelphia and was also the head of the Empire Film Exchange in the latter city.

Another loss is also to be suffered by the going of "Johnny" O'Brien, who has been manager of the Electric Film Exchange since the opening of that office in the "Film Exchange" building, as assistant manager under Mr. Dresner in Pittsburgh. Mr. O'Brien is now in that city looking things over pending the arrival of his chief. Mr. O'Brien has been actively connected with the Screen Club since the forming of that organization and has been the prime mover in many stunts that have been pulled off. During his short stay here he made a host of friends by his ever present good humor. George Smiley, who has been assistant to Mr. O'Brien, now becomes chief of that office. Mr. Smiley is a young man full of ginger and is very well known in the local field.

C. O. Morse, field man for the local district of Warner's Features, Inc., has just returned from a four weeks' trip through the Virginias and is now about to leave for an extended tour through the Carolinas. He reports business good.

Warner's Features, through the Washington branch office, is distributing some very handsome posters. These are of a sort of photographic reproduction of scenes from its various features and of the actors and actresses who take a leading part therein. These are toned in buff and by their neatness attract widespread attention. This is something of a novelty for it gets away from the gaudy posters which almost scare one to death and tend to give a tone of exclusiveness to the houses which use them. The daily papers have long decried the use of the flaring posters and have urged that something along this line be adopted.

The World correspondent was much surprised to run into "Tom" Eastwood while stopping over in Philadelphia recently. Mr. Eastwood was on his way to New York to interview the different producing companies in connection with the ball which is to be held during the fall by the Exhibitors' League. He is very enthusiastic over this project and declares that it will be the biggest event ever staged in this section of the country. He states that already considerable support has been pledged.

A special exhibition of the Simplex machine was last week given at the offices of the Washington Film Exchange, at 419 Ninth avenue, Northwest, to a number of local exhibitors and operators by George Bothwell. This exchange, the General Film Company and the Mutual Film Corporation have been designated the authorized dealers for this machine in this territory.

It is reported that the Department of Agriculture is about to establish a laboratory for the making and printing of moving pictures which are to be distributed free throughout the country. The Navy Department and the Public Health Service have already availed themselves of the opportunities of extending their work through the medium of moving pictures and other departments are expected to follow suit. It has been found that greater publicity can thus be given than through any other method. The productions of the Department of Agriculture are to be exhibited at colleges, universities and State Agricultural Experiment stations and will be handled by the division of publications. It is also planned to release some of the educational films without charge through the motion picture theaters.

IN THE NORTHWEST.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL LYNDON A. SMITH of Minnesota has given an opinion that good clean moving pictures may be shown on Sunday in any town in Minnesota which has no local ordinance forbidding such exhibitions. This opinion was furnished to K. H. Balcon of Brewerville who wanted to know the status of the exhibitor in a town where no provision is made for Sunday shows.

Charles E. Bell, cameraman for the Raths-Seavolt Moving Picture Company of St. Paul, Minn., was at Bismarck, N. D., where he made up a 1,000-foot reel of farm land pictures to be used by a St. Paul land company. The pictures contain much of interest about the city and will be shown in some of the Bismarck houses.

The Montana Exposition Motion Picture Company of Butte, Mont., which was awarded the contract for taking the pictures to be used in the state exhibit at the San Francisco fair, has its cameramen at work in the agricultural sections of the state.

Otis Hoyt, acting manager of the Empress theater at Missoula, Mont., recently announced that he would run one Famous Players' feature each week. The business on these pictures has been so satisfactory that he has decided to increase the number to two a week.

Ballots have been distributed among the Saturday night crowds at the Cozy theater at Austin, Minn., to determine what the patrons think of society, military and western dramas and whether they prefer single reel subjects, two-reelers or the multiple reel features.

Merchants of Belle Fourche, S. D., took a one hundred and fifty-two mile automobile trip through that state and southeastern Montana. Stops were made at eleven towns and ranches and at each a band concert, a seven-reel moving picture show and a dance was given.

Manager L. C. Nedderson reopened on August 17 the Bijou theater at Aberdeen, S. D., which had been closed since the middle of June. In the interval it was redecorated and an additional machine installed. Vaudeville will be used the coming season.

Eugene Hanson and Val C. Sherman, Jr., of Mineapolis, Minn., who are interested in the Western Film Company of Minneapolis, recently spent some time at Summit, S. D., and are said to have practically decided upon that community as a producing center. The neighborhood abounds in hill scenery, picturesque lakes and an Indian reservation is conveniently located. Plans of the company call for a series of one-reel comedies featuring Miss Dottie Bartine of New York City. The first of these is to be called "Making Sport of Emil."

The Orpheum theater at Butte, Mont., has been offering its patrons something "novel, local, agreeable" in the shape of "Butte Baby Products in Moving Pictures." Fifty representative children of well-known families are shown driving, riding, boating and in other attractive activities.

The Beacon, at Melrose, Minn., is asking better patronage for the local moving picture house. "Melrose has one of the best motion picture houses in the state, under the most careful and conservative management, and yet, notwithstanding that, only the best pictures are shown the house barely pays expenses without returning interest on the investment."

Will Johnson of Miller, S. D., is operating a moving picture show at Wolsey, S. D.

A committee of business men, representing the churches, visited the state's attorney in Aberdeen, S. D., and protested against the operation of the New Aberdeen, a theatrical house, on Sunday. Stress was laid upon the fact that the house does not exhibit motion pictures, a judge in the circuit court having decided that a motion picture house at Salem was not acting illegally in operating his house on the Sabbath day.

T. L. Jones of Warroad, Minn., has decided to erect a two-story brick building, 24x80, at that place. He will operate a moving picture theater on the ground floor.

The new Lyric theater at Ellendale, N. D., seating 300 and costing about $8,000, will be completed about October 1, the promoters announce.

The Apollo theater, 1131-33 C street, Tacoma, Wash., has announced a new policy in which it will show only pictures released through the Progressive Motion Picture Company. But two changes a week, Sundays and Wednesdays, will be made. Ten and five cents admission will be charged.

The building inspection department at St. Paul, Minn., has issued a permit for the construction of a moving picture theater, 36x90 feet., of brick and costing $6,000 to be erected on the east side of Ohio street, between Winifre and Rohie streets. Andres & Lindgren, 714 W. Congress street, are owners.

The new Pantages house, Charles S. Burnett, resident manager, has been opened at Great Falls, Mont., running vaudeville the first four days of the week and feature films the last three. Myer Burnett of Seattle, Wash., brother of the manager, will lead the orchestra.

The Paulsen theater, Lincoln and Sprague, Spokane, Wash., has installed a new washed-air ventilating system.

Zola Brooks, who purchased the Star theater at Goldendale, Wash., from Lyman Ward, announced his intention of installing a new front and remodeling the interior of the house.

Frank Critcher has opened Critcher's theater at the corner of Northern and Routt, Bessemer, Col. A three piece ladies' orchestra is a novelty.

An "animated baby" contest is being conducted in an original manner by the Reel theater at Anaconda, Mont.

Butte's fire heroes in moving pictures made up a good local attraction at the Orpheum theater in Butte, Mont.

The Pathfinder Party of the Pike's Peak Ocean-to-Ocean Highway movement visited Bingham Canyon, near Salt Lake City, Utah, and made motion pictures of the big copper mines, which will be shown in the east.

The Commercial Club of Dallas, S. D., has appointed a committee to take steps toward the erection of a new opera house for the town.

The Chamber of Commerce of Colorado Springs, Col., has urged the men interested in the scenic attractions in the Pike's region to use advertising space in the motion picture films to be shown at the San Francisco fair. In this manner it is expected to raise $5,000, the county's share of expense in the Colorado building at the exposition.

Plans for remodeling the Willmar Opera House at Willmar, Minn., at a cost of about $12,000, call for veneering the sides and back with white brick, the installation of a model front with marquise and the complete alteration of the interior.

J. N. Ristey has opened a moving picture theater at Spring Grove, Minn., giving shows Wednesday and Saturday nights.

Al Grant has sold his interest in the New Grand theater at Lake City, Minn., to his partner, G. R. Swanson, who will conduct the handsome new theater by himself.

Five reels of moving pictures at each show will be a feature of the Marcus Loew policy at the Empress theater in Portland, Ore.

Films of suffrage parades in Minneapolis, St. Paul and New York will be shown at the Minnesota State Fair by the woman suffragists of that state. Popular appeal to the propaganda will be given by making these missionary films part of a program which includes comedies and other interesting reels.

Activities of the forest ranger in Minnesota, such as the lumberjack at work in the mills, on the drive and in camp, patrolling of the forests by foresters, trenching and back-firing will be shown by moving pictures throughout the state. The films prepared for the Minnesota State Forest Service were exhibited in the theaters in St. Paul and later will be sent to every county fair in the state.

Fred Quimby, who has been manager and one of the stockholders of the Empress theater at Missoula, Mont., has resigned his position to accept one as manager of the Empress theater, running pictures and vaudeville, at Spokane, Wash. Ray Bagley succeeded him as manager of the Missoula photoplay house.

A. A. Lambert of The Dalles, Ore., has opened the Isis, a moving picture and vaudeville house at Ellensburg, Wash. The house will be managed by his son.

Manager Gallagher, of the Miles Hippodrome at Duluth, Minn., does not believe in the programs made up of long subjects and is giving his patrons more short stuff.

The Majestic theater at Rochester, Minn., was given over to the "Creation" pictures for eight days.

The Empress theater at Duluth, Minn., which is giving four acts of vaudeville and three photoplays, has a new policy of ten cents for any seat at any time.

H. M. Hansen of Lewistown, Mont., has purchased a half interest in the Princess theater in that city and will be associated with C. R. Cassett in the management.

Patrons of the Majestic theater at Stillwater, Minn., were given a ticket good for a free glass of an orange drink when presented at a local soda fountain.

The action of the city council of Luverne, Minn., in giving tentative permission to conduct moving picture shows on Sunday is meeting with public approval according to a paper in that city which says that the crowds motoring in to the Sunday night picture shows are equalled only by those of Saturday nights.

Children of Tacoma were the guests of the Ledger and the News at a special performance of "The Spoilers" given at the Tacoma theater.

The Bungalo theater has been opened at St. Maries, Ida., with all new equipment.

Eugene Levy of the Levy Amusement Company, controlling a string of moving picture and vaudeville houses along the Pacific Coast will not taken over the new theater on C street in Tacoma, Wash. The deal has been called off and John S. Baker, the owner of the house, has leased it to the Moore Amusement Company, a new corporation, headed by H. T. Moore of Salt Lake City, Utah. It will be equipped with a new $6,000 pipe organ and operated as a moving picture house. Arthur Prichard and C. M. Riddell of Tacoma are trustees of the corporation which has filed its articles with the county recorder.

M. B. Hake of the Scenic theater at Arlington, Wash., now has the management of the Gem theater in that city which was sold by Manager Graham to E. G. Robinson. The Gem will be operated nightly but the Scenic will be open only on Saturday and Sunday nights.

The Dale theater, Dale street and Selby avenue, St. Paul, Minn., showed the moving pictures which were taken by the St. Paul Trade Boosters' Association on its tour through Minnesota and South Dakota.

As a part of the annual outing of the Seattle, Wash., Press Club, moving pictures were taken of the boat, the train, the eating and a drama written on the boat and acted by members of the club.

Sioux Falls, S. D., was filmed by Coe & Coppens for the Majestic theater of that city. A big oil fire and the first scenes ever taken inside the state penitentiary are of more than local interest.

Will Gay has sold his moving picture equipment at Frankfort, S. D., to G. A. Schone.

J. D. Paladaeaux has purchased the Iris theater at Canby, Minn.

The Ideal moving picture theater at Wheatland, Wyo., has been sold to Miss J. Helen Jones, of Muskogee, Okla., who will operate the house.

Joseph Leaner is now operating the Bijou theater and E. A. Williams the Empress at Eveleth, Minn., the partnership known as the Eveleth Amusement Company having been dissolved.

The opera house at Minnewaukon, N. D., has been remodeled by J. M. Cubbison.

W. H. Dudley has leased the opera house at Revillo, S. D., and opened a moving picture show.

Manager Thomas Furniss has just celebrated the first anniversary of the opening of the Rex theater at Duluth, Minn. He announces himself as more than pleased with the year's business, especially the patornage since he adopted a policy of high class features.

The series of stories dealing with boy and girl life and the influences which tend toward criminal careers which were written by Judge Willis Brown of Salt Lake City, Utah, and produced in Salt Lake, were run for a week at the American theater in that city.

Motion pictures of the second annual Miles City Roundup were booked by the Miles theater at Miles City, Mont.

Ten days of grace were given to the exhibitors of Duluth, Minn., in order that they might fix their theaters in compliance with the safety regulations. If this was not done, the chief of police was ordered by the commissioner of safety to arrest the negligent proprietors. Inasmuch as no names were given out in the report of the fire chief and electrical inspector all moving picture houses in the city received the undeserved stigma of failing to care for their patrons' safety. It is said that the men whose houses were "in a condition that can no longer be tolerated" had been so advised by the city officials.

C. F. Schinkel has opened his modern moving picture house at Groton, S. D. New projection apparatus and new seats have been installed.

The lease on the Rex theater at Tenth and Main streets in Vancouver, Wash., has been taken over by John Kiggins and J. A. McGill, owners of the U. S. A. theater, who will operate both houses. The Rex will be used for vaudeville and theatrical attractions, the U. S. A. being devoted to pictures exclusively.

Tribue to the late John H. Clemmer, a pioneer in the moving picture field in the northwest, will be paid by his sons, who will operate a string of photoplay houses clear across the state of Washington to be known as the Clemmer Theaters. Dr. H. S. Clemmer of Spokane, a son of the late pioneer, has taken a ten-year lease on the new picture house which is being erected at the corner of Sprague and Lincoln streets in Spokane and will operate it as the Clemmer. This and the theaters operated in Seattle by a brother of the doctor will form the nucleus of the string. The Clem theater in Spokane, which was started by the pioneer and is now operated by his son, the doctor will continue, as it is thought despite the similarity of names there will be no confusion. The Clem has canceled the remaindef of "The Perils of Pauline" and will show films from the Progressive Company.

The lease on the Masonic Temple theater at Wallace, Idaho, has been purchased by Spencer & Bedard, proprietors of the Grand theater at that place. The new house, which is larger than the Grand, will be used for the exhibition of big moving picture features such as "Cabiria," "The Spoilers" and "The Sea-Wolf," the Grand having reached the overflow stage. Theatrical attractions also will be given booking through the Cort agency.

Frank Pike and Walter P. Elkins have purchased the Utopia theater at Bonners Ferry, Idaho, from R. R. Belcher, who has accepted a position as principal of the schools at Pack River.

WALTER PRUYN, of Paris, has purchased a moving picture show at Marshall. It will be operated by his son, Ferrell.

The Cozy theater at Belleville has been opened under the management of Mrs. Schiling.

The Apollo theatre at Peoria is encouraging its patrons to become interested in coming attractions and is building up a good mailing list. All who ask are sent the stories of the future films.

Manager Whiteleather of the Lyric theater at Monmouth was host to the carrier boys of the Atlas at the initial showing of "The Trey o' Hearts."

Saunders' new moving picture theater at Harvard is not going to show for a dime attractions which are worth more. The admission on Thursday nights when the big features are shown will be fifteen and ten cents.

"The International Bible Students' Association now has eighty sets of the moving pictures of 'Creation' on exhibition in the United States and Canada,' said E. H. Parker of Springfield to a correspondent of the Moving Picture World. Mr. Parker has been connected with the exhibition of the films in the Middle West. He also said that the association had leased the old Globe theater on South Wabash avenue in Chicago and rechristened it Ibsa Temple to be used as a permanent home for the exhibition of the photodrama.

A film of a police raid on the lottery dens in Chinatown in Los Angeles, Cal., which had a strong local interest was shown at the Varietie theater in Canton as well as at other theaters in Fulton county. C. E. Snively, Jr., formerly of Canton, private secretary to the chief of police, wanted a film of the raid. Chinatown has often been used as a setting for pictures so a camera was set up and Mrs. Snively and others well known in Canton went through a scene until the arrival of the policemen. In this manner the raid was not tipped off to the Celestials.

The United Films Company of Chicago has been incorporated with a capital stock of $100,000 to do a general motion picture business, manufacturing films and operating picture theaters. The incorporators are Roy Jonas, Nathan Rosenthal and J. Christiance.

Dark tan with gold trimmings is the color scheme for the new interior decorations at the Majestic theater in Rock Island, which was idle three weeks for alterations. Heavy velvet draperies harmonize. The lobby is in light blue and green.

The moving pictures of "Hiawatha" were a big attraction at Dellwood Park, near Joliet. The policy of showing free, high-class films of literary works and of educational value has made a successful season for this resort.

The Schiller Film Company of Chicago has been incorporated with a capital stock of $20,000 to do a general motion picture business. The incorporators are Fred Plotke, Morris J. Drezner and Charles Lorneman.

The redecorated Empress theater at Peoria has been reopened.

The Hippodrome at Jacksonville has installed a permanent stock company for the fall and winter season, but inasmuch as the house is to be run at the popular price of any seat for ten cents the photoplay will not be entirely discarded but will be used before the regular shows.

Moving pictures of "The Passion Play" were used at a lawn fete given by St. Joseph's Roman Catholic church at Ivesdale.

Manager Charles Lamb of the Palm theater at Rockford was anxious that each boy and girl in the city see Mary Pickford in "A Good Little Devil." Parents who could not spare the money necessary to satisfy the juvenile longings had only to write a note to Manager Lamb and the youngsters were admitted free from 1 to 3 p. m.

Gus T. Freeman of Urbana is reported to be contemplating opening another moving picture theater in the twin college cities. Rumored plans call for the remodeling of his building on West Main street, Urbana, into a modern photoplay house at a cost of $10,000.

Not only was the little bronze button of the old soldiers good for admission to "The Littlest Rebel," at the Apollo theater in Peoria, but Manager Dee Robinson sent cordial invitations to all the auxiliaries of the Grand Army of the Republic and patriotic societies to attend a special performance as his guests.

The Leading Features Film Company of Chicago has been incorporated with capital stock of $2,500 to manufacture and deal in motion picture films, etc. The incorporators are Clarence C. Green, William G. Banson and Robert N. Hepner.

The Cort theater at Monmouth is one of the few downstate houses which has seen the value of the Chicago Herald movies and is featuring this weekly. Nearly every issue contains pictures in Chicago settings that are familiar to the smaller city residents and for that reason are particularly interesting.

The photoplay has been lifted from the minor place it occupied as a chaser for the vaudeville show. In the announcement of the re-opening of the Empire theater at Rock Island it was with a "Moving Picture-vaudeville policy," just the reverse of the old custom. Four reels of pictures and acts of vaudeville will be used.

"This is the kind of program we like to advertise for Saturday. It includes two comedies—the kind that relieve the mind and make you feel refreshed," was a suggestive little announcement by the Fijou theater at Monmouth.

The Dove Amusement Company of Chicago has been incorporated with a capital stock of $2,500 to own, operate, etc., all kinds of dramatic and moving picture shows. The incorporators are Herman Frank, H. J. Lurie and Jacob Schwartz.

It is reported that a syndicate is being formed in Aurora to erect a new moving picture theater on North Broadway between New York and Spring streets.

The photoshow at the Murphy Opera House at Mount Sterling was closed for a week while the interior was being redecorated.

The Animated Ad Film Company of Chicago has been incorporated with a capital stock of $10,000 to do a general photography and moving picture business. The incorporators are D. and R. L. Powell and R. H. Le Vine.

A board of censorship consisting of the chief of police, the chief of detectives, two newspaper men and a doctor inspected "The Lure" and approved it for exhibition at the Princess theater in Joliet.

Booking a picture on the recommendation of some local man who had seen it elsewhere and so advertising it is often a good stunt. The Princess theater at Beardstown did this with the Essanay "Blood Will Tell." The Princess recently sent a man out with a camera and then invited the people to see how they looked hanging out the wash, taking care of the baby or in other every-day attitudes.

Removal of boxes to make room for seats, obliterating pillars and substituting a suspended ceiling and redecorating are improvements under way at the Star theater, Nelson Brothers, manager, Rockford.

The Eagle theater at Princeton gave a benefit matinee for a Sunday school class which wished to help redecorate a local Methodist Episcopal church.

Sixty-one merchants of Carmi have leased the Maine Theatorium from Manager Oliver Hurley for a series of Saturday afternoon shows which will be given free to any resident of White county, outside of Carmi. By making this restriction the attendance is limited to the class aimed at—the country folk whom the merchants want to trade in Carmi. Also there is no detraction from the regular patronage, the townspeople being cared for at the evening show. For this engagement of fifteen weeks Manager Hurley is featuring "Lucille Love."

The Zenith Motion Picture Company of Chicago has been at Freeport and Dixon with a view to making some industrial pictures for the Chamber of Commerce of those cities.

The Majestic theater at Kewanee was leased by the Lyman-Lay Company of that city for a free exhibition of the moving pictures of the style show at Chicago.

Fred P. Powelson of Galesburg will be the Tri-City manager for the Baker Dodge Amusement Company which has taken over the management of the Illinois theater at Rock Island, the Moline at Moline and the Burtis at Davenport, Iowa. He will have his headquarters in Davenport. The policy of high class pictures in connection with theatrical and musical comedy attractions, in vogue at the other houses of the Baker-Dodge Company will prevail.

The Lyric theater at East St. Louis is featuring the special musical programs prepared by J. M. Livaudais in connection with the regular releases.

Manager M. C. Stewart of the Lyric theater at Robinson will devote one night each week to features of the Famous Players Company.

Ed Fellis expects to open his new opera house at Hillsboro about the first of October. The new theater will seat 620. It is reported that overtures have been made to Fellis urging him to erect a new opera house at Witt but it is said that the project is not likely until business conditions improve.

Miss Jessie Bahr, who has been pianist at the opera house picture show at Chester, has resigned to accept a position as school teacher in Madison county.

"An hour before the time for opening the doors the crowd in front of the doors resembled a government land drawing," is the happy report concerning the opening of F. A. Barr's new Lyric theater in Knights of Pythias building at Lacon.

Thomas O'Dowd is preparing to open a moving picture theater in the Beemer building at Hillsboro which formerly was occupied by the Gem theater.

Surviving veterans of the Ninety-Ninth Illinois Volunteer Regiment repeatedly joined in singing old wartime songs and patriotic hymns while they watched "Shenandoah," which had been selected as a part of their reunion program by Manager Burr Swan of the Knights of Pythias Opera House at Pittsfield. The reunion was held in the afternoon in Swan's theater.

The Aurora theater at Aurora has installed a Choralchelo, an instrument with tones resembling those of a pipe organ. Kenneth B. Usher of the Choralchelo studios was the organist at this recital and also played the pictures at its dedication in the theater.

The Department of Agriculture has had cameramen at work in the canning industries at Hoopeston taking pictures to be used at the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco. Every operation in the sweet corn fields and in the big factories at Hoopeston was filmed.

Clark Wagner and Leonard Spangler will open a moving picture theater on Galena street in Freeport.

OHIO.

MAKING use of moving pictures to advertise a railroad is comparatively a new thing in this part of the country, but such a plan is now being used in Cleveland by the Lehigh Valley Railroad. The pictures show views of mountains, gorges and streams along the right of way. Other views show the volume of business at freight transfer stations and at the depots along the line.

A. Faranacia has a new theater well under way at 1202-2 Mayfield road. It is being built at a cost of $9,000.

The Reel Theater is one of the newest in Cleveland. It just opened in East 9th street, and is drawing favorable crowds. It is owned by the Hausheer Construction Co., of which George W. Hausheer is president and is under the management of M. B. Goren.

"Ten Nights in a Bar-room," a photoplay taken from the famous temperance story of T. S. Arthur, has been censored by the Ohio censorship board. Temperance leaders who had planned to use the film in their campaign for adoption of the proposed prohibition amendment to the constitution, charge that the board has destroyed the climax of the drama and the effect of its moral.

Exhibitors are to meet in conference with operators and musicians of Cleveland concerning the wage demands of the latter. A committee of exhibitors, headed by S. E. Morris, president of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League, Local No. 1, met a committee of the operators last week but the session failed to bring a settlement. The exhibitors maintain the demands are excessive and a conference to arbitrate was arranged.

Showers & Taylor have been awarded the contract to build a two-story brick and fireproof theater and lodge rooms for the Elks at a cost of $12,500, in Murray City.

The Cleveland Fireproof Construction Company, Cleveland, is building a one-story reinforced concrete fireproof addition to the Marvel Theater in West 25th street, at a cost of $14,000, in that city.

Architect E. J. Stewart has plans for a one-story brick and hollow tile theater for Paul Stuffer, to be built on Parsona avenue, Columbus, at a cost of $10,000.

Bids have been taken for the erection of a theater for John Gallagher, 28 Pearl street, to be built on Park place, Newark.

Joseph Babin and S. H. Stecker will build a theater at St. Clair avenue and East 134th street, Cleveland, at a cost of $15,000. Bids have just closed.

Architect W. B. Patton has preliminary plans for a two-story theater for Dan Hoffman to be built at a cost of $15,000 on Union street, Newark.

Architect Fred W. Hageloch has revised plans for a three-story brick theater to be built on South Main street, Akron, at a cost of $60,000, for the Akron Theater Company. RARIDAN.

LYNCHBURG, VA.

THE Trenton theater, of which Corbin Sheild is manager, ushered in the vaudeville season in this city on August 31, after having shown feature motion pictures exclusively during the heated term. The theater has a large seating capacity and during the week of August 24 was closed down while workmen made such repairs and improvements as were necessary in order to make way for vaudeville. Work on the property upon which a modernly appointed motion picture theater was to have been constructed by Hubert C. Elliott, a Roanoke capitalist, has been suspended following the completion of the excavation three weeks ago. An option has been given on the site, which is on Main street, and if it is exercised a store building will be erected instead of the theater.

In keeping with the improvement idea which is being carried out to a nicety by the managers of the various picture houses in Lynchburg, Manager Casey, of the Belvedere, is remodeling his theater in such a way as to attract attention even before the finishing touches have been applied. When everything has been completed the Belvedere will bear the appearance of a really high-class amusement house in which the program is confined to the movies.

Harry Bernstein, a well-known Richmond theatrical man, has been appointed by the Wells interests, which control the Academy of Music, to assume the management of the Lynchburg theater for the season which opens early in September. The academy was managed by Charles E. Kessnich for the past two years.

LUBIN.

RASTUS KNEW IT WASN'T (Sept. 15).—Rastus Remington, the porter at the police station, leaves his scrubbing pail in the road of the chief, who stumbles over it. Rastus' good judgment tells him to bike. He not only goes more quickly than the chief, but when the irate official throws the bucket after him, Rastus dodges and Luigi Ferranti gets it. That aroused Luigi's hot Sicilian blood, as Nita Nonenti, his sweetheart, was with him. When the cops beat him up, Nita turned him down cold, and Luigi swore to be revenged. Meantime Rastus goes to see some pictures, the star comedy being the rather familiar one of the alarm clock mistaken for a bomb. He thinks its a fine picture and saunters up to the station just after Luigi has planted a bomb. All the police are terrified, but Rastus just knows it is an alarm clock, and in compliance with a very general request, he takes it out in the back yard to open it, using an axe for a key. He goes almost high enough to pull down a cloud. When he lands he reports that it was a bomb.

SHE MADE HERSELF BEAUTIFUL (Sept. 15).—Mrs. Jones, though very homely, is a good cook and housekeeper. While she is serving breakfast to Mr. Jones he notices an advertisement of a beauty specialist and advises her to "make herself beautiful." He leaves without kissing her good-bye and Mrs. Jones is very much hurt. She resolves to take her husband at his word. She engages three beauty specialists and they rapidly transform Mrs. Jones into a showy, attractive woman. She buys an assortment of gowns, engages a maid and goes walking. She attracts the attention of several mashers, one more persistent than the rest follows her to her home. In the meantime Jones invites three friends to dinner. He arrives home at the usual hour and is mystified at his wife's appearance. His joy vanishes, however, when his wife informs him it would ruin her complexion to cook. In desperation he tries to cook dinner himself, of course making a mess of it. The invited guests arrive. The persistent masher forces his way into the house and makes violent love to Mrs. Jones. The masher is evicted, the guests depart and Jones munches a cracker disconsolately in the dining room, Mrs. Jones, seeing this, relents and resuming her plain attire prepares a dainty meal for the famished Jones. Jones tears up the Beauty Doctor's ad. and declares for the plain Mrs. Jones first, last and all the time.

THE TWIN BROTHERS VAN ZANDT (Sept. 16).—John Van Zandt is opposed to the marriage of his niece, Rose, to Ralph Gray, an artist. Rose marries in spite of his objections, and John makes a will leaving his property to his nephew, Charles, making the request that Charles provide for John's twin brother, Peter. John has become involved in an intrigue with Vera Verona, a dancer, and is unaware that a close friendship exists between Vera and Charles. The two plan to blackmail John by threatening to publish letters which the old man has written to the dancer, and Vera goes to John's house for that purpose. Just after Vera's arrival, the twin brother, Peter, calls to ask John's usual assistance and is told by Rebecca, John's housekeeper, that he must wait until John is disengaged. Rebecca then shows Peter into the reception room. Peter hears the raised voices of his brother and Vera, and opens the door just as John attacks Vera, Peter's weak heart gives way at the shock, and he falls to the floor. John, in his efforts to get the letters, chokes Vera into insensibility, and, thinking her dead, retreats in fear to the reception room. There he finds Peter dead.

Horror stricken he returns to the library, only to find that Rebecca, who has harbored an old grudge against him, has phoned to the police. She knows nothing of the death of Peter. In his extremity, John hastily changes clothes with the dead Peter. When the police arrive, they find the man they came to arrest apparently dead, and the bent form of the supposed Peter leaning over him. John, disguised as Peter, returns to the library, where he discovers that Vera has regained consciousness, he is forced by the circumstances to remain in the personality of his brother. He returns to Peter's lodgings, where he soon becomes destitute, since Charles, coming into the fortune, refuses to assist him. There he is found by Rose and Ralph, who insist that he live with them. Finally he conceives a plan. Secretly he writes a new will, revoking the former one, and then visits Charles with some of Ralph's pictures, ostensibly to sell them. While he is waiting for Charles he conceals the will in a book on the library table, he intentionally arouses Charles anger in his efforts to sell the pictures, with the result that the nephew, in hotheaded rage, destroys the paintings. John returns to the studio, calms Ralph and persuades him and Rose to visit Charles in company with the old family lawyer, in an effort to induce Charles to pay for the pictures. They arrive in the midst of a dinner at which Vera is present. Charles, enraged at the intrusion, comes into the library and vents his anger upon the supposed Peter. The old man, cringing in feigned fear, knocks the book from the table, and the will falls out. He picks it up and hands it to the lawyer, who declares that it makes Peter the owner of the property. Ralph, forseeing trouble, phones for the police. Rebecca, the housekeeper, accuses the supposed Peter of being the murderer of his brother. John throws off the disguise and declares himself to be John Van Zandt. Charles, finding himself tricked, attempts to shoot John, but is overpowered by the police. Charles and Vera are led away, and John turns in happiness to Rose and Ralph.

THE DOUBLE LIFE (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 17).—Cora Tracey, proprietor of a gambling resort in the city, has one touch of softness in her nature—her love for Alice, her young daughter, who she keeps in the country, in ignorance of her real life. Cora visits her secretly, and is bullied by her partner, Hollister, to tell where she goes. Alice meets David Richie, a country boy, and they become attached to each other. Hollister traces Cora and forces himself upon mother and daughter. Cora objects to Hollister's admiration for Alice. David arrives in the city to purchase his mother a present and is decoyed to Cora's. He is fleeced and ejected by Hollister and Cora. Hollister later motors out to see Alice and on the pretext of visiting her mother he takes her to the city. David sees the departure, recognizes Hollister and follows to protect Alice. Hollister takes the girl to a private room and telephones Cora, asking if he may marry Alice. Cora scornfully ridicules the idea, and Hollister, enraged, embraces Alice, who screams, and Hollister drags her to the telephone, forcing her head close to the transmitter. At the other end of the wire Cora hears her daughter's cries. Alice releases herself and hurls the telephone in Hollister's face. She implores him to take her to her mother. Hollister resolves to play his trump card. He hurries Alice to the gambling house. David attempts to bar their entrance. Hollister flings the boy aside and takes Alice in. Alice recognizes her mother as the proprietor. She rushes to her and they embrace. Cora is begging Alice not to cast her off when the policemen, informed by David, raid the place. Hollister switches off the lights and hurries Alice through an underground passage. Cora misses the two and fears the worst. She starts in pursuit, followed by Davis. Cora overtakes Hollister and attacks him. Hollister is choking her to death, heedless of Alice's screams, when the policemen and David tear Cora from him. Hollister is arrested, as is Cora. Alice flings herself into her mother's arms. Cora makes her supreme sacrifice. "I lied to you—there is no tie between us. At dawn David and Alice, back in the country, point to the rising sun as an omen of their future.

FOR REPAIRS (Sept. 18).—John Fields, his wife, and little daughter, constitute a happy family, until the husband and father falls into the habit of spending his spare hours at his clubs, often remaining away from dinner at home. At last Mrs. Fields decides to play the pleasure-seeking role herself. After a last vain protest to her husband she plunges into the social whirl, employing a nurse maid for the child. Returning one evening after a busy afternoon of calls and other feminine affairs, her husband takes her severely to task for neglecting him and the home. She retorts and a quarrel follows. Within a few days a breach has widened between them so that they plan to seek a divorce. Just before the culminating quarrel and the final decision to separate. Mrs. Field, expecting to remain at home, excuses the maid for the afternoon. Later, when she is about to accompany her husband to a lawyer's office the problem of what to do with the child arises. Expecting that their legal business can be transacted within an hour, the child being asleep, the husband suggests locking her in the bedroom. The wife, against her better judgment, agrees, and they leave the child alone in the house. While in the lawyer's office Mrs. Fields, idly scanning a newspaper, finds a notice inserted by the local gas company warning consumers that the gas in the public mains will be turned off between 4 and 4.15 o'clock for repairs. It lacks but ten minutes of the fatal hour and half of this time is wasted in indecision. Then begins a frantic chase for home to rescue the child, but delays occur and it is 4.30 before they reach the house. Meanwhile the gas has been turned off and the flame which Mrs. Fields left burning in her bedroom goes out. The cock remains open, ready, at 4.15 to pour out the deadly fumes into the room where the child is sleeping. As the frantic parents burst into the room they find the child unconscious and their worst fears are apparently realized, but the sound of their voices causes her to open her eyes. Then, with a sleepy smile she reaches her little arms up and places one around the neck of each parent. They, realizing the depth of their love for the child, are reconciled. How the child escaped death is explained in the final scene.

PINS ARE LUCKY (Sept. 19).—Everyone knows that it is lucky to find a pin and pick it up. Peter Pelton is a crank on this superstition and so is Cyrus Singleton, who's daughter, Ruth, is the object of Peter's affection. But in spite of Peter's luck in finding pins, it doesn't keep him from having a rival in John Cosens, a younger and more attractive man. John doesn't find pins, so, perhaps, that is the reason why Dad kicks him off the front steps, while he not only makes Peter welcome, but holds Ruth's dainty hand while Peter slips on the engagement ring. Peter has no sentiment and the fact that Ruth does not love him does not worry him. He keeps on finding pins. Meantime Dad plans to send Ruth out of town on a visit to keep her away from John, and to make certain that John is out of the way Peter is to go with her and turn her over to her Aunt. Ruth gets word to John and he is nonplussed for a minute, but the butler stoops to pick up a pin and this gives John an idea. He buys a paper of pins, strews them along the path from the house to the depot, steals Ruth from under the noses of Dad and Peter and hustles off to the station. Dad and Peter linger to pick up the pins and arrive at the station just in time to see the train disappearing in the distance.

THE GERMAN BAND (Sept. 19).—Professor Snitz has a beautiful daughter, Helma. Hans Dinkenspeil concludes that she would make a good wife for his son Carl, but Snitz objects. The spieler induces his son to elope with Helma. While the Professor is directing his "Little German Band," terrifying the neighbors for miles around, the elopement becomes a reality. Snitz and his band have been driven about until they finally land under the parson's window, just as the marriage ceremony is being performed. Snitz is informed that the marriage is taking place and he forces his way into the parsonage, but is eventually thrown out by the mighty spieler. Snitz and his little German band finally hie themselves to the pinnacle of Pikes Peak and blare out upon the evening air the Dutch lament.

THE MAN WHO KNEW (Sept. 14).—On visiting her sick mother, Gillian Iredell, companion to Mme. Perino, a singer, finds she is badly in need of money for medicine and nourishing food. She determines to sell her only valuable trinket, an intique brooch. At the jeweler's, she stands near a gentleman who is monopolizing the salesman's attention. The cuff of his fur overcoat accidentally brushes a valuable pendant from the counter and it falls on Gillian's muff. She picks it up, intending to return it. Apparently no one has seen her. The temptation is too great, and at the remembrance of her mother's need, she keeps the jewel. Turning to go ,she gazes straight into the accusing eyes of Ralph Lorimer, a wealthy young man, who saw her take the pendant. He says nothing and she returns home trembling with fear. Her remorse is keen and when she meets Lorimer—"the man who knows" at a reception that evening, almost faints. They are introduced, but he gives no sign of recognition, and proves to be a most kindly acquaintance. She begins to think he did not see her theft after all. In the morning Lorimer sees her selling something in an antique shop and is greatly relieved to find it was her brooch and not the pendant. He buys the brooch back and later learns that she has returned the pendant to its owner. Shortly thereafter, Lorimer meets Gillian in a heavy storm, accompanies her home in a taxi, and on the way, proposes marriage. She is about to accept, but the memory of her theft prompts her to first confess to Lorimer. He replies, "Dear, I knew it all the time. Let us forget the incident together." She gladly consents.

STEVE O'GRADY'S CHANCE (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 15).—Discharged from the staff of a city paper, Steve O'Grady, a reporter, goes South in discouragement at finding no work in New York. Alighting at a small town he discovers a bank robbery has occurred there the night before and a large reward is offered for the capture of the bandits. Steve joins in the hunt for the bandits who are hiding in the mountains. Their retreat discovered, the desperadoes escape to another place, leaving the stolen money in the guardianship of Bess, a beautiful mountain girl. O'Grady meets with an accident and is found unconscious by Bess, who takes him to her cabin and cares for him.

O'Grady's heart is touched by the friendless position of the girl, who has fallen in love with him, and he offers to take her away from the place. She then tells him of the money. They are about to depart when the leader of the bandits returns. O'Grady hides in a closet. The girl's quick wit enables her to capture the leader. The rest of his gang return and there is a spirited fight between O'Grady, Bess and the robbers. The bandits are defeated, Steve and Bess turn the leader over to the authorities with the stolen money, and receive the reward. He sends the "scoop" to his home paper and is offered reinstatement upon the editor's staff by return wire. With a delighted whoop, he clasps Bess in his arms, tells her of his love and asks her to become his wife, while the telegraph operator discreetly turns his back.

THE AGELESS SEX (Sept. 16.)—While reading the paper, John Weller is amazed at the number of "ads" setting forth the virtues of wigs, false teeth, form developers and other female beautifiers, turns to his wife and declares in disgust: "This magazine must have a big circulation among old ladies who want to look like Cinderellas." She merely laughs, and, soon afterwards, Weller falls asleep in his chair. He dreams that he finds an old man making love to his wife, angrily confronts the old fellow and is told, "Your wife was my sweetheart sixty years ago." John is stunned by the news, asks his wife if it is true and she admits she is "eighty-five years old." Deciding she must be one of those women who preserve their youthful appearance by artifice, he commands her to retire behind a screen and hand out all that is false about her. After receiving a wig, various "form plumpers," a full set of false teeth and pair of wooden legs, John angrily kicks over the screen and to his horror finds nothing left but a little heap of clothes. Sobbing the poor fellow calls up the undertaker who brings a tiny coffin and tenderly places the remains in it. Weller mournfully tells the undertaker "She was false to to me but I love her just the same." The gentleman in black nods gravely and goes out with the coffin. John wakes up weeping and finds his wife staring at him in astonishment. He is still bewildered and to make sure she is real makes her open her mouth, pulls her hair and looks into her eyes, then with a sigh of relief takes her in his arms and kisses her, convinced she is all there.

POLITICS AND THE PRESS (Sept. 17).—As the political boss of Griggsville, a small mining town, Elijah Mawson practically runs things his own way. The Press is the local newspaper and bitterly opposed to him. He has succeeded in scaring one editor out of town and when John Marsden, the new editor, arrives, Mawson tries to make friends with him. John has already meen informed of Mawson's unscrupulous character and refuses to have anything to do with him. Nettie, Elijah's niece, returning home one evening from a friend's house, is attacked by tramps. She is rescued by John, winning the girl's gratitude and later her love. Mawson then offers John a bribe to change the attitude of his paper to one of friendliness towards himself. The bribe is scornfully refused and Mawson goes out swearing vengeance. Through his paper, John continues his expose of the bribery and corruption practiced by Mawson and his gang. Mawson is furious and makes threats of personal violence against the editor unless he leaves that part of the country immediately. John pays no attention to the warnings. Nettie, realizing the serious danger, rides to the Sheriff for help. John is attacked in his office by Mawson and his gang, overpowered and only the arrival of the Sheriff and his men, led by Nettie, saves the editor from being lynched. After a sharp fight, the rascals are driven off and Mawson arrested. Nettie throws herself from her horse, unbinds John's arms and places them about her shoulders, while he holds her closely to his heart and kisses her.

FATHER'S TIMEPIECE (Sept. 18).—Through the carelessness of his office-boy, Stillwell, a typical old grouch, drops his watch and puts a dent in the case. He arrives home in a rage to find his daughter Marjorie talking to Reggie, her lover, whom Pa detests. Stillwell roars out, "I don't want to see you with that penniless cub again. Understand!" His daughter tearfully leaves the room, while Reggie also decides that it is no place for him. Later, at a street crossing, Stillwell is knocked down by an auto and helped to his feet by "Slippery Jim," a pickpocket, who, at the same time, relieves the old gentleman of his watch. Pete, a hobo, also runs to Stillwell's assistance, and is accused of taking the watch. He is arrested and locked up. Reggie, looking to secure a cheap watch, visits the pawnshop where "Slippery Jim" had sold the dented timepiece, and purchases it. At Stillwell's office later, the latter recognizes it and has Reggie arrested. The pawnbroker, at court, refuses to identify either Reggie or the watch and the poor fellow is locked up; Pete being discharged. Pete later sees "Slippery Jim" and recognizes him both as a crook and as the man who helped Stillwell to his feet. He follows him, sees the rascal get rid of some stolen goods and causes his arrest. The police recognize Jim as an old offender and in the presence of Stillwell, his daughter and Pete, Jim confesses. Reggie is released with apologies and angrily tells Stillwell, if it were not for Marjorie he would bring action against him for false arrest. To square himself, the old fellow consents to accept Reggie as his son-in-law.

THE REWARD OF THRIFT (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 19).—As a structural iron-worker, Ned Carney firmly believes in the theory of putting money by for a rainy day. His daughter, Fay, places her little savings in the miniature savings bank, the children have established in school. Among Ned's fellow-employees on the big skyscraper, are Bill Lafferty and Red Grogan, who spend a large portion of their wages in the corner saloon. While riding a girder to the seventeenth story, Ned slips, his foot catches in the chain, and he is hanging head-down when Bill, from the top story, sees his terrible predicament, slides down the cable and hauls him back onto the girder to safety. Both Ned and his wife, Nell, are very grateful to Bill, and Grogan induces Bill to tell her a hard-luck story and secure her assistance. After recovering from his experience, Ned invests his savings in a pretty little cottage. Ned is given a special job in one of the caissons and persuades two of the sand-hogs to start a bank account. During lunch-time at the saloon, Ned knocks Bill down, in reply to an insulting remark. That afternoon, Ned goes down into the caisson alone and Grogan prevails upon Bill to take revenge on Ned by shutting off the air-pressure, overcoming the man below and allowing the water to pour into the caisson. Ned has a very narrow escape from drowning, but is rescued in the nick of time by the sand-hogs. He refuses to "squeal" on Bill, who, in gratitude, promises to reform, swears off drinking and begins to save his money. Grogan, who will not listen, goes from bad to worse, is arrested for attempted forgery and imprisoned. Five years later, Ned and Bill, now partners and strong friends, have a prosperous business of their own, as a reward of their combined thrift.

GENERALS OF THE FUTURE (Sept. 14).—The light of recent events in Europe has thrown a reflection of considerable interest on this film which presents several views of the life at West Point, our great training school for army officers. If the United States were to be drawn into a great war, in which our land forces were engaged, into the care of just what sort of men would we be forced to entrust our military destinies?

Perhaps the most impressive portion of the film is that which deals with the annual graduation dress parade. The mathematical exactitude of every movement is indeed startling, and the sight of the long lines of tall young men sweeping onward as though carved from a solid block of vibrating energy is of the sort calculated to arouse the most turpid intellect with a thrill of patriotism. After scenes showing the review of the cadet battalion by the Hon. Lindley A. Garrison, Secretary of War, we turn our attention to some of the other activities of this extremely busy body of young men.

The cavalry drill will be appreciated by everyone who loves the sight of charging horses, and the artillery drill can be hardly less interesting. The last impresses us even more forcibly than the infantry drill, with the extraordinary precision with which the movements are carried out. But still more extraordinary are the calisthenics participated in by the entire body of cadets. The sight of this small army, assuming a multitude of complex and bizarre postures, in exact unison, all in obedience to crisp orders utterly incomprehensible to the uninitiated, is surely like no other spectacle under the broad and beautiful sky.

The reel closes with short views showing the cadets raising their camp of shelter tents, and crawling into them as the bugle sounds the beautiful strains of "Taps."

BUSTER BROWN ON THE CARE AND TREATMENT OF GOATS (Sept. 14).—There was no doubt about it that Buster started the day very badly. When he arrived at the breakfast table early, and discovered a piece of flypaper on the sidetable, he was unable to resist the temptation of putting it in his father's chair. Naturally enough, when Mr. Brown sat down, terrible consequences ensued, but the innocent sweetness on the faces of Buster and his sister seemed to show the utter foolishness of supposing that they had had anything to do with the matter. So Buster and Mary Jane were sent out to play, while Mr. and Mrs. Brown vainly attempted to obliterate the effects of the flypaper.

Buster's goat had long been a source of considerable irritation to that young man, on account of the animal's distinctly pugnacious habits. He decided that an understanding must be reached at the earliest possible moment. So he sent Dave, the gardener, into the stable to bring out the goat. A moment later Dave came out of the stable hastily, and alighted on his ear. The goat remained behind, baaing triumphantly.

Filled with resentment, Buster, supported by the faithful Tige, entered the stable with the full intention of showing the goat exactly who was running things around there. The goat was unimpressed. The same can hardly be said of Buster and Tige when they unceremoniously departed from the stable a few moments later.

At this point, Mary Jane remarked that she thought it was a shame to treat the poor dear goatie so roughly. And while Buster and Tige stared at her in bewildered awe, she entered the stable, untied the goat, sat on his back and commanded him to take her out for a ride.

When Mary Jane came forth riding in queenly state, Buster, Tige and the gardener nearly fainted. Buster, after some thought, decided that there must be one or two things about goats that he had yet to learn.

MAKING A CONVERT (Sept. 15).—Ruth, a heedless, impulsive and somewhat headstrong girl, is the heart's adored of Bill. Ruth's utter lack of regard for her safety when she is boarding or leaving cars, or crossing the street, is a source of considerable anxiety to Bill. Ruth, through sheer luck, escapes three accidents, which might have resulted from her carelessness. On each occasion, Bill points out the folly of her ways.

Ruth, who is one of the sort of people who hold as dogmatic the truth that a miss is as good as a mile, becomes heartily tired of Bill's chiding, and finally tells him that he is an old fuss budget, and that the man she marries must have something else to think about beside possible accidents.

A few weeks later, Ruth herself rescues a boy who has run back after a baseball almost under an approaching street car. In the motorman, who by his prompt application of the emergency brake has done his share in saving the boy's life, Ruth recognizes Bill. Because she is heartily repentant, Ruth begs him to forgive her, a proceeding which Bill seems little averse to undertaking.

A SUMMER RESORT IDYLL (Sept. 16).—When Arnold Sheridan and Jim Holmes, his friend, left the city, and started for a summer resort, Sheridan who was heartily sick of the notoriety his millions had brought him, suggested that they change places. Holmes, after some slight demur, consented, and accordingly when they arrived at the summer hotel, Holmes registered himself as Sheridan, while the young millionaire assumed the name of his friend.

It happened that men were very scarce at the hotel. As a result, the entire feminine contingent made a break for Sheridan and Holmes when they arrived, but when they learned that one of the young men was a millionaire, their interest in the real Sheridan quickly faded, and they devoted themselves entirely to Jim, the supposed Arnold Sheridan. That is to say, all of them but Jane Douglas. Jane had her own ideas about men. If she was sure about any one thing, it was that she did not intend to marry a man for his money. So she avoided the noisy group which buzzed about the supposed millionaire, and devoted herself to the poor friend because she liked him.

Mrs. Douglas was greatly vexed at her daughter's preference for the supposedly penniless Holmes, and told her sharply that she should not waste her time with penniless vagabonds when she had a chance to catch the most desirable young man of the year. But Jane did not heed her experienced advice. That afternoon Sheridan proposed and she accepted him. After she had promised to marry him, Sheridan told her who he really was. Jane was a little bit hurt at first, but she decided that the fact that the man she loved was a millionaire really didn't make any lasting difference. But her feelings were as nothing compared with her mother's, and her mother's were as absolutely nothing compared to those of the gay crowd who had lavished their attentions on Holmes, on learning that quiet little Jane had actually landed the man for whom they had all been casting their nets.

SHEEP'S CLOTHING (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 18).—From his earliest years, Thaddeus Craven had never allowed a consideration for any earthly thing to stand in his way. His heartless selfishness killed his wife, and after her death he shut his little daughter Lydia up in an English boarding school to be rid of her.

Years later, a curious spasm of the parental instinct drove him to visit the school for the sake of seeing his daughter. A few weeks after her father left, Lydia, wearied by the petty persecutions of the boarding school mistress, decided to follow him to America. So, without saying a word to anyone, she stole away and boarded a steamer at Southampton.

Craven was surprised to see his daughter, and by no means pleased. However, when an opportunity came to use her, he was by no means loath to take advantage of it. Knowing that she would be unsuspected, he gave her a box which he told her contained documents belonging to the government, and warned her to keep her possession of it a secret. The box actually contained a magnificent necklace which Craven had stolen from a wealthy woman aboard ship.

Craven's pals, suspecting him of an attempt to "double-cross" them, succeeded in getting the necklace away from the girl, but she regained it through the aid of the ship's detective, and brought it safely to New York. After they had arrived in America, Craven's gang, convinced of his duplicity with regard to the necklace, determined to revenge themselves upon him. Accordingly they sent him a knave of diamonds. Craven knowing that it was the first warning of death, shrieked and covered his eyes when he saw it. The next morning, he received the knave of clubs. Frantic with terror, he attempted to avert the gang's wrath by sending them the necklace. But Lydia, whom he again used as an unconscious accomplice, innocently disobeyed his directions, and when she came home with Peter Traft, a young man who had grown very fond of her, she found her father seated in the hall, the knave of spades clutched tight in his hand—dead.

JIM'S VINDICATION (Sept. 19).—When Jim Black was "sent up" for two years, he left his wife and mother in destitute circumstances. To support them both, Mary, his wife, was obliged to find employment. She at length obtained a position as nursery governess in the home of Frederick Van Alten.

Van Alten was a widower with one little girl. He admired Mary from the moment he first saw her. Mary did not tell him she was married, and as a consequence Van Alten began to consider the possibility of changing his lonely condition.

Then Jim was released, and came home. His greeting was no more cordial than he had feared, for Mary had suffered keenly, and the kindly attention of Van Alten had opened an entirely new vista on her prematurely saddened life. So poor Jim, broken-hearted at the change, went out and sadly walked the streets.

While he was walking, a man suddenly ran around the corner, thrust a wallet into Jim's hand's and disappeared down an alley. Jim, realizing the hopelessness of his situation if the wallet were found in his possession, hastily concealed it and fled. As soon as he dared, he looked in the wallet, and discovered that it belonged to Mr. Van Alten.

Jim, fired with the purpose of leading an honest life, instantly took the wallet to Mr. Van Alten. Van Alten looked through it and discovered that everything was intact with the exception of a valuable diamond he had intended to have made into a ring for Mary. Detaining Jim, he telephoned for detectives and then demanded the return of the diamond under penalty of instant arrest. Just at that moment, Jim discovered the picture of his wife on

Be Sure You Get What You Think You Are Paying For!

Don't let any salesman pull the wool over your eyes by trying to persuade you that he can give you any screen "just as good" as Radium Gold Fibre Screen. There is no such thing. There are lots of people trying to make one just as good, but up to the present they have not even gotten close to it. However, their attempts have cost money. They need more money to continue their experiments. Don't be the sucker who is going to fall for their smooth talk. Don't buy any screen you have not fully investigated. There are "niggers in the wood pile." There is only one place you can get an absolutely perfect screen. In fact, there is only one perfect screen. That one has proved itself to thousands of buyers. It is the YE VENGEFUL VAGABONDS (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 14).—In the historic days of early New England, a certain Puritan settlement not far from Boston was afflicted by the presence of two most undesirable inhabitants—Betsy Spratt, a scandalous village gossip, and Heinrich Von Winkle, a loafer and sot. Both were married, Betsy having a beautiful home and innocent daughter—Peggy—while Heinrich was the undeserving father of a sturdy, honest, young hunter, named Jan. The Puritan residents in the colony were unanimous in their disfavor toward the old gossip and the old inebriate, and it was but natural that their children should suffer the ignominy and embarrassment caused by them. Finally, one day, the Pilgrim Council issued an edict that old Betsy and old Heinrich should be punished by the ducking stool, and the two old vagabonds suffered the humiliation of being doused in the water of a running stream amid the acclaims of an appreciative audience, consisting of the entire village. Young Jan, concealed in the forest across the stream, witnessed the punishment of his father, while pretty Peggy, concealed behind a tree on the edge of the village, saw the public disgrace of her mother. The two brave young hearts hastened to the scene and rescued their vagabond parents after the law had taken its course, and took them home.

Old Betsy and old Heinrich concocted a plan of revenge. Their public disgrace had made life in the village endurable no longer. Old Heinrich was aware of the shortage of powder in the village fort, and planned with Betsy to destroy this powder and notify the Seneca Indians of the defenseless condition of the stockaded village. Their plan was to load themselves with the loot after the destruction and scalping of the Pilgrims and to make their way to Boston, where they could live in luxury.

Cunning old Heinrich secured admittance to the powder house and carried out his part of the plot by pouring water over the remaining keg of powder. He then signalled the Seneca Indians, and on a visit to their chieftain, acquainted the redskins with the conditions; whereupon, an immediate attack was decided on by the Senecas.

Jan and Peggy fell in love with each other and became sweethearts. Their misery in the Puritan village where their advent was always greeted with ignomity and jeers as the children of the two vagabonds, became unbearable, but in the sweet consolation of love they forgot the bitterness of unpopularity, while they behaved themselves in a manner that should have attracted the respect and admiration of their fellow villagers.

Jan, as a clever young hunter, had a warm friend in the young Mohawk chieftain, and they made expeditions into the forest for hunting and fishing. The Mohawks were at war with the Senecas. On the night of the projected attack, Jan was returning home from a hunting trip and witnessed the passage of a war party of Senecas through the forest. He learned of their intention to attack the village. Hastening to the Pilgrim settlement, he acquainted the heads of the village with the news, and after helping to prepare for the defense of the stockade, he started on a hurried trip to the Mohawk village with the intention of enlisting the friendly savages in the defense of the Pilgrims against the Senecas. The Senecas stormed the stockade, shooting down the men and women with bows and arrows. They scaled the stockade, but were kept off by the sturdy Puritans who made an active and effective defense until it was discovered that their supply of powder was exhausted, owing to the spoiled condition of the gunpowder in the last keg. The Senecas shot fire-arrows into the walls of the houses and fort, setting them ablaze, and creating a scene of carnage and bloodshed. Gray-haired men and women were shot down and brutally scalped by the savage redskins.

In the meantime, Jan made his way to the Mohawk village, told his story to his friend, the chief, and returned to the village at the head of a band of warriors. They arrived just in time to disperse the horde of marauders, and to save the remnant of the colony from complete destruction. Old Betsy and old Heinrich, the guilty conspirators, hid in the woods near the village while the massacre was going on and they chuckled with villainous glee at the thought of their awful revenge against the scornful townspeople. When the Senecas were finally driven from the stockade and dispersed in the woods, a party of the pursued savages discovered the two villainous old vagabonds hidden in the forest. Angry at their unsuccessful attack and embittered by the loss of many warriors, they seized the old couple and proceeded at once to slay and scalp them. Death was the reward of their treachery.

Jan and Peggy, who had done heroic service in the defense of the stockade, were accepted to full friendship by the open arms of the rescued Pilgrims, who forgot the villainy of their parents in the heroism of the young couple. Then came the wedding.

THE EUGENIC GIRL (Sept. 15).—Lola is a lovely girl who believes in eugenics. She has five suitors, all eligible, although she likes Billy, a newspaper reporter, the best. She is determined to marry the best man and arranges for an athletic contest at the country home of her aunt. She arranges a program of stunts in which her five suitors are to compete, which makes Billy disconsolate because he cannot box or swim, and has never been inclined toward athletics.

Billy reports a prize fight, and when Patsy McSweeny knocks out his opponent, an idea strikes him. He hires Patsy as a substitute in the athletic stunts arranged by Lola. Billy sends Lola a note asking permission to enter lists as an unknown, and Patsy appears in disguise. After winning every contest, Patsy invests Billy with his disguise, whereupon Billy appears to claim the hand of Lola, as the victor. The disguise fools Lola, who accepts Billy.

JIM (Sept. 16).—Jim Carson, a young farmer, loves the school teacher, Helen Dale, and they expect to be married. His father unexpectedly marries a widow who has a son, Arthur Vaughn, an actor. Arthur creates havoc with Helen's heart and the plans of Jim are disarranged. Arthur glowingly describes the glamour of the stage and Helen elopes with him. Jim gets a telegram informing him of the marriage.

Two years after Helen and Arthur return to the farm with an infant daughter, whom they leave in the care of Jim when they return to the stage. The baby grows into a beautiful and lovely girl and fills the place in Jim's heart left vacant when Helen eloped with Arthur. The years pass until the girl is eighteen. Jim believes her to love a farmer boy and is ready to give her up in order to insure her happiness; but she makes it plain to honest Jim that he is the only man she loves. Jim then telegraphs Arthur and Helen of his marriage to their daughter.

THE LONESOME TRAIL (Sept. 18).—Weary, riding quietly around the corner of the school house, discovers the school ma'am sitting on the steps fussing with an old revolver. Weary discovers that she is afraid and loans her his own revolver with which to protect herself from interlopers. He demonstrates its accuracy by shooting her pet gopher, whereupon she dismisses him in a rage. Weary gets "in bad" with the school ma'am and he is despondent. He buries the pet gopher with all honors and erects a head-stone with the following inscription: "Gone, but not Forgot." Weary meets the school ma'am on the road, but she pretends to scorn him while her heart is really aching for his companionship. They play at cross purposes and both become desperate. Weary arouses jealousy in the school ma'am's heart by taking another girl to a dance—but he wants to win the school ma'am and he arranges a series of incidents which arouse her interest until finally the misunderstandings are done away with, and they become engaged.

The antics of the good-natured cowboys provide this picture with exceptional comedy situations.

AT THE RISK OF HIS LIFE (Sept. 19).—Dick Mason is a counterfeiter. His confederates, one of whom is an elderly engraver, are working on a set of plates from which to produce counterfeit money. When the plate is half finished the old engraver dies of heart failure. Andrew Forbes, an expert engraver in a nearby city, lives with his mother and sister, Alice. Being out of work, he applies to the counterfeiters for a position. They engage him, but he refuses to become a criminal. They lock him up and starve him into apparent submission, so that he goes to work on the incompleted plate.

His mother and sister become alarmed at his absence and engage John Tait, a young detective, to find him. The counterfeiters, hotly pursued, try to blow up the cabin containing Forbes with dynamite which, however, is seized and thrown through the window by the detective. It blows up the bridge over which the counterfeiters are escaping. Tait wins Alice.

quietly to achieve that blissful state. How this innocent move of the young honeymooners was construed as sinister, and almost brought dishonor to the bride's father, is ingeniously shown in an absorbing and amusing manner.

THE NEW REPORTER (Sept. 10).—The newspaper owner is a candidate for mayor and defies the political boss who tries to bully him into giving up his fight for a clean city. When the editor of the paper finds himself short on reporters, his sweetheart, the daughter of the owner, volunteers to cover an assignment, which brings victory to her father and sweetheart, and confusion to the political boss.

GEORGE KLEINE.

THE VOICE OF INNOCENCE (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 1).—Beth Landis, a pretty eighteen-year-old girl, returns home at the end of a year in boarding school to find that her father, a well known novelist, is about to marry his stenographer. Although unfavorably impressed with the woman from the start, she makes no effort to persuade him not to fulfill his promise of marriage.

Beth is in love with her father's secretary, and her dislike of her stepmother increases when, a few months after the wedding, she discovers that the woman is practicing her arts of fascination upon the youth. In a fit of temper she accuses her rival and during the argument the father enters the room. In a mad attempt to stop the girl's tirade and so prevent her husband from learning the truth, Mrs. Landis seizes a revolver and fires. The bullet strikee Landis instead of his daughter, and he falls apparently lifeless at her feet. Beth swoons, and before she regains consciousness, the woman places the butt of the revolver in her nerveless hand.

The shot does not kill the novelist, but deprives him of the power of speech, so he is not able to report the actual truth of the affair, and Beth is sent to prison. The secretary, however, is suspicious. He summons a great specialist and without the knowledge of Mrs. Landis an operation is performed which restores the injured man. Then the truth comes out, the guilty one is punished and Beth is freed to become the wife of the secretary.

THE MASTER FORCE (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 22).—Dr. Raymond Ford, a young physician of unusual ability, is in love with Barbara Dare, the village school teacher. She is greatly interested in his attempts to discover an effective means of combating yellow fever, and spends many long evenings assisting him in his experiments. Largely through her help, he is at last successful, and his fame spreads. A great mining corporation offers him a splendid salary to visit its gold fields in Brazil and there wage a war of the extermination against the plague. Barbara insists that he accept the offer, and he finally leaves for South America. She remains behind.

In the new world Ford soon becomes recognized as a leader in his profession. He saves the life of one of the wealthiest mine-owners of the gold country and thus becomes acquainted with the magnate's daughter. Forgetful of his promised bride at home, he wins her love and their engagement is announced. Reading in the South American newspaper of the announced engagement, Barbara is heartbroken. Suddenly, however, she decides to cross the seas and win back her errant lover. After an adventurous voyage and a long trip on horseback through the jungles and across the plains, she reaches the gold country. Coming to Ford's cabin during his absence she sees a portrait of her rival, and in a fit of jealous rage hurls it to the floor and throws a lighted lamp after it. The house is soon in flames.

The light of the burning cabin attracts Ford and the magnate's daughter, who are riding in the moonlight among the mining camps. They hurry to the scene, Ford arriving just in time to save Barbara from death in the flames. When the two women are brought face to face, the young doctor discovers that the old love is the master force, and soon afterward he and Barbara are aboard a liner bound for home.

ESSANAY.

WHEN KNIGHTS WERE BOLD (Sept. 7). The Earl is disgusted when his parents insist that he marry the girl of their choice, not his own. He has been reading a book called "When Knights Were Bold," and only wishes that he might have lived in "Ye Olden Times," when he could fight for his "Lady Love." He falls asleep and dreams that his wish has come true. Then follows many humorous scenes. All the situations of the olden times being played with up-to-date equipment. He awakes to find the girl who his parents have chosen for him at his side, and decides that in the present day a suitor has an easier time than in the days gone by.

BILL'S BOY (Sept. 8).—Williams, a convict suffering from aneurism of the heart, is released from prison. Dr. Manley, a criminologist, gives him a position. The ex-convict tells his employer of Bill Lynch, who one time sacrificed his life to save him. That night Williams hears a noise downstairs and, upon descending, finds Bill Lynch's son ransacking the house. He captures him, but lets him go when he promises to live straight. Dr. Manley has heard the commotion and when he comes upon the scene, Williams collapses. Bill's boy is captured outside, and when he is brought in, the dying ex-convict whispers to Manley, "It's Bill's boy, give him a chance." The boy is released but Williams fails to recover and dies happy with the thought that his pal's son is to start life anew.

THE FABLE OF THE HONEYMOON THAT TRIED TO COME BACK (Sept. 9).—Once there was a married couple. They were just as peaceful as a couple of Wild Cats. One morning Hubby found a book on his desk, "How to Make Your Home Happy," was the title. He gave it the "once over" and decided to follow the book's teachings. He started in by purchasing clothes, hats, candy and flowers for Wifey, but she didn't "get him," she thought he was trying to "square himself," that he loved another woman. The next day she "beat it" for home and mother, but Hubby was a "Fox" and followed her. Then came the 'Fracas" and Hubby found that he made more progress by "bawling her out" than he ever could by "pulling the soft stuff."

SNAKEVILLE'S MOST POPULAR LADY (Sept. 10).—A popularity contest is to be held at the Snakeville church bazaar, and when Slim induces Sophie to accompany him, Mustang swears revenge. That night Mustang appears escorting Senorita Pepper, a Spanish beauty, and when the voting takes place, Slim and Mustang go broke buying votes for their respective partners. Just when Sophie is about to snatch the victory from Senorita Pepper, the rich man of the town appears and buys enough votes for his sweetheart to win the contest. Sophie and Senorita then leave the place arm in arm, blaming Slim and Mustang for their defeat.

BRONCHO BILLY, A FRIEND IN NEED (Sept. 12).—The doctor, who owns the only store in town, is called away, and leaves his daughter in charge. A bandit has been menacing the vicinity and a reward is offered for his capture. There is quite a sum of money in the store, and when Broncho Billy, a stranger, knocks at the door, the girl thinks he must be the outlaw and forces him into a room at the point of a gun, locking the door on him. Shortly after, the real bandits break in and when they demand to know the hiding place of the money, the girl ushers them into the room occupied by Broncho Billy. Broncho Billy sees the situation and detains the outlaws until the sheriff arrives. The girl then begs forgiveness for her mistake and all ends happily.

THE DEVIL'S SIGNATURE (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 11).—Ethel Vandiver and her friend, Marie Le Farve, arrive at the former's country home. Ethel's father objects to her seeing Douglas, whom he thinks is a sweetheart. But, unknown to her parent, Ethel has married Douglas a year before. The day on which she arrives she receives a letter from her husband stating that he would rather see her dead than be separated from her any longer. A few hours later Marie is found dead in Ethel's room. William Sanford, a newspaper reporter, starts to work on the case and the only trace he can obtain of the crime is the imprint of a cloven hoof on the carpet. Detective Huff then arrives and find's Douglas' letter, which convinces him that he is on the trail of the guilty person. Sanford and Douglas are friends and the reporter determines to prove his friend's innocence. That night Sanford goes to the room. He is horror-stricken to see a hand emerge from the door of the clothes closet. He summons Huff, and when the hand again appears, he fires four shots at it. They are unable to locate where the bullets struck and the detective gives up in despair. Sanford discovers a push button that opens a door which leads to a dungeon. In this dungeon he finds Craven, a mulatto gardner, who has been killed by the bullets. The murderer has been discovered; they find that his left foot is a cloven hoof, "the devil's signature." Ethel's father then congratulates Douglas, forgives him and allows him to come and claim his bride.

THE JOBLOT RECRUITS (Sept. 14).—The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company has advertised for recruits for the slap-stick comedy police department, and to qualify for the job, the applicants are required to go through many funny antics, such as falling downstairs, jumping out of windows and being peppered with eggs and pies. One recruit who refuses to be hit with eggs is told he cannot be used, and to avenge himself, floors the director with a huge mallet.

THE WAY OF HIS FATHER (Sept. 15).—The old physician sends his son to college with the idea that when he returns he can take up his established practice. After the young man receives his diploma, he decides to go out West rather than settle down in a small town. His father is broken-hearted, and the disappointment preys on his mind until he becomes ill. The young man then decides to stay home and follow the way of his father, and it is his tender nursing and loving attention that brings about his parent's recovery.

THE FABLE OF LUTIE, THE FALSE ALARM (Sept. 16).—Lutie was a swell-looking "Dame," but she thought she could Sing, and her friends jollied her along until she was about to send Melba back to Australia and Schumann-Heink into ten-cent vaudeville. Her mother thought she was a coming Star and said something ought to be done with her Voice. Several neighbors recommended Choking her. But first of all, Lutie must give a concert, so they hit the "old man" for three hundred and fifty "bucks" to cover Expenses. Her debut was a huge Success until she read the morning papers, but when she did, she was sick in bed for three months. When she recovered the Music was entirely out of her System. Moral. When in Doubt, try out on the Critics.

SOPHIE'S LEGACY (Sept. 17).—Sophie receives a letter telling her that she has fallen heir to her uncle's vast estate. Slippery Slim and Mustang Pete hear of her good fortune. Then comes the struggle to see who will marry her. Mustang is making great progress, but not without Slim taking notice. One day as Mustang is telling Sophie of his love for her, a beautiful blonde enters and exclaims, "My Darling Husband." Sophie is broken-hearted until Slim arrives and comforts her, but Mustang sends an old Indian squaw to claim Slim as her husband. His plan fails and Slim marries Sophie right before his eyes.

BRONCHO BILLY BUTTS IN (Sept. 19).—The hotel proprietor is a grouchy piece of humanity, and when his daughter receives attentions from young men he becomes very irate. To cap the climax, his daughter falls in love and becomes engaged to a fine-looking young chap. When the father discovers this, he rushes out and shoots his daughter's sweetheart. The wounded man is carried into the hotel and when his fiancee attempts to dress the wound, she is stopped by her father. Broncho Billy, who happens to be a guest at the hotel, hears the disturbance, and while a friend is rushing for the doctor, he holds the angered parent at bay at the point of a gun. The father then is forced to consent to his daughter's engagement.

SPARKS OF FATE (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 18).—Wilbur Hayes and Frank Graham, two wireless operators, are in love with Ruth Donald. Ruth does not know which one she really loves best, so the two rivals agree to play a game of cards, and the loser is to leave town. The game is played in the wireless station in the presence of the old captain of the "Melba." Wilbur cheats and wins, but his dishonest method of winning does not go unseen by the captain. Frank, living up to his agreement, leaves town the next day on the S. S. "Melba." That night an explosion in the boiler room sets the ship on fire, and to add to the horror a storm comes up. The ship's wireless operator is injured, so Frank takes the key and flashes a signal for help. Wilbur gets the message but refuses to spread the alarm, knowing that his rival is on board. Just before the "Melba" sinks, the captain tells Frank that he was cheated by Wilbur. Frank manages to escape from the sinking ship, and several hours later is picked up by an aviator in a hydro-aeroplane. He is taken to a hospital and is confined to his bed for a long period. Meanwhile, Ruth, thinking that Frank will not return decides t moarry Wilbur. The day before the wdding a notice is printed in the newspaper stating that they will be married the next day at 5 p. m. Frank happens to read this. He again asks the assistance of the aviator who happens to became one of his best friends. Then comes the race to reach Ruth's home before 5 p. m. After a speedy and exciting flight, he arrives just as they are about to be married. He tells Ruth of his rival's cowardly deeds and her love for Wilbur turns cold. Frank then comes into the love that rightly belonged to him long before and Wilbur leaves the town in disgrace.

KALEM.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SLEEPING DEATH (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 14).—Lizzie, known as "the best little safe-cracker in town," burglarizes the home of Harrison, a young millionaire. Harrison discovers the girl at work, but generously allows her to escape. An hour later, Lizzie is found unconscious on the street. Harrison's butler finds him in the same condition. Millionaire and thief are rushed to the hospital. All efforts to revive the two go for naught; as a last resort the surgeons send for Amar, an Oriental Mystic and hypnotist. The man hears Harrison and Lizzie utter some words in their trance. He recognizes the language as that of his own race. It causes Amar to relate an ancient legend of India to the physicians.

Thousands of years previous, Afgah and his beautiful daughter Lola, dwelt in India. Gunga, a man of wealth, sought to marry Lola, but she was secretly in love with Dano, a fair-skinned slave. Kahdin, a wicked High Priest, also loved Lola, but the girl spurned his advances. The High Priest thereupon swore to be revenged. Lola's love for Dano was discovered. The slave was severely punished, while the girl was informed she must wed Gunga immediately.

Lola and Dano fled, however, but were pursued and captured. In accordance with the ancient law, they were brought before the High Priest. By opportunity for revenge at hand Kahdin cursed them with the curse of the "Sleeping Death. Among the lovers to fall into a death like trance. Once in every century however, the peril of each was to leave the sleeping body, and meeting, recognize the other. Harrison and Lizzie revive as Amar finishes his tale. The two gaze at each other. Slowly Lizzie come to Harrison's arms, faltering, "It seems as though I have known you always—for years and years."

INTO THE DEPTHS (Sept. 15). Neglected by her husband, Beth Stanford becomes interested in Arthur, his friend. Although their friendship is an innocent one, Stanford becomes intensely jealous. Arthur presents Beth with a diamond brooch upon her birthday. Later, when Stanford faces ruin, he compels Beth to pawn her jewels. The money thus secured proves insufficient for his needs. The man drinks heavily in his desperation and falls into a drunken stupor.

When Stanford returns home, he meets Arthur. The husband cedes Beth to Arthur for a sum sufficient to settle his obligations. Then comes the realization of his baseness. It prompts Stanford to commit suicide. Stanford awakens from his drunken sleep with a start, discovering that the terrible events have occurred only in a dream. It is the lesson he needs, however, and although ruined he returns home. Together Stanford and Beth face a future of renewed endeavor and happiness.

THE MOONSHINERS (Special - Two Parts—Sept. 16).—While hunting for moonshiners, Revenue Officer Bart falls in love with Kate, daughter of Old John, head of the Wetlock clan. The girl is also loved by Two Snakes, an Indian, who is a member of her mother's tribe. A fight between Joe Wetlock and Bud, of the Brady clan, starts the old feud anew. Bart discovers Old John's still, but when the man saves his life, finds himself drawn into the feud as a Wetlock henchman. Old John seeks the aid of his wife's people, but due to Two Snakes' influence, this is refused.

The Wetlock and Brady factions meet on the mountain side and a deadly battle takes place. Joe and Bud meet in the former's cabin and a fight to death ensues. The battle on the hillside rages until all but Kate and Bart are killed. Comforting the heart-broken girl, Bart takes her back to civilization, where he makes her his wife.

A JOKE ON THE JOKER (Sept. 15).—Vivian visits her aunt and uncle in the country and promptly falls in love with Willie Holder. Then Willie steers his bicycle into uncle. Biff! that settles Willie's chances. Uncle is picked up by Schultz and Francois, who meet Vivian and fall in love with her. Vivian makes the whole party believe that there is rat poison in the soup. Some doings when the doctor comes and uses a stomach pump on aunt, uncle, Schultz and Francois, but the joke is on Vivian when they apply the stomach pump to her. Schultz and Francois quarrel over Vivian, who incites them to a duel. Here follows a screamingly funny duel between the two fat rivals. In the end Willie puts it over "both of them."

NESTOR.

THE DANGER LINE (Sept. 16).—Marie, the daughter of a middle class farmer, is enchanted by the social doings of the great world as depicted in the local papers, and determines to run away from home.

On arrival in the city, the ever-watchful white slavers mark her for their own. While standing in rapt wonder and admiration viewing the gorgeous display in a show window the country girl is accosted by a fashionably dressed madame, who induces the girl to go home with her to be dressed in what she considers a becoming manner.

Marie is then taken to the reception room and is hilariously greeted by the abandon habitues. She then realizes in what kind of a place she is and makes her escape. She meets the derelict of the city. A poor drifting, yet manly fellow whose downward career has been checked by the missionary society. She tells him her story. He takes her to the mission where he was saved, and a position is found for her in the home of a wealthy banker. This banker paying a debt of gratitude he owes the derelict, makes him his secretary. The story ends with the happy meeting of the two waifs at the banker's house.

A TROUBLESOME WINK (Sept. 18).—Eddie and his wife are a very devoted couple. However Eddie's wife is afflicted with a nervous disease of the eyes which causes her to wink at most inopportune times. Ed is worried and calls in an expert oculist who says that it is nothing serious, but, that she must have a complete rest at the seashore. Ed, who is very busy, cannot go with her, therefore he sends her off alone. On entering the car, she winks by mistake and a man taking this as a signal follows her.

She arrives at the Beach Hotel where a friend of her husband's sees her, and thinking she is flirting with him, gets interested and follows her to the beach. Arriving there, he sees she does the same thing to other men. Disgusted, he 'phones for hubby, telling him to come at once, that his wife is flirting outrageously with strange men. Ed, in a fit of jealousy, gets a gun and starts for the beach.

His wife, meanwhile, has unconsciously attracted all kinds of men who are following her around. Lee, the friend who telephoned, meets him and tells him to watch. Ed watches and when he sees that she is followed by all the men, starts after them and shoots. Lee cannot prevail upon him to stop, so goes to his wife and tells her the cause of all the trouble. She explains her affliction and Lee and Vic then go in search of Ed. They see him chasing the mashers into the water. She rushes up and explains to Ed who apologizes. They make up as the men who are in the water sneak away.

VICTOR.

A KENTUCKY GENTLEMAN (Two Parts—Sept. 14).—Jack Randolph, a typical Southern professional gambler, who makes his living by honest gambling among the aristocracy of the sunny South, is in love with the daughter of Col. Een Hastings, who has a proclivity for gambling, but is nevertheless opposed to a professional gambler for a son-in-law. He has forbidden his daughter, Nell, to have anything to do with Jack, although he himself meets the young gambler at their nightly rendezvous. Nothing daunted by the Colonel's decree, the young lovers have many secret meetings. A serpentine character by the name of Ezra Hoover, who preyed on those which devastation and want had placed in his power, has acquired much land and many houses which he rents to the so-called white trash. His miserly disposition and picayune ways are closely shown when he forces a poor couple who are in the throes of starvation to leave their home. Jed Miles and his ill wife have been living in one of Hoover's houses and on account of their inability to pay the rent they are ejected. Jack happens to be passing and sees the poverty and sorrow and comes to Jed's aid by giving him the necessary funds to pay his rent and telling Jed to call on him if he needs more. Jed's wife, however, succumbs to her ailment, owing to the unnecessary exposure and Jed, who is madly in love with her, is driven insane. In his madness he goes gunning for Hoover who at this time is engaged in a card game at the tavern with the colonel and Jack.

The colonel accuses Hoover of being crooked and Hoover starts to draw, but the colonel beats him to it. Jack grabs the colonel's arm, but the gun explodes the same instant that Jed pulls the trigger of his gun from the outside. Jack, thinking that the colonel has killed Hoover, takes the smoking pistol from his hand and forces the colonel to escape from the window. Jack is placed under arrest and circumstantial evidence convicts him. He is condemned to death and the colonel, frantic, does not know what to do.

The day of the execution is at hand when Jed, who has been wandering, comes across a paper, in which he reads that Jack will hang for the crime which he himself committed. The gallows tree is tested and the dawn as it breaks, sees Jack awaiting his fate. But again the Goddess of Chance intervenes and Jed, breaking into the courtyard, surmounts the scaffold and confesses to the crime, for which Jack is wrongly accused. The incident releases Jack.

THE GIRL AND THE SMUGGLER (Sept. 18).—Charles Hutchins, the Assistant Lightkeeper at Haddock's Point, is in secret league with a band of smugglers who are operating by sea. He is in love with the daughter of the lightkeeper, Irene, and in order to avoid suspicion holds his communications with the band by signalling underneath the regular light by lantern. He meets the gang by descending from the tower by a rope and returns to duty the same way. Complaints being made to the Revenue Chief of the District, a guard is sent to the scene to make an investigation. He sees Irene, is smitten with her, and is invited by Ganon to live with them. He accepts and in courting Irene arouses Charles' hatred.

They finally come to blows and, out of animosity for Charles, Walter watches him. That night he sees a light at sea and looking toward the light tower sees a signal from the window. He keeps watch outside, and sees Charles going over the brink of the cliff. Hurrying after him he is led to the old wreck on the shore in which the smugglers store the contraband goods and as he approaches they seize him and tie him to an old timber.

Charles' hatred on account of Irene decides to make away with him and saturates the wreck with gasoline. Irene looking about the house sees that the light has suddenly failed. She arouses her father and as he runs up to fix the light she looks about for Charles. She sees the light from the burning wreck and rushes toward it. She cuts his bonds, gets him on deck, Charles, seeing her rush in, follows and meets them on the deck where he and Walter have a terrific fight. Walter carries Irene to safety but Charles is killed by the explosion.

FATHER'S BRIDE (Sept. 2).—Hubby has married against father's wishes, and hence the household is thrown into consternation when a telegram arrives stating that father will arrive that evening. Hubby fears he will lose the money his father has promised him if it becomes known that he has a wife. He and wife's brother, who lives across the hall, concoct a plot.

It is decided that wife shall temporarily remove to brother's quarters. Then brother is to get Hubby out with him, leaving father in the apartment alone. Wife is to rush into her own apartment yelling "Burglar" and get father to enter her brother's apartment. Brother is to come in, posing as the irate parent of his sister and demand that, owing to the disgrace of his child, father must marry her. Hubby will then appear, and acting the hero, will offer to marry the girl himself.

All would have been well but for a tipsy bachelor, who, by mistake, gets into the newlyweds' apartment. Nothing daunted, they try again. This time the plan works, and father is on the point of being fully deceived, when in pops the tipsy bachelor to get his coat and cane, which he has left behind in his hurried departure. He gives the scheme away. But father is forgiving and all ends well.

LOVE AND GRAFT (Sept. 19).—Bob and Mandy are in love. Mandy's father, Shultz, is a gruff old chief of police. When the young couple ask for his consent to their marriage, the chief becomes enraged and refuses. The pair of them are then thrown rudely into separate cells of the jail and locked up by the infuriated father.

Fate, however, intervenes and shows the sweethearts a way to penetrate the walls and join each other. They cut a hole through the floor of their cell, which looks directly down upon the chief's desk. Fate still favors them.

The police have been warned of terrorizing threats made by blackhanders. Word comes to Shultz to watch out for them. This news makes him nervous. From their vantage point, Bob and Mandy become aware of this, and decide to take advantage of their knowledge.

Their subsequent actions demoralize the police force. The lovers escape. The chief is left alone to combat with unseen terrors. His position is awful. Then, too late, he discovers the hoax played by the young people. To uncompromise himself he is obliged to give his consent to their marriage.

BISON.

THE HIGHER LAW (Two Parts—Sept. 19).—The youthful monarch, Edward IV. of England, is treacherously advised by Sir Stephen Fitz Allen, who is the King's boon companion, in favor of turning down the offer of Louis XI. to cease the controversy that has been pending so long. The King, Edward IV., follows the advice of his companion and the French messenger meets with an insult, returning to the French court in a quandary. The old roue, remembering through a vision his scene with Villon in the dungeon, sends for the Poet Laureate to solve the riddle. Villon suggests that it might not be a bad idea to remove Sir Stephen, thereby causing the weakling, Edward IV., to fall into his hands. Louis XI. considers the advice good and orders Villon to proceed to England and to move against Sir Stephen.

Sir Haco Hubba, long tired of the strife and bloodshed, has shut himself up in Castle Lyme, where he dwells in peace with an only daughter, the Lady Eleyne. Villon learns of Sir Haco, begs an interview, and is invited to call at Lyme Castle. Villon accepts. Here he impresses upon the mind of Sir Haco the fact that it is better that one perish, than that the lives of countless thousands be sacrificed. Sir Haco agrees, but can see no way whereby the wily Sir Stephen can be induced to enter a trap. The Lady Eleyne enters and Villon informs Sir Haco that his beautiful daughter is the bait whereby to catch the fish. Eleyne's scruples are overcome and she agrees to go to court and there ensnare Sir Stephen. The action follows and Sir Stephen, now madly in love with Eleyne, follows her to Castle Lyme. Villon is on the watch, and catching Sir Stephen prowling about the castle halls, summons Sir Haco's men-at-arms, who quickly dispatch Sir Stephen, whereupon Villon returns to Louis' court and acquaints his master with the success of the expedition.

POWERS.

A MODERN MELNOTTE (Two Parts—Sept 18).—John Brice, a young sport and millionaire, aspires for the hand of Betty and is so confident of winning her that he makes a wager at his club that he will gain her favor within a week.

Betty Van Allen looks upon Brice unfavorably, and to his mortification rejects him. He cannot understand this attitude on her part, so in order to seek revenge, determines on a plot to humiliate Betty.

He has in his employ an English groom of good appearance and education whom he determines to have pose as an English Lord, and inveigles the groom into a plot whereby he will receive a certain sum of money for taking the part of an impostor. Accordingly he supplies the groom with the necessary clothes and funds and introduces him to the Van Allens at a cotillion given by Betty in honor of her father's home-coming. The groom is duly introduced as Lord Carrington, and Betty, impressed by his charming manner and pleasing personality, succumbs to his proposal and they become engaged. John Brice in the meantime is pleased with his accomplishments and insists that his groom marry Betty. The wedding takes place and after they have lived together a short while the denouement comes and Brice tells Betty that she has married his former groom. She, frantic and terrorized, leaves her husband immediately. He has learned to love her, however, and goes away to forget.

In the interim John Brice has been working a scheme in stock manipulation whereby he has succeeded in embarrassing Betty's father to the extent that he is nearly bankrupt. Brice makes Van Allen an offer of money in return for certain plans which the Major has.

Meanwhile the groom has become interested in oil in a Western city and has made good. Betty is entirely ignorant of her father's shortcomings and has also started divorce proceedings against her husband. Business calls the groom East and prior to his again seeing Betty, he receives a letter from England, his home, which contains good news. He goes to visit his wife and finds her in the library with Brice and her father. Brice has determined upon a plan whereby he will release Betty's father if she consents to marry him after her divorce, and the former groom overhears this conversation. He rushes in and consernation reigns. The father explains the circumstances to the groom, and Betty, upon seeing her husband, again realizes that she truly loves him. She confesses that she does not want to part from him whether he is a groom or no groom. He thereupon takes her into his confidence and shows her the letter he has received from home which discloses his true identity, namely, that he is the son of the Duke of Arylsford, who has been disinherited because of disobedience in his early youth. The letter, however, states that his father on his death-bed leaves his estate and fortune to his son. The groom enables his father-in-law to make reparation to Brice and places his fortune in his father-in-law's hands.

ECLAIR.

ADVENTURES IN DIPLOMACY (Three Parts—Sept. 16).—Two foreign spies are commissioned by their government to secure at all costs a secret treaty which is in the possession of the Ambassador of Venezuela. The treaty involves the affairs of Venezuela and Mexico. Rosa Morini and her brother, the Prince, leave their native land equipped to secure the papers in question. A complicated plot is laid out by the two and arrangements are made by the spies whereby if their escape is cut off, the Embassy is to be blown up. This is to be done by means of a secret mechanical contrivance concealed in their rooms and operated by a confrere of theirs, who is an expert in analytical chemistry. The government secret service bureau becomes aware of the spies' presence by the receipt of a cipher message from Barcelona, giving a description of the plotters, and the case is turned over to Grimm, the head detective of the organization.

Rosa and her brother, through Count de Rosini, are invited to the Embassy Ball. During the supper Rosa feigns a swoon and as the Mexican Ambassador carries her into another room, her brother attacks him. The Prince fails to find the paper but discovers the combination to the safe, and they both escape. The next night Rosa, disguised as a boy, enters the Ambassador's house and, evading the guard, goes to the safe. To allay suspicion, she throws bags of money out of the window to show robbery as the motive. Impatient at the long wait, the Prince, who is at the window, goes away and leaves her to her fate. She is trapped in the room and deserted by her brother. She breaks down and confesses all to Grimm, who has been summoned.

Meanwhile the Prince changes places with the Ambassador's chauffeur and drives the officials to the den. At pistol point he tries to force the secret from him. Rosa returns, and to allay her brother's suspicions shows him money. While they are talking the detective enters and seizes the Prince. Wild with disappointment he attempts to kill his sister. The chemist, pressing a button, explodes a bomb, which renders the Prince unconscious. He is led to a cell while the girl is taken under the wing of Grimm and her foot placed in the path which leads to good and love.

SON (Sept. 20).—Harry Horton, a pampered son of a prosperous broker, is prone to indulge in gambling and allows a weak character to sway him. His fond father watches his son's character with sorrow more than anger in his heart. Harry mixes with a crowd of gamblers and loses money. At last in a big game he loses every cent, and upon drawing a check is advised by the bank that there are no funds. His situation is desperate.

Meanwhile John Marten, a hard working bank clerk, is forced out of employment by his firm's failure. He is evicted from his room, and he wanders to a park opposite the home of Edna Horton's friend. The crowd of mischievous girls in Edna's home decided to fool him with an empty wallet. While he is asleep they place a pocket-book beside him. Upon awakening he goes through the wallet and finding Mr. Horton's card therein decides to return it. While waiting in the parlor of the Horton home he sees Harry sneak in and attempt to open the safe He springs upon him and when Mr. Horton appears, Harry accuses Marten of being a thief. Suspicious of his son's integrity, the father apparently leads Marten to the police station, but the next morning upon entering the office the son is confronted with the supposed thief. The ruse works and upon bended knees Harry Horton begs his father's forgiveness for his weak character and deceit. His gambling mania cured he settles down in earnest to gaining his father's respect while Marten is engaged as a trusted clerk.

FRONTIER.

A ROSE OF YESTERDAY (Sept. 20).—It was an accidental shot from his rifle that brought the easterner and Dolly together. The stray bullet cut a rose from the bush that the little girl was caring for. Soon there was another rose in bloom to take its place, and by that time Dolly and Fred were more than friends.

Joe, a rejected suitor, attempts to force his attentions on Dolly. She succeeds in getting his gun and orders him from the cabin. Fred hears her screams and hastens back. Outside the cabin he meets Joe; knocking him down, then dashes in. Dolly, thinking the intruder is Joe, fires.

Later, after the doctor has arrived and pronounced Fred dead, Dolly, heartbroken with grief, goes to the rose bush, where she recalls the happy moments spent with Fred. Then, seeing the revolver still in her hand, allows it to raise slowly to her temple, but a vision of her aged and lonely father stays her hand, and for his sake she decides to live, though she may never forget her "Rose of Yesterday."

THE SCARECROW AND THE CHAPERONE (Sept. 15).—Miss Charity Prim, principal of a select school for young ladies, decides to take five of her pupils on a vacation. She writes a letter notifying the local hotel keeper that she will arrive by auto. She arrives with her charges and is met at the hotel by a deluge of cowboys, whom she chases away. Miss Prim sees Hiram, the proprietor, and her maidenly heart flutters. The next day the girls are invited to attend a dance and, fearful of their chaperone, they attire themselves in the chaps and clothes of the cowboys.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

That evening Hiram invites Miss Prim to attend the same dance. She accepts and on the way to the festivities, sees what she supposes to be a bunch of cowboys, and most fearful that they will disclose the fact of her going to the dance to the girls, she starts back to the hotel. The girls seeing her and fearful that they will be disclosed in their disguise, also hie themselves back to the hotel. Louise, whose boots are too large, cannot run fast and comes face to face with the chaperone. She assumes the attitude of a scarecrow, and the chaperone and Hiram seeing the scarecrow, suddenly have an idea. The chaperone will disguise herself as the scarecrow and thus get back to the hotel. As they are about to remove the coat from the supposed scarecrow, it suddenly becomes animated and dashes away through the field.

Meanwhile the girls at the hotel are giving an impromptu party to the cowboys. Louise arrives breathless from her run and joins the party. The chaperone arrives and hearing the confusion enters the girls' room and orders the cowboys to leave at once. Louise, donning the garb of the scarecrow, gains the old lady's consent to continue the party. Shoving her into a seat, she gives her part of the feed. She gets Hiram and leads him into the room and sits him beside the blushing chaperone.

THE MISTRESS OF DEADWOOD BASIN (Sept. 17).—The Deadwood Basin lumber camp is presided over by a foreman who does not think it necessary to observe the rules laid down by the owner when they militate to his disadvantage. He accordingly encourages drinking and gambling among the men in his employ to his own profit.

Opposition to his system appears in the person of Miss Eveline Danvers, only heir to the estate of her father, which includes the Deadwood Basin lumber claim. She proceeds to institute a strict observance of the rules laid down by her father and meets with strong opposition from the dissolute foreman, whom she fears to discharge on account of his apparent influence with the men.

Her cause is championed by Sanderson, a giant lumberman, who has never been in sympathy with the crooked foreman, and after many exciting situations. Miss Danvers finally succeeds in dislodging the foreman and finds her employees, to a man, gladly accept the new regime to the chagrin of the deposed despot.

A PRINCE OF BAVARIA (Two Parts—Sept. 19).—The Prince John of Bavaria, leaves his native land for America, accompanied by his valet. Just a short distance beyond Sandy Hook where the American papers are taken aboard, the Prince learns that Mrs. Asterholt has designs upon him for her daughter Gay. In the spirit of fun, the Prince decides to fool the Dowager and changes clothes and position with his protesting valet. The substitution is not discovered by Mrs. Asterholt as she has never met her distinguished guest and her uncle, the Minister to Bavaria, arranged for his visit to this country.

Mrs. Carson is the wife of the president of a great railway. His daughter Caroline Carson, is a spirited, true-blooded American, but her mother, who is socially ambitious, has already made up her mind that Caroline shall marry the Prince at all hazards. The father, Peter Carson, is a stoical, staid type of man who believes that a woman should choose her own mate, and is naturally not in harmony with his wife. Mrs. Carson succeeds in obtaining an invitation to the grand ball given by Mrs. Asterholt where the bogus Prince is presented and she immediately makes advances in behalf of her daughter. The valet, who is the real Prince, sees Caroline at the ball and when the bogus Prince receives an invitation to visit the Carsons, his master forces him to accept it. They arrive at the Carson home where the valet is received with great pomp and gusto, whereas his valet, who is the true Prince, wanders to the seashore for recreation. While there he saves Caroline's life, but her gratitude is cut short by the mother, to whom a valet appears as merely a piece of useful furniture. The father, however, is gracious toward the valet and thanks him for his heroism. A great fuss is made over the pretender by everyone excepting Caroline, who has fallen in love with the supposed valet. Finally at Prince John's command, the pretender is forced to propose to the girl as a final test. She flatly refuses him, much to his great relief. He goes off leaving the weeping Caroline in John's arms.

A cablegram arrives at Mrs. Asterholt's for the Prince. She, in order to successfully combat Mrs. Carson, determines to deliver it in person. The valet pretender takes one look at the telegram and drops his pose. Leaving the astounded ladies, he runs to the garden, where he bows before his Lordship and presents him with the telegram, which is a message that Prince John is to return to Bavaria as war is eminent. Naturally, the real Prince is forced to announce himself and Carson smilingly shows his guests a postcard which shows the real Prince in uniform with titles and position inscribed beneath. Mrs. Asterholt collapses; Mrs. Carson is triumphant, and the Prince takes the girl in his arms who is brave enough to love where her heart led her.

THE MAN WHO WAS MISUNDERSTOOD (Two Parts—Sept. 17).—The man who was misunderstood (King Baggot) is an old fiddler who is accompanied by his dog, Roger. His poverty-stricken condition is pitiable to behold, but his constant companion and friend adheres to him through all his trials and tribulations. He exists by playing his fiddle on the street corners, accompanied by his dog Roger, who acts as his companion and protector. He is seen first in his dingy room repairing the old violin, while Roger, seated on a chair beside him, looks intelligently on. He holds conversation with Roger and with almost human intelligence, Roger does all but answer him.

One morning he is seen playing in front of a mansion and a little girl is attracted by the antics of Roger. She calls her aged mother and asks that the old man be permitted to enter. He comes within accompanied by his faithful friend and after receiving food, they ask him to tell a story. The old man begins and the scene flashes back to his boyhood days when he was in love with Betty Austin, the daughter of Col. Austin, who owned a string of race horses. The Colonel is deeply enmeshed in financial difficulties and his only salvation is that one of his horses win the Derby. Betty is naturally in love with King and the Colonel also favors his suit, but King's friend, Chester Smythe, proves to be unfaithful and plots King's downfall. He inveigles King into a plot unknown to the latter and shows him that the Colonel's horse cannot win the Derby. King places his fortune on an opposing horse, much to the Colonel's disgust and Chester shows the Colonel a note in which King has stated to him that the Colonel's horse cannot win. This note is forgery, but it opens a petty breach between King and his loved one. A dastardly plot is consummated and Smythe, on the day of the Derby, succeeds in capturing the Colonel's favorite jockey on whom the Colonel has staked his all. The jockey is kidnapped and while he lies bound in the hut to which he is taken, the accomplice mentions King's name as the wrongdoer, and the jockey naturally suspects that he is the mastermind in the plot to ruin his master.

Circumstantial evidence, accompanied by Chester's crafty insinuations, lead the Colonel to believe that King has abducted the jockey and during the excitement the Colonel's daughter volunteers to ride the favorite. The race starts and King's sweetheart succeeds in capturing the event. King, although he has lost his fortune, is elated, but when he enters the paddock to compliment and praise his bride-to-be, he is repulsed and forced to leave by the enraged father. He writes a note of explanation to his sweetheart, which is intercepted by Chester, who forges another note in which King is supposed to state that he is guilty of the nefarious crime of which he is accused. Naturally, with the evidence pointing in his direction, King loses the hand of his loved one and he starts on a declining path.

Poverty-stricken and broken in spirits, he gradually declines and his old age finds him alone in the world without funds or friends. He, however, saves the life of a puppy from a mob that is pursuing him and the puppy becomes his constant friend and companion. At a time, however, when the dog is full grown the wolf of famine is at the door and King is forced to sell his companion. The dog, however, secures his liberty by untying the rope which fastens him to the stable door and makes his escape, coming back to King at the opportune moment when the shadows of death are hovering over all. On one of his expeditions, King and his dog meet Chester, his enemy, on a wharf and during the encounter that takes place, King hurls his enemy from the heights to a watery grave. King is arrested for killing him, but the plea of self-defense saves the old man and he is exonerated.

The last we see of the old man who was misunderstood is his form, accompanied by his faithful friend and companion, silhouetted against the skies.

THE TREY O' HEARTS—THE SUNSET TIDE (Fifth Episode—Two Parts—Sept. 1).—Alan, Rose and Barcus ride through the fog. Aboard the steamer Judith determines to go after Alan. When she suggests going out in the fog to the captain he scoffs at her. She arranges with her men and they procure a small boat. As they are launching it, Judith stands, giving the final orders. The sailors on the steamship rush up to stop her. She jumps overboard (her men in the meantime having made away with the boat) and her men later pick her up in the small boat. They row on in the fog. At last they strike a reef and their boat is damaged. They are stranded and await help.

In the meantime the river thieves' boat escapes (after a short fight) from the revenue cutter and is putting back to the island. Rose, Alan and Barcus pass near the reef, and Judith spies them. She calls for help. Barcus and Rose suspect treachery, but Alan insists on going to the rescue. When Barcus refuses to turn the boat's course, Alan jumps out and swims to the reef. When he discovers Judith he attempts to get away, but her men overpower him and he is made their prisoner. Rose and Barcus attempt to come to his rescue, but they are outnumbered, and Judith's men (who have procured ammunition from the steamship) start to open fire. They depart in search of help. They eventually land on a small rocky island (the home of a band of robbers and river thieves) and Rose is left in one of the caves, while Barcus goes inland in search of help.

Meanwhile Judith spies the river thieves' ship and signals them. They come in the dory and rescue Judith, Alan and her men. Judith talks with the captain, giving him much money to become one of her aides. They are landed on the river thieves' island also. Barcus finds a small fishing village and enters the saloon, where numbers are gathered. He starts to drink, asking questions, etc., and one of them suspects he is a revenue officer in disguise. They jump upon Barcus, and he is thrown, bruised and bleeding, out among some barrels and boxes. Judith, Alan, the captain of the band and men land and come up through the village. Barcus recovers, sees them and gets word to Alan that Rose is down on the beach. Judith does not see him. Alan is taken to a little hut, the window overlooking the steep cliff beside the ocean. He is bound there, and Judith taunts him. She first offers him a rose—and then the trey o' hearts, which she throws in his face. She leaves him and goes down into the street. Barcus attempts to escape, but Judith sees him. She orders three men to follow him—they do so—Barcus not knowing of their presence. Judith writes a telegram to her father which the captain says will be sent from the mainland.

Barcus returns to Rose and tells her of Alan's presence on the island. Judith's men spring upon Rose and Barcus and after a struggle capture them and bind them to the rocks. Judith returns to Alan and tells him that she knows that Rose is on the island and is going to dispose of her for all time. Judith leaves to go down to see Rose, and Alan, after freeing himself of the ropes on his feet, jumps from the window into the sea, thirty feet below, with his hands bound. He lands among the rocks—stunned from the fall.

Judith goes down to see Barcus and taunts him. Rose turns on her and in fury Judith orders the men to bind Rose and Barcus out on the rocks, telling them the tide will be in with the hour and they will be left to drown. She starts back to the village with the men and finds Alan half unconscious. She orders the men to bring Alan with her. Judith's men meanwhile, get into a fight with some of the river thieves and there is a free-for-all fight in the saloon. Judith, Alan and men return in the midst of it. Alan fights to defend himself and gets away, only one man pursuing him. They have a struggle and both fall over a cliff, Alan getting away. He rushes along the beach and discovers Rose and Barcus almost drowned. He frees them and they find their life boat and get out into it. Judith discovers Alan's escape and leaves with her men in search of him. The revenue cutter, which has been lying in wait outside the island, opens fire on Alan's party, believing them to be the river thieves.

Barcus explains to the officers and they are let go.

THE TREY O' HEARTS — STALEMATE (Seventh Episode—Two Parts—Sept. 15).—The action starts on the night of the day on which the "Crack o' Doom" ends. In the dark Judith and Marrophat smuggle Rose into Trine's house in New York from their car. Leaving Rose with Marrophat, Judith reports to her father, who sends for Rose. Although worried over Alan, Rose is defiant towards her father. At a taunt from Judith, however, Rose is accused of loving Alan. Trine orders Judith from the room and questions Rose. When he tells her that Alan has been assassinated, she tries to disbelieve but finally breaks down and is led, a weeping prisoner, to her room a hundred feet above the street.

Marrophat tries to make love to Judith. She ignores him and he secretly vows vengeance. Marrophat tells Trine how Judith prevented Alan's death at the bridge. Judith accused Marrophat of lying because she refused his advances. Trine received an unsigned note reading: "Digby has reserved suite at Monolith Hotel to be held for Arthur Lawrence." Judith departs in anger and Marrophat tells of Judith's love for Alan. Tipping the head bellboy at the Monolith, Marrophat gives him a trey of hearts, indicating a practical joke. As they talk, Alan enters and registers as Arthur Lawrence. After he has entered the elevator, Marrophat leaves hurriedly for an East Side dive, where he pays Red November to assassinate Alan.

From his room Alan phones Digby. Unseen, the bellboy slips the trey of hearts into the stationery and leaves. While Trine is apparently sleeping, Judith creeps into the room and

When We Were Young

Something entirely out-of-the-ordinary in Western pictures—memories of two aged sweethearts who met and loved and dared death together in the days when painted redskins spread desolation over the plains. The picture shows the memories, and does it in the wonderfully realistic fashion that is characteristic of the famous 101 Ranch pictures. The rides and the fights—the savagery of the Indians and heroism of the plainsmen all are so close to the real thing that you hold your breath during many a thrilling moment.

The Arrow's Tongue

Another absolutely unique story of the old West. Picture this: A dying half-breed boy with an arrow in his breast dashing across the plains on a white horse. He rushes past a wagon train—the plains-men heed the arrow's warning and prepare to fight. He darts by a squad of troopers—they gallop madly in the direction whence he came. Everywhere the dying half-breed boy and the white horse and the bloody arrow spread the message of coming redskin hordes. And in the scenes that ensue you can almost hear the warwhoops.

reads the note, but as she leaves the room, Trine rouses and traps Judith, proving her disloyalty.

Alan slips out a side door unobserved, he thinks. Marrophat sees him and orders Red November to follow his taxi in another. Alan changes taxis several times, but fails to lose November. Believing himself safe Alan arrives at Trine's house. By bribing a night watchman, he climbs to the girder of an unfinished apartment house across the street and using a flash-lamp and the Morse code communicates with Rose. Judith from her window reads the message, telling Rose to be ready to leave the house by six the next morning. Alan turns and finds November edging along the girder, a knife between his teeth. After a desperate fight, Alan gains mastery, but as Red is slipping over the edge of the girder, Alan grasps him and pulls him back onto the girder, where he collapses, sick with fright. After signaling Rose "good night" Alan climbs to the street.

Judith plans to outwit Rose and Alan, and enters Rose's room where she empties vial of poison into a glass and at the point of a gun forces Rose to submit a deal of the cards to decide which shall drink it. Judith draws the trey of hearts and loses. Rose faints as Judith starts to drink. Judith, however, throws the glass aside and dresses in Rose's clothes. Meantime Alan enters the building opposite, bribes the ironworkers and they prepare a steam crane for his use. With one foot in the iron hook, he is swung to Rose's window, where he takes Judith from the window, thinking it is Rose, and they are lowered to the street.

At this moment, Marrophat, seeing Alan being lowered to Rose's room, rushes through the halls and bursts into the room, but is too late. He mistakes Rose for Judith, until, as she comes from her faint, her words show him his error. When he learns that Judith is going to marry Alan instead of Rose, he rushes out in time to see the machine disappearing. Calling a taxi, he starts madly in pursuit.

THE TREY O' HEARTS (Crack of Doom—Sixth Episode—Two Parts—Sept. 8).—The power-life-boat containing Alan, Rose and Barcus is running along under the lee of the mainland. They are looking for some place to land. Alan sights and calls attention to a bright white light on a point some distance ahead. A moment later the engine stops. Investigating the cause of the trouble, Barcus finds the gasoline tank is empty. They carry Rose ashore, leaving Barcus on guard. Alan runs up the beach, and beyond the point of the lighthouse finds a small fishing village with a railroad station. The agent and the telegraph operator are about to shut up for the night. There is one other man in the station—the smuggler-messenger who has brought ashore Judith's telegram to her father. He recognizes Alan, but keeps out of sight. Alan asks for trains and is informed none leave till morning. Alan takes off his money-belt, extracts a sizable wad, and tips the agent. Judith's messenger sees this. Alan sends a telegram to Digby asking him to arrange for a special train to await him at Providence and a motor car on the waterfront at New Bedford. Then, learning that there is a hotel in the village, he secures a flask of brandy and returns to Rose and Barcus, dogged by Judith's messenger.

Alan, with Barcus assisting, gets Rose to the hotel. He then goes out to charter a fast motorboat. The proprietor of the hotel introduces him to a rough-and-ready ruffian who has such a boat. While they are talking outside the hotel, Alan sees a rocket go up from the highest point of land in the vicinity, asks the meaning of it, can get no explanation, and suspects that it is a signal to Judith and her gang with their allies. Judith on the schooner spies a rocket going up on the mainland. The smuggler captain agrees with her interpretation of the signal and crowds on sail.

Alan, in alarm, calls Barcus and tells him his suspicions. They arouse Rose and start off for the motorboat.

Meantime Judith's messenger has conferred with the owner of the motorboat and told him of Alan's money. They agree to rob him, the smuggler passing as the crew of the boat owner. The owner points a pistol at Alan's head and demands his money. Alan knocks the pistol out of his hand and, after a short struggle, throws him overboard. Barcus, meantime, performs like service for Judith's messenger. They shape their course for New Bedford.

Shortly after Judith learns what has happened. She delays only long enough to bribe the telegraph operator into re-opening his office, and send another message to her father, asking him to have a motorcar in New York. Trine summons Marrophat and orders him to go to Judith's aid. Sometime out of the harbor, Barcus complains of the engine—it would seem that they have picked a poor boat. Alan catches sight of the white sails of the smuggler's schooner. The night-long chase is on.

Barely the winner, the power-boat makes a public wharf in New Bedford in the grey of the morning. Alan sends Barcus with Rose to look for the motorcar and remains behind to cover their retreat. He finds a club at the end of the wharf. The smuggler's schooner ranges alongside. Singlehanded Alan proceeds to repel boarders. The smugglers, exasperated, open fire.

Meanwhile Barcus and Rose have found the motorcar. Arriving he runs to Alan's assistance. Alan grapples with Judith. Her pistol goes off. He notices that at the last instant her hand swerved from the direct aim; the bullet flies over his head. He disarms her, taunting her with the fact that she hasn't the nerve to shoot him. He throws her pistol back on the deck of the schooner, and it explodes in one of the broken powder kegs. A terrible explosion results. Judith falls stunned to the wharf. Barcus grabs Alan and hurries him to the motorcar. On the way they are halted by a policeman who grabs Barcus. The latter goes to the mat with the cop, shouting to Alan to go on. Alan feels that this is the only course left to him.

Two minutes later Marrophat drives up in a high-powered touring car, something heavier and faster than Alan's. He arrives just in time to rescue Judith. She directs him in pursuit of the fugitives.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (No. 34—Sept. 7).—Margaret's grief on the loss of Dunbar's friendship is somewhat assuaged in the purchase of new hats and frocks, particularly because Our Mutual Girl is to visit Gloucester and Newport and other famous and fashionable early fall resorts.

As Margaret motored up Fifth avenue she ordered her chauffeur to stop at her florist. "Back in a minute," Margaret told him, and she was back in a minute, but to find the interior of her car very much changed.

Over on the seat was a cooing, gurgling baby.

"You perfect Angel!" Margaret said. "Where did you drop from?" But the baby merely gurgled. "Baby 'lly."

"Oh, you are Baby Lily, are you?" Margaret asked, "and where did you come from?"

At this moment a well-groomed man came up to Margaret and told her that he saw a woman put the baby in the car. He offered to take the child to the police. The chauffeur also suggested that the baby should go to the police, but Margaret would have none of it, and determined, then and there that, if Lily's mother did not appear, she herself would adopt the child.

But Margaret had counted without Mrs. Knickerbocker. Her aunt was horrified at the idea of this strange baby being brought into the house and told Margaret she would have to get rid of it imediately. Margaret, however, determined that her old negro Mammy Sally should take temporary charge of the child.

The next day Margaret started for Gloucester where she is to visit the John Hays Hammonds.

HOW THE KID WENT OVER THE RANGE (Two Parts—Sept. 19).—Kid Carter is made foreman of the Cross Bar Ranch and hurries to inform his sweetheart, Nell, of his promotion. She promises to marry him, and on his way back to the ranch the Kid meets Walton, a gambler, who has been run out of the adjoining town for cheating. Unaware of the man's identity, the Kid enters a poker game with him, while he has the monthly pay-roll for the ranch in his pocket. Catching Walton cheating, the Kid kills him and flees, pursued by Harris, the sheriff. The Kid loses his gun and stops at Nell's home to obtain another, and the girl, learning of his crime, returns the engagement ring. After a fight with the sheriff in which both are wounded, Nell's heart misgives her and she follows the Kid's trail in an endeavor to aid him. The girl has an exciting adventure with Bell, an outlaw, from whom she is rescued by the Kid. In the end, however, the Kid is shot by the sheriff.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (No. 33—August 31).—When Dunbar leaves his apartments the morning after he has visited his criminal brother's rooms, he is trailed by the ever-suspicious Kid Joseph and the detectives Mrs. Knickerbocker has employed. They follow Dunbar through the mazes of crowded New York streets until, as he enters a cafe, they slow up lest he behold them.

But, whether by instinct or because he has caught a glimpse of the shadowers and knows he is being followed, Dunbar does not remain in the cafe. Quickly as he enters it he leaves by another door and, in a swift jump over a fence, is out of sight. The three wait for a time for him to emerge and when he fails to do so one glance into the cafe tells them that Dunbar again has eluded them.

Dunbar, free of his pursuers, makes his way hurriedly to his brother's rooms. He knocks again and again, and finally elicits a surly answer. "Let me in or I'll break down the door," Dunbar tells his brother. "Get out of here or I'll shoot through the door," is his brother's reply. Instantly Dunbar's weight goes against the door and as it bends his brother fires. Dunbar's answer is to get a fire axe and smash his way in. His brother fires twice, point-blank, but misses. Then, as Dunbar peers through the breach he has made, he sees his brother dive frenziedly for a book-case. Before he can reach it Dunbar enters the room. His brother recoils in cowardice before Dunbar's determined advance and Dunbar, going quickly through the books in the rack, finds the one that hides the cameos.

By that peculiar instinct of dogs, Anni feels that her master is in danger. Lying at Margaret's feet the clever animal's ears jerk nervously, then her fur rises, and finally she paces the room. Of a sudden she leaves and, going from window to window of the downstairs' portion of the house, finally makes her exit, opening a huge gate all by herself. Then at headlong pace she runs to her master's rooms. While she is so engaged the detective see her, recognize her, and follow her to her master's quarters.

And at the very instant that Dunbar stands in the littered rooms with the cameos in his hands, the detectives and Kid Joseph enter. "Caught with the goods," the Kid gleefully cries. But just then, as the detectives are about to arrest Dunbar, a shot is heard in the next room. They make their way there, to find that Dunbar's brother has shot himself. And then the understand.

Dunbar silently makes his way to Margaret and gives her the stolen gems. Then, with a feeling that—though it is for the last time—his brother has disgraced him beyond immediate relief, Dunbar arranges with a great Metropolitan daily to go to Europe to "cover" the war. These arrangements made, he asks Margaret whether she will see him off on the "St. Paul" the next morning. And as Dunbar sails down the Hudson to what strange adventures may befall him, Our Mutual Girl stands disconsolately on the pier.

THE HIGH GRADER (Sept. 16).—While out hunting Wheeler and his daughter rescue a prospector, Tom Andrews, from a ledge where he has fallen. They take the wounded man home and nurse him back to health. Wheeler, needing a partner, offers him an interest in his project and soon after they strike a rich vein. Wheeler is caught by a cave-in and mortally wounded. He confides his daughter to the care of his partner, Andrews, before he dies.

Angry because she will not marry him, Andrews undertakes to freeze Leota out from the mine by making returns showing that the property no longer pays. By chance Leota is rescued from drowning by a young down-at-heels mining engineer named Dick Raleigh. She con-

ALONE in NEW YORK

Never has any fiction writer written a story quite so absorbing, thrilling and appealing as this great 5-part true-to-life picture. Finely staged and splendidly acted, "Alone In New York" is truly a wonderful spectacle. And it points a big moral lesson that is appreciated by every audience. sides in him. He has found work at the mine and knows from the character of the ore that Andrews is putting up a job on her. In order to prove this, he becomes a highgrader (steals highgrade ore from the mine), intending to have it assayed when he gets a sackful.

A mine detective suspects Raleigh of highgrading and shadows him. Raleigh sees that he is concerned. With the help of an Oriental laundryman whem he has befriended Raleigh gets the ore from his room wrapped up as laundry, and then screws his empty trunk to the floor so that Andrew's spy may think it is still heavy with highgrade ore.

Having safely disposed of the ore, Raleigh returns to his room and is arrested, but an examination shows that the trunk contains no ore. The assayer finds the samples submitted to him run high, whereupon Leota, as a majority stockholder, fires Andrews and makes Raleigh superintendent. To revenge himself Andrews hires two thugs to beat up Raleigh, but they make a mistake and do him up instead. Raleigh and Leota find that to each other they must look for their happiness and the play ends with a love scene.

A TALE OF THE NORTHWEST MOUNTED (Two Parts—Sept. 16).—Sergeant Barr, in charge of the Northwest Mounted Police Station, determines to find out if possible where the Indians are obtaining whiskey and where they are disposing of their furs. Louvois and his daughter, Joan, run a trading store where Jacques and Baptiste dispose of their furs. Joan is half in love with Jacques, but is puzzled at his frequent trips from the settlement. Billy Gates, a mounted police officer, on the trails of the offenders, makes arrangements to board with Louvois, and Joan immediately transfers her affections to him.

Jacques is suspicious of Gates and places a demijohn of whiskey in Billy's bedroom which is later found, and Billy is accused of selling whiskey to the Indians and is returned to Smoky River for trial. He is dishonorably discharged from the service, but determines to run down the real culprits. He sees Jacques and Baptiste packing their canoe with whiskey and furs and captures both Baptiste and Jacques. Jacques escapes from the cell, but is later captured and badly wounded, confesses to the frameup against Gates, who is later reinstated in his old position on the Northwest Mounted Police.

THE SILVER CANDLESTICKS (Two Parts—Sept. 11).—Pierre Deschamps, a poor woodcutter, lives in dire poverty with his wife and daughter, Thelma. He is too poor even to contribute to the fund which is raised by the grateful parishioners to buy a set of silver candlesticks for Father Bernardi, the venerable pastor. His child falls desperately ill and the village doctor informs Pierre that unless he can secure the services of a specialist from Montreal, whose fee is high, the little one will soon die.

Driven to desperation, Pierre goes to the church in the dead of the night to steal the silver candlesticks and is seen by the priest in his act of sacrilege. But the good father knowing Pierre's dire need, doesn't disclose his knowledge. Pierre's conscience pricks him, however, and he returns the candlesticks to their place. Returning home he finds his child whom the local doctors have given up, to all appearances dead. Meanwhile the good priest is praying earnestly for the child and by a miracle the child is brought back to life. Pierre and his wife offer their thanks to God, as the child is seen gradually to regain her consciousness.

DOMINO.

A TRAGEDY OF THE NORTH WOODS (Two Parts—Sept. 17).—Mackenzie, a factor in the Hudson Bay Company, who is very unpopular on account of his brutality, is found murdered by Sands, a trapper. Sergeant Allen of the Canadian Mounted Police is detailed to identify and apprehend the murderer. By clever detective work he brings the crime home to Burke, the assistant factor. He finds that Burke had been seriously wronged by Mackenzie and that Burke had killed him, in what was really self-defense. Allen reports to his chief that he is unable to secure enough evidence to identify the murderer.

MILDRED'S DOLL (Two Parts—Sept. 10).—Will Holt, an old miner, lives alone in a small Western town, with his little granddaughter, Mildred. Two outlaws, in search of shelter for the night, approach Holt's cabin. Looking in at a window, they see Bill weighing his gold dust, and the bandits scheme together to return next day, while he is out working the claim, and steal the treasure.

When Holt goes out the next morning he warns Mildred to keep the door locked and admit no one. He calls the dog in to guard her during his absence, and kissing her good-bye, shoulders his pick and departs. As soon as the outlaws are satisfied that Holt is absorbed in his work, they draw near the cabin. Their stealthy footsteps catch the keen ear of the dog, Spot, who warns his young mistress by barking frantically. Mildred fears for the safety of her grandfather's gold. She does not think at all of her own danger in the exciting problem of how to conceal the precious hoard. Then an idea flashes over her. She has a beautiful, big doll with a head that screws on and off. Removing the doll's head, she empties the gold into the hollow body of her plaything.

The bandits come to the door calling for a drink of water. But the little girl refuses to admit them. In no time at all they have hammered down the door. They seize Mildred, gag and bind her, who, in terror, drops the doll. Spot meanwhile has escaped. He rushes to the creek and Holt knows at once something is wrong. The miner returns, kills one of the bandits, and is in danger of being worsted by the other, when Mildred, who has struggled free from her bonds, shoots him. After all is over, Mildred brings the gold-stuffed doll to her amazed grandfather.

THANHOUSER.

A MOTHER'S CHOICE (Two Parts—Sept. 1).—Anna Lehnberg, the wife of an anarchist, lives in daily terror of the police. Her husband, an expert chemist, has invented several explosives to be used against the enemies of the cause, and the woman fears that her baby son will be trained to follow his father's dangerous life. A woman in the same tenement dies, and Anna substitutes her own child for the infant of the dead woman. She realizes that the bereaved husband, a man of high character, not knowing that the child is not his own, will give it the best of care. Later, when the anarchist is experimenting with his explosives, he is killed and she is left alone with the baby, who has taken her own child's place.

Years pass, and George, her foster son, now grown to manhood, has won her heart, but she often thinks of her own child. Reading in the newspaper that her real son, now wealthy, is visiting the city on his yacht, she determines to see him. Posing as a flower seller, she goes to the yacht and after seeing her son to whom she does not disclose her identity, she sets out for shore. The boat is upset and she is rescued from drowning by her own son, and by George the lad whose place he has taken. Realizing the wrong she has done him, she confesses to George the secret of his birth, but learns he is perfectly happy with her, and as she has grown to care more for him than for her own child, she leaves the young millionaire in blissful ignorance of the fact that the "flower woman" whom he rescued was his own mother.

ARTY THE ARTIST (August 30).—Arty has a fatal gift for caricature. He is a skillful artist, but loses several positions because he cannot help being funny. On one occasion he lands a tat job as drawing master in a girl's boarding school. But the humorous points in the principal's make-up are too much for him. He draws a caricature of her which convulses the pupils, and being caught in this unpardonable offence, is instantly dismissed.

Another time, while trying to be a good fellow at the hotel bar, he gets in wrong by making a comic portrait of Mr. Taft. With great presence of mind, however, he placates his angry audience by transforming the likeness to that of William Jennings Bryan.

Arty is successful in selling some humorous drawings to a newspaper. The same day he meets on the street May Miles, one of his former pupils at the boarding school. She takes him home with her and announces to her father that Mr. Archibald Atkinson will come daily to teach her art. Father accepts this state of affairs on one condition—that the lessons be conducted right there in that room, and that neither of them shall speak a word.

The young pair show some disappointment, but soon brighten up. Arty places his easel and surreptitiously starts on humorous sketch of Father Miles. This he follows up with another drawing in more ardent vein. It resembles a huge valentine with two arrow-pierced hearts. May and Arty, on bended knee, supplicate Mr. Miles with the art offering. Their cleverness in getting round the technical difficulties of their case so please the old man that he gives them his blessing.

PRINCESS.

HIS WINNING WAY (Sept. 4).—Nolan Gottyspile, just out of college, wants to marry Mignon. The girl's father, however, says "No." When he finds out that Mignon is just as anxious to marry Nolan as he is to marry her, the old man, having other plans in mind, tells Nolan that he can have the girl when he acquires $10,000. Nolan is broke, but he does not despair. He finds a diamond pin that brings him $100, and with this as a start, after a strenuous week of high finance raises his capital to $17,095. Mignon's father is then compelled to live up to his agreement, but to make certain that all is well, he insists that Nolan buy his wife a $10,000 house. Nolan cleverly arranges it so that the old man has to pay for the place, and when the bill collectors begin to come around, Nolan has to confess that the money he had shown the old man was borrowed capital and that he was in reality absolutely "broke." Thereupon Mignon's gouty parent, enraged at her husband, sets out to kill Nolan. Just at the critical time an attorney arrives on the scene with news of a legacy, and Nolan and Mignon are then on Easy Street.

THE KEEPER OF THE LIGHT (August 28).—The light on Gresham Island for many years has guided ships through the dangerous reefs into safe waters. The lighthouse keeper, John McCabe, lives on the island with his granddaughter, Ruth, and his assistant, Will Banks. Ruth falls in love with George Davies, a wealthy young man on the mainland. When Will learns of this, he steps aside in favor of Davies, though he long has loved Ruth in silence.

Davies' mother objects to the match. She writes Ruth a letter telling her that she has neither the birth nor the education to make a fit wife for George, and Ruth breaks the engagement. Her reason for doing so, however, she conceals from her lover. But Will Banks finds it out and tells George. Davies comes to the lighthouse, confident that he can induce Ruth to change her mind. But she is firm in her refusal to marry him.

Soon after this, John McCabe is called away. Knowing of his absence, a gang of wreckers try to prevent the light from being lit. While Banks is holding the besiegers at bay, Ruth climbs the tower and lights the great lamp. All night she keeps vigil in her grandfather's place and the ships pass in safety. She is mortally wounded by a shot from one of the wreckers, but the girl clings to her post until dawn brings the rescuers.

Before Ruth dies, scarcely twenty-four hours later, the story of her heroism is in every mouth. George Davies, grief stricken, finds his mother shamed and silenced.

MAJESTIC.

EVERY MAN HAS HIS PRICE (Sept. 16).—Ralph Pelton, wealthy, arrogant New Yorker, has just won a suit for title to a large tract of land in the West. On the land in question are settled a number of small ranchers who had believed themselves owners, but Pelton had taken advantage of a sharp technicality. Pauperized by the legal struggle, the ranchers are desperate.

Al Carter, as sheriff, is forced to serve ejectment papers on the ranchers, although his sympathies are with his fellow Westerners. Scornful of any danger, Pelton travels West alone to inspect his new holdings. His arrival causes mutterings from the ranchers and townspeople. Arrogantly impressing the unwilling sheriff as a guide, Pelton starts on a horseback tour of his lands. Otto Walsh, one of the ranchers, follows Pelton and asks permission to move the house on his former ranch, which building he considers rightfully belongs to him. Pelton, without provocation, knocks Walsh down and starts to beat him cruelly. Carter at once arrests Pelton on a charge of assault.

Walsh, painfully injured, reaches town first and his story arouses the ranchers, cowboys and townsmen. The sheriff takes his indignant, sneering prisoner through a threatening mob and lodges him in jail. The mob determines on revenge. Carter's deputies desert him, and the sheriff alone remains to protect Pelton. The mob kindles fire in the street and suspends a pot of tar over the flames.

Pelton witnesses the preparations from the jail window. His nerve deserts him and he offers the sheriff $1,000, then $10,000 to spirit him away. The sheriff refuses. Pelton's fright becomes terror. "What's your price? I'll give you anything," he cries to the sheriff. Carter weakens and tells Pelton his price. The Easterner hesitates, then consents. Pelton signs a paper and hands Carter $10,000 in banknotes. The sheriff smuggles Pelton out the rear, gives him a horse and the Easterner gallops for the next railroad station. As the sheriff reenters his locked and barricaded office, one of the ranchers, coming into town, recognizes Pelton as he gallops by.

The rancher reports the escape, and the maddened mob, just ready to apply the tar and feathers, breaks into the sheriff's office. Carter holds back the mob with his revolver, then hands over the paper and the $10,000 to one of the leaders with the remark, "My resignation as sheriff goes with this bribe." The paper is in the form of a deed, attested by the sheriff as a notary, and signed by Pelton, transferring to the former owners all the land involved in the court decision. Pelton also writes that the $10,000 is to reimburse the ranchers for their litigation expenses. The "bribe" is thankfully approved of by all.

DOWN THE HILL TO CREDITVILLE (Sept. 18).—Marcus Down makes only $15 a week. He has always paid spot cash for everything, until he meets Mamie New and they are wed. Then Mamie shows him how simple it is to get things on the easy payment plan. At first everything is rosy and matters go very smoothly for the young couple. Then the collectors begin to get busy and finally Marcus has nothing left, not even his bride, for the parson comes to take her for his fee, which had been arranged for on a ten cents a day basis. The story which is told in a series of clever quatrains has a moral which is a good one.

GERMANIA (Five Parts).—It is the history of the German Revolution and the coalition of the powers of Europe which caused the first rout of Napoleon during the battle of Leipsic on October 10, 1813. Napoleon scoured the whole of Europe and, overwhelmed by his victories, followed the course of his destiny toward a tragic setting. The allied armies had been conquered many times over, but were still undaunted. The protectorate of Napoleon weighed like a yoke over the kingdoms of the Confederation of the Rhine, but the poets, philosophers, and thinkers of the whole of Germany were united in thought; that of relieving their Fatherland from the humiliation which the Emperor with his glory had imposed upon them. The German youth associated in the famous "League of Courage"—the Tugendbund—disciplined their minds and their muscles at the sacred fire of an unquenchable thirst for independence.

In the printing office of Stein in Nuremburg burns the sacred fire of German patriotism. The news of the defeat of Austerlitz and of the signing of the treaty of Presburgh which puts Bavaria into the hand of Napoleon, casts despair into the minds of all the students who assemble round the printer, John P. Palm. The latter exhorts them not to lose heart and reads to them a page of the fiery pamphlet he is printing and which bears as title "The Deep Debasement of Germany." The youths become enthusiastic and offer themselves as volunteers to spread the work of Palm throughout Germany. But the pamphlet falls into the hands of Napoleon, who orders the arrest of Palm. By the aid of the students, Karl Worms and Chrysogonus, Palm succeeds in making his escape from Nuremburg and in taking refuge in a mill near the shores of the Pegnitz. This mill is at once transformed into a secret printing office from which are still hurled throughout all Germany proclamations of fire hidden in bags of flour. Such diffusions were specially in charge of two youths, Frederick Loewe and George, the brother of Riecke and Jane, two girls not yet twenty.

Frederick loves Riecke, who reciprocates his love. But the grandeur of the work of redemption which is being prepared for the oppressed Fatherland, inspires so much enthusiasm that he decided to start, persuading George to do the same. While they are far off, Worms falls hopelessly in love with Riecke and betrays Frederick, who has placed blind confidence in him. One day, in a wood near the river, he abuses her, and from that day eternal remorse and grief tears his heart and the girl's. Meanwhile Frederick and George in their patriotic pilgrimage are one day provoked by some French officers. George is killed, but Frederick succeeds in making his escape and goes towards his native village, happy at the idea of seeing his Riecke again. At the mill they know already the news of his approaching arrival—Riecke trembles. Frederick arrives, accompanied by other students. Festivities are made at the mill, when all of a sudden they are startled by a cry of alarm. Some French soldiers break into the house and arrest Palm, dragging him away amidst the cries and lamentations of all the bystanders.

A boy named Jebbel, in order to save his old grandmother who is dying of starvation, tempted by the offered reward, reveals the hiding place of Palm who a few days after ended his noble life, shot by the soldiers of the garrison of Brunau.

The campaigns of 1806 and 1807 are over. Frederick has returned to his cottage where his old mother has long been expecting him. He decides to marry sweet Riecke.

The day fixed for the marriage has arrived. While all are merry, Karl Worms arrives unexpectedly. The poor Riecke, at seeing again that hated man feels as if in her heart a horrible wound were breaking out afresh. She feels incapable either of making a confession or of telling a lie—and she flees, leaving a short note for Frederick. It is the hour of the betrothal. Riecke is to be found nowhere—but Frederick sees on the table amongst the flowers the short note, which tells him of her flight and that she can see him no more. Frederick like a man out of his mind calls her and looks for her, but to no purpose, and finally hears from Jane the sad truth! He looks for Worms to demand an explanation and to vindicate the wrong, but Worms also has fled. Can they have made their escape together? The thirst for revenge increases.

He discovers the friend who has betrayed him at a meeting of patriots and he, the dumb statue of revenge, throws at the feet of Worms a sword whilst he, himself, sword in hand stands before him. One of them must die. But while the two adversaries are beginning to fight, a sweet vision stops them. The charming figure of a woman appears to them in a ray of light—the Queen herself! Those swords henceforth will never be raised again but against the enemies of their common country! Frederick has quenched his thirst for revenge in the holy name of his beloved Germany. We are at the days of the great trial, at that gigantic battle which history has called "the battle of nations." On the funeral plain of Leipsic, the characters of our story are still found near each other. Jebbel, the boy who had betrayed Palm, is now a drummer-boy and washes out by his own blood the shame of his treason. Karl Worms purifies the atrocious remorse in his heart by falling in defense of his flag. Frederick also has fallen near Karl.

Riecke wanders like a mad-stricken figure amidst the corpses. She discovers the hated Worms and flees in terror, but when she catches sight of Frederick, who is dying, she rushes near him, bends over him and kisses him. "Who has conquered?" asks Frederick with his last breath. "Germany," replies Riecke. She holds his head in her lap—the head of the dearly beloved one who is no more. But the grief of that poor girl lost amongst the confused crowd of bleeding corpses rises like a sad and lofty symbol; it is the great sacrifice which all the tenderest and greatest of loves must undergo before the shrine of the Fatherland! Poor Riecke no longer cries. Far, far away on the horizon of fire, pass the remainder of the defeated army of Napoleon. And over Germany now dawns the ray of a long expected freedom!

UNIVERSAL SPECIAL FEATURE.

RICHELIEU (Four Parts—Released Week of August 31).—With the opening of the story Richelieu pardons the Duke of Orleans and all his followers in the Lanquedoc revolt, save one. The exception is Adrien de Mauprat. Because he seized a French town without his leader's orders, Richelieu advises him to lead his troops against the Spaniards and seek honorable death in battle.

Julie, Richelieu's ward, loves de Mauprat, but notwithstanding her entreaties, the Cardinal is relentless; de Mauprat courts death on the battlefield. But now that he seeks death, it shuns him; instead of a soldier's grave, he wins glory.

Julie has another admirer, Baradas, the King's favorite. Aware of de Mauprat's place in Julie's affections, he sets himself to bring discredit upon his rival. Later, Julie, at the King's request, attends court. She makes a deep impression upon the weak-minded, fickle monarch. A year after the departure of de Mauprat, Baradas and his followers conspire to murder Richelieu and seize the throne of France. At this critical time de Mauprat returns, famous in battle, sad of heart and loathing Richelieu. Thus he becomes a ready member of the conspirators. However, Richelieu hears of his arrival and of the conspiracy and has him arrested. In the meantime, Julie has returned from court and again appeals for de Mauprat's life. Thus, when de Mauprat is ushered into the Cardinal's presence, instead of hearing his death sentence, he is informed that he will marry Julie the following day. Hearing of this the King is violently angry; Julie is summoned to appear at court. Once there she is virtually held prisoner and her marriage is declared invalid.

The false Baradas convinces de Mauprat that he has been tricked by Richelieu. De Mauprat swears vengeance and again joins the conspirators, all of whom sign a scroll addressed to the Spaniards offering to deliver France into their hands.

From here the story develops with plot and counterplot. How de Mauprat discovers his tragic mistake in thinking the Cardinal has double-crossed him, how he manages, through a heroic effort, to save the old man's life; how de Mauprat falls into the hands of the King and is only saved by a master stroke of diplomacy on Richelieu's part, the death of the scheming Baradas and the final achievement of happiness for the young lovers, Julie and de Mauprat, makes up the essential points of the story.

NORTHERN LIGHTS (Five Parts).—Captain Gray, of the United States Army, detailed to quell the Indian uprising, is wounded. A courier is dispatched to Gray's home with the news. Mrs. Gray, about to become a mother, receives a violent shock at the recital of the details of her husband's injury by the courier.

The child born at this inopportune time is Wallace Gray. The pre-natal influence exercised over the child at the time of his mother being informed of her husband's injury marks him as a coward. The report of a shot or the sound of an explosion throws the lad into spasms of fear. He is sent to college and there forms a strong comradeship with Swiftwind, an Indian sent by his tribe to be educated.

Wallace forms a strong attachment for Florence Dunbar, a ward of his father, now Colonel Gray. Swiftwind is made acquainted with the moral defect inherent in Wallace and pities and protects him whenever the lad is made the subject of the jeers of his friends because of his born defect.

Swiftwind is a graduate physician and receives a commission as assistant army surgeon, detailed to Fort Terry, in command of Colonel Gray. His immediate superior is Dr. Sherwood, an unscrupulous man.

Florence Dunbar and Wallace Gray, traveling in a stage coach to Fort Terry, are attacked by Indians. Wallace, with a cringing fear, deserts his companion, who is saved only by the timely arrival of Dr. Sherwood and troop. Sherwood marries Florence, nothing more being heard of Wallace, who, however, enlists in another regiment under General Crook, deserts under fire and ultimately surrenders himself to his father, in the hope that he will be condemned to death. The boy, however, is sentenced to the "pyramids."

While working under "ball and chain" he hears that his father and a small band of Americans are hemmed in a canyon with no hope of relief by Indians, who, having observed the Northern Lights in the heavens, follow their belief that the "Lights" foretell victory in battle and start on a massacre.

General Crook calls for a volunteer to pass through the Indian lines to deliver a message to Colonel Gray. Swiftwind volunteers, but being weak from exhaustion and privation, falls dead as he is about to commence his ride.

Wallace begs for the opportunity to redeem himself, and mounting his horse, arrives with the message to the besieged band just as they are about to recognize a false flag of truce of the Indians.

Sherwood attempts to kill his wife by substituting cholera germs in a bottle labeled morphine. He is injured, however, and Swiftwind, intending to alleviate Dr. Sherwood's suffering with morphine, inoculates him with the cholera germs, unwittingly putting an end to him. Wallace's redemption restores him to the affection of Florence, whom he marries.

THE MAN O' WAR'S MAN (Five Parts).—Manuel Torres, a millionaire banker of the City of Mexico, has been secretly a sympatthizer with the Constitutionalists, but gives large sums to the Huerta administration for certain oil concessions. Havilando, a captain in Huerta's army, falls in love with Isabel, only daughter of M. Torres, while negotiating with the banker for money. Havilando, left alone in Torres library, seeing the safe open, discovers a confidential letter from General Carranzas. He steals the letter and takes it to Huerta, who immediately has Torres arrested, thrown into prison, and confiscates his property. Isabel makes a strong appeal to Huerta for her father. Finally Huerta, who needs a spy in New York City, offers consideration if Isabel will become a spy. She readily consents, goes to New York City and meets Jack Conway, a captain in the United States Navy. Both become infatuated and while on a mission for Mexico, Isabel prevents the Mexican conspirators from murdering Jack Conway.

Isabel is much incensed at the plot to murder Jack, and their love increases. Conway is ordered to Washington, but is followed by Mexican conspirators. By disguise, Conday discovers their plan to blow up the Panama Canal and at the great Army and Navy ball, resents Capt. Havilando's insult to our flag, by grabbing the sword from his hand and choking the guilty Havilando until he is prostrate at Conway's feet and humbly craves mercy before all the guests.

Secretary Bryan becomes interested in Captain Conway and he is ordered to Vera Cruz. Isabel is ordered back to Mexico and both meet in Cordoba, where Jack is endeavoring to discover certain Mexican plans. Isabel attempts to assist him but their plans are thwarted by Havilando, who penetrates Conway's disguise. Conway is thrown in prison and ordered shot if he attempts even to look out of the prison window, but through the assistance of Isabel her brother Louis and Ensign Hanley, Conway escapes and the unfortunate General Cardenas, who is investigating Conway's arrest, looks out of the prison window and receives the fatal shot intended for Conway.

Conway in escaping the San Juan prison and with the assistance of an aeroplane, arrives at the New Orleans, where he learns of the United States fleet coming to Mexico. Isabel learns her father is imprisoned at San Juan and attempts to rescue him. The fleet is on its way and at a war council of the Latin countries, Conway, with eight of his trusted sailors disguised as Mexicans, gain admission, discover certain plots and is about to leave when he is again betrayed by the revengeful Havilando. Conway and the boys cover the entire council, while Conway smashes open the window, just in time to see the approaching U. S. fleet.

Conway and the sailors lock the entire council in the office and make their escape but the wily Havilando leaps from a window 60 feet, into the sea and swims ashore and takes charge of the disorganized Mexicans who are terror stricken at the U. S. fleet in the harbor. Isabel, with the help of the English consul gets her father out of prison and amid the landing of the United States troops, the sniping in the streets, the terror of American women and children who are under the protection of the U. S., Havilando, with a few trusted Mexicans, shooting the Americans from the top of the Hotel Dillequencia until he is discovered by Conway, who follows him to the roof and in a terrific sword battle, Louis Torres shoots the wicked Havilando and the Stars and Stripes float gracefully over the happy union of Isabel and Jack, the Mexican and American spies.

THE LITTLEST REBEL (Six Parts).—Herbert Carey discharges the Dudley brothers, Joe and Jim, from their positions as overseers on his plantation and thereby incurs their enmity. War is declared and Carey, after bidding his wife and daughter Virgie, farewell, joins the Southern forces, the Dudleys joining the Northern. The spring of '61 finds Carey, the most dangerous and daring of Confederate scouts. The Dudleys are under the command of Colonel Morrison, a dashing, chivalrous young Northern officer. Grant closes in on Richmond and orders Morrison to capture Carey. Morrison takes a small detachment of troops—including Tim Dudley—and going to the Carey homestead, searches it. Dudley, seeing a chance for revenge, fires the house; but in endeavoring to escape is shot and killed by Morrison, who has discovered his treachery. With the house in ruins and penniless, Mrs. Carey and Virgie, finally seek shelter in the deserted cabin of their former overseers.

Mrs. Carey sinks down and finally dies. Carey, hearing of this, gets to the cottage and assists Uncle Billy to bury her. Carey, wishing to remove Virgie to Richmond, receives a pass from Lee permitting Virgie and an escort to go through the Confederate lines. As he goes to the cottage to deliver the pass to Uncle Billy he is discovered and captured in it by Morrison. Carey tells him why he had come and Morrison's heart, being touched, he also gives Carey a pass through the Northern lines, telling him to take Virgie into Richmond himself. Joe Dudley discovers this and informs the Northern officer that Morrison has given a pass to Carey, the notorious scout, to pass through the Northern lines. Carey and Morrison are captured, court-martialed and sentenced to be shot. Little Virgie, hearing of this, goes to Grant and pleads with him to save her "Daddy." Carey is called before Grant and tells his story. Grant's heart is touched and he releases Carey, telling him that though he cannot honor Morrison's pass, he can honor that of General Lee. Morrison is released also, and Carey and The Littlest Rebel, Virgie, are once more reunited. After the war finds Morrison, his wife and child, meeting Carey and Virgie over the grave of his wife; the North and South join hands. The Confederate flag is seen meeting the Stars and Stripes, they flutter for a moment, then slowly intertwine and the picture fades away.

ECLECTIC.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE (Twelfth Episode—Two Parts).—Pauline is very angry with Harry because he has prevented her from attending the McCallum wedding and blames him for causing her recent automobile accident. Harry, however, shows her an account of what happened at the wedding where the lion tamer, true to his promise to Owen, let the lions escape endangering the guests. Pauline realizes that Harry has acted for the best and becomes reconciled.

Owen not being satisfied with the activities of his friend Hicks and having discovered in the person of the leader of a band of gypsies a man who is as daring as he is unscrupulous, decides to use this man to carry out his plans. He goes to the gypsy camp and makes arrangements with the leader to carry Pauline off and do away with her. The chief uses one of the old women to lure Pauline away. This old woman under the guise of selling Pauline some of the famous beauty cure or of telling her fortune gets her to a place where some of the band are in hiding.

The band capture Pauline and take her to their camp. There the gypsy leader refuses to do away with her as he is much taken with her charms and wants her for himself. This arouses the jealousy of one of the young women of the band to whom the leader had paid a great deal of attention. She goes to the house and tells Harry where Pauline is. Harry sets out to get her. He arrives at the camp but on attacking the leader is set upon by the whole band and the young woman as well who has suddenly changed her mind on seeing the leader in danger. Harry has the fight of his life on his hands but finally manages to get into a position from which he can force the gypsies to give up Pauline.

FORCING THE FORCE.—Tessie and Bessie, two charming young ladies whose natural ingenuity is quite the equal of their natural beauty, have become in arrears with their board bill. One fine morning the landlady appears and with much gusto delivers her ultimatum. Almost beside themselves the girls grab up a newspaper and see an advertisement for women cops. Away they rush to the station and with their best batch of smiles and coquettish glances completely overwhelm the captain and get put on the force.

Returning home in uniform the girls find themselves beset by the attentions of every good looking bachelor policeman on the force. One by one the cops arrive each thinking he is the first to call. But Tessie and Bessie have handled such situations before. They set each one to work doing something about the house as soon as he arrives. Mike does some mending, Tom the lawnmowing, Terance the garden sprinkling, and Jack and Harry a job of whitewashing. Things go along all right for a bit, while the fun piles up, but suddenly something happens and then pandemonium reigns. When the situation clears Tessie and Bessie find that they should worry about their board bills.

HOW MAX WENT ROUND THE WORLD.—Max decides to take a trip around the world, but then of course Mrs. Max has to be thought of as usual. Max hits on a plan and misses his train—on purpose. Mrs. Max hits on the same scheme and does the same—on purpose. Then arise!

PICTURESQUE AUVERGNE (France).—A beautiful scenic in natural colors.

IN THE LIONS' DEN (Three Parts).—Theodore Reibeth, a medical student, is introduced to Mlle. Aut Nissen in a moving picture studio where she is taking one of the leading roles. He is attracted to her by her unusual beauty and charm. Circumstances later make it possible for him to see her frequently at her home, and he falls in love with her. Mlle. Nissen is very fond of animals and has in her apartments a private collection of lions which she shows to him.

Reibeth's graduation is at hand when he receives a letter from his brother telling him that through unfortunate investments their fortune has been lost. In this predicament Mlle. Nissen comes to his aid and lends him enough money to finish his studies, which he accepts and graduates with high honors. Later at a reception Reibeth sees Mlle. Nissen flirting with another man. He protests very strongly and the controversy causes a rupture which separates them.

Years pass and he almost forgets the celebrated actress. His wedding announcement in one of the papers, however, comes to the attention of Mlle. Nissen who asks him to call. He does so and the old love returns. His faith in his former love is still so great that he allows himself to be blindfolded by her and led into one of the lower portions of the house. When he tears the blindfold from his eyes he discovers he is in the den of lions. With death in a terrible form almost upon him he manages to escape. Mlle. Nissen seeing him free makes her own life a penance for the tragic deed she had planned.

DETECTIVE SWIFT (Three Parts).—An international thief posing as Count Otronski steals a valuable necklace from Mrs. Henderson Smith, a member of New York's Four Hundred. Her maid, Alice Caldwell, is accused of the crime, and arrested. Detective Swift is put on the case and finds a clue which convinces him that Alice is entirely innocent. Assuring her that he will make every effort to prove her innocence, he leaves her in custody to follow up an important clue. This clue leads him across the Atlantic to Europe and through Europe to Egypt. He discovers that Count Othonski is on the same boat and keeps a close watch on him. Count Otronski meets Mrs. Girard, a wealthy widow, and tries to force his attentions on her. Discovering by accident that a fellow passenger who has introduced himself as a prominent Chicagoian is in realty Detective Swift, Otronski leaves the boat at Alexandria and decides to take the train across Egypt and rejoin the vessel at Pt. Said. Detective Swift tries to follow him and the trail leads him through Heliopolis and across the great Lybian Desert to the encampment of some Arabs. Here Otronski bribes the Arabs to do away with Swift, who is following him. As the Arabians seize Swift they recognize on his hand a ring which had been given him some years before by Shiek Hassan, the leader of the tribe. This ring is engraved with the talisman of the tribe.

They take Swift to Hassan who sends out his couriers to head off Otronski; they are unsuccessful, but afford Swift every facility for getting to the seaboard to reach the vessel before it has passed out of Egyptian waters. Detective Swift regains the vessel at Alexandria and Otronski, thinking himself safe, is so flustrated on seeing Swift that he passes the jewels to Mrs. Girard for safe keeping. Swift has overheard the conversation and demands the jewels from Mrs. Girard, who gives them up.

UNCLE'S FINISH.—Uncle, aged eighty or more, crabbed and eccentric, has property worth a million. Percy, his nephew and only heir, is forced to bear all his uncle's peculiarities in order to keep in his good graces. Uncle reads in the paper about a rejuvenating spring in the southwest and talks about going there, to get back his youth. Percy disgusted, falls asleep, and dreams he has shipped his uncle away with instructions to bring him back in a rough box.

The fun begins. Uncle is administered the youth bringing waters and contracts a bad case on each administration. The muscle-making water makes him puglistic, the hungry water makes him eat everything in sight, even to the goldfish, and the climax comes when he returns to the monkey form after taking an overdose of the waters of youth. So Percy's uncle meets his finish. And Percy gets his money? Oh no, Percy just wakes up.

WHIFFLES' DOUBLE.—Whiffles gets an invitation from his lady love to call. On the way to the house he stops to get some roses and as he does he unknowingly passes his double, a poor shomaker. While making his call Whiffles accidentally breaks a little statue, and while he is out having it mended, Madam, his lady love's mother, has the shoemaker in to get a new pair of shoes. Every one notices the striking resemblance, and all declare it to be Whiffles in disguise. Things are just reaching a pretty state when Whiffles himself returns. Then everything is smoothed out with many a laugh and a chuckle KASHMIR (British India).—A fine scenic in natural colors.

BUNGLING BUNK'S BUNCO (Three Parts).—Bunk, a would-be Teddy Roosevelt, is desperately in love with Lillian, but Lillian has a romantic idea that she will not marry any one who is not an exceptionally brave man, and who cannot lay at her feet some proof of his bravery. Bunk knowing that she has other suitors decides to make good, so he shows her a photograph of himself in hunting costume, surrounded by the skins of wild animals, which he is supposed to have shot. The other suitors, however, call his bluff by showing Lillian a tent at the circus which has the identical setting shown in Bunk's phony photograph. Of course, there is nothing left but to make good, so he decides to go to Africa and get some of his own. He goes, but every appearance of a wild animal, harmless or otherwise, throws him into such a spasm of fear that he communicates his cowardice to his native porters, who desert him.

He is captured by some savages who take him to the Princess' Palace. She falls desperately in love with him, but on his refusal to marry her, her father gives him the choice either of marriage or the lions. He is locked up over night to think it over, but bribes his keeper to bring one of the lions with him, and he returns in triumph to Lilian's home to present her with a live specimen of his prowess. In the midst of his triumph the Princess and her father enter and nearly upset all of his hopes. Bunk is a character and in this subject he is a scream from start to finish.

THE WOMAN WITHOUT A HEART (Three Parts).—In a squalid tenement in the city of London, Marie Summers lives with her mother. Dissatisfied with her poverty stricken surroundings and thinking only of her own comfort and ambitions, she convinces her honest hard working fiance, Hansen, that with suitable finery she could make a name for herself and add greatly to the revenue of the home. Influenced by her argument he supplies the necessary money.

Leaving home and embarking on a career as an adventuress, she makes the acquaintance of Richard Warner, a banker, who is captivated by her charms. Warner marries her, and gratifies her every whim. She, however, is very indiscreet and taking advantage of her husband's business engagements, starts a flirtation with Lieutenant Von Glahn, which arouses Warner's jealous passions. Hansen comes to her for money for her mother. She satisfies him by giving him some of her jewelry, but treats him in such a manner that his love turns to hate. Her mother goes to see Marie, and exhausted from want of food begs her daughter for aid. Marie spurns her and goes out to a reception leaving her broken-hearted mother dying in the house. Warner, hearing of his wife's heartlessness, gets a divorce.

Driven from her home Marie wanders around, and seeking shelter simulates an accident and is taken into the home of Baroness Sutton, where she is cared for. Here Marie uses all her coquettish wiles and snares the Baroness' son Herbert. Exerting all her influence, Marie leads Herbert to ask her to marry him. Announcements are sent out, but like a thunderbolt from a clear sky comes Warner, the banker, to congratulate Herbert. Warner exposes Marie's past life. The result is that Herbert, who is troubled with a weak heart, succumbs to shock. Driven out in despair and abandoned by all her friends, she turns to Hansen, her former friend, but he spurns her, and in this bitter end, homeless, friendless and alone, "the woman without a heart" pays toll for her empty life.

FAMOUS PLAYERS.

AFTERMATH (Four Parts). Ruth Morgan, an orphaned girl, and Allan Buchanan, a young physician, leave their respective homes in the village to seek their fortune in the city. Ruth Morgan obtains employment with a metropolitan florist while Allan Buchanan works hard to establish a big practice. Ruth meets a fascinating man-about-town, who betrays and deserts the young girl, leaving her the victim of remorse and despair. Allan Buchanan makes a mistake in a prescription which causes the death of a child, and this tragedy, combined with the horror of his sister's pathetic death in a railroad accident, drives him to the river's edge, in search of merciful oblivion. On the very brink of the depths, he meets Ruth, who has come hither bent on the same tragic purpose. The two waifs of misfortune, thus strangely thrown together, save each other from suicide, and begin the struggle back to hope and faith together. Allan chances to be of service to a wealthy young man, hurt in an accident, who gratefully obtains a paying position for Allan, enabling him and Ruth to marry. The benefactor calls one day, and proves to be the man of Ruth's wretched past. In agony and shame, Ruth confesses her pathetic history to Allan, who finds this new sorrow greater even than those of his own past—but at last his love and loyalty to Ruth prove stronger than all the doubts and griefs of the moment, and in the light of a new happiness and a truer faith they forget the shadows that lay behind them.

THE LOST PARADISE (Five Parts).—The superintendent of the Knowlton Iron Works is in love with his employer's daughter, who has been reared in luxury, and is the idol of her father. To save this woman from the knowledge that her father is a thief, the loyal superintendent takes upon his own shoulders the guilt of her father's crime. After all the stress which the story develops, his sacrifice is learned and rewarded by the woman he loves, who decides to stand with him on the side of the oppressed workmen, to whose cause the superintendent has devoted his life's labor.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode 10—Reels 19 and 20). While a hundred false clues lure Norton and Jones on as many wild goose chases in quest of the missing girl and while Braine and the other conspirators, certain that she has gone to her death in the midst of the grim Atlantic, devise new schemes to get a trace of the vanished treasure, Florence, herself, bereft of speech and memory, is cared for by the kindly folk of the tiny fisher-village, whither her rescuers have brought her. Days and weeks pass, but although she rapidly regains her strength, Florence gives no sign that she recalls anything of her past. Then it happens that Jackson, one of Braine's lieutenants in search of recreation, comes to the village. Fate throws him across Florence's path, he recognizes her, and at once apprises Braine of her whereabouts. Braine and the Countess Olga, already at their wits' end to locate the whereabouts of the Hargreaves' fortune, at once take counsel, and it is arranged that Braine, who has been informed of Florence's condition, shall go at once to the fisher-village.

In the meantime Norton and Jones have not been idle. Jones has set off on a false scent, while Norton remains to keep a watch on the conspirators, whom he is sure are holding Florence in their power. Discovering that he is dogging their footsteps, two of the gang lay a clever trap for the reporter. As if making every effort to conceal their movements, they lead Norton by a roundabout route to a house on the water side, where an artfully concealed trap-door leads to a vault into which the river enters at high tide. Seeing the men enter this house, after a short delay Norton forces his way in also, sure that he has located Florence's prison at last. An instant later the trap is sprung and he is precipitated into the noisome pit below.

When the conspirators find that he still breathes, they form a sudden plan, which promises to eliminate him from interference with their schemes quite as effectually as would his death. The plan is nothing less than to "shanghai" him. Within the hour he is dragged aboard a vessel leaving for a three-year cruise in Northern waters, and, with the aches and pains of returning consciousness, he is put to work at the various rough tasks, which are part of a seaman's life aboard a whaler.

Meanwhile Braine arrives at the fisher-village, and after some days of reconnaissance, learns all that the simple folk know of Florence's rescue and her ensuing history. Disguised as an old man he poses as her father and attempts to get possession of the girl, but something about him—some recollection hidden away in the misty depths of Florence's mind—causes her to show fear of her pseudo parent, which makes the old fisherman at whose home she is living, suspect that Braine is not what he claims to be. He is driven from the house and for a time his plans are frustrated. But Braine is not to be foiled so easily. He engages a fast motor yacht, and, when his opportunity comes, seizes Florence at a time she is alone on the beach. In spite of her desperate struggles he carries her aboard this boat and makes off. The seizure is seen by the old fisherman, who vainly gives chase, but too late to save the girl from her fate, and soon the yacht is a mere speck upon the horizon.

Many miles have been put behind the speeding boat, when a sudden rush of smoke from the vessel's hold gives warning of a new danger. Flames burst out of the cabin and soon drive all hands over the side. Fortunately a sailing vessel sees their plight and Braine and Florence are taken aboard. Braine, who is still in disguise, by promising a large sum of money to the captain, arranges to be put ashore with Florence at the nearest port. Because of her pitiful condition Florence is allowed the freedom of the deck. She does not observe the intent gaze of a sailor, who has eagerly watched her every movement since her arrival on board, nor does she see him follow her to a sequestered part of the deck. Suddenly she hears her name spoken in a voice which she knows well. It is only a whispered word, but a new light—the light of returning understanding—leaps into her eyes.

"Jimmy dear Jimmy!" she gasps, and the next minute she is held close in that young man's arms. In a flash her reason returns to her, and with a realization of her imminent danger. She nestles closer in her lover's embrace, all her doubts gone. As for the "shanghaied" Jimmy, who has already pierced Braine's disguise and heard his arrangements with the captain, it does not take him long to evolve a plan which will release them both from their difficulties.

The next morning, when the vessel arrives at the port, where it has been agreed to land them, strange to say, there is no sign of Norton. As Florence and her pseudo father, after paying over the stipulated sum to the captain, climb down the ship's side to the waiting boat, the reporter is nowhere to be seen. His absence is readily explained, however, as soon as Florence and her companion are out of sight of the sailors, who bring them ashore. With a swift and dexterous twist of his hand, her escort tears off the wig, whiskers and goggles, that have thus far concealed his identity and discloses—not Braine, but the missing Norton.

And Braine, bound and gagged and stripped to his shirt, and outward bound, rages vainly in his cabin.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode Eleven—Reels 21 and 22).—We lefe Florence Gray and her faithful swain, Jimmy Norton, hastening toward the railway station, while Braine, bound and gagged in the cabin of the whaler, struggled vainly to free himself. But their escape was not to be made so easily, for Braine, managing finally to work the gag out of his mouth, attracts attention of the whaler's captain and is set ashore. He reaches the railway station, just as the train which bears Florence and Norton steams out. His first angry disappointment, however, is but momentary. Braine is nothing, if not resourceful and, realizing that the couple are headed for New York, he sends a wire to the Countess Olga instructing her to meet the train at a point as far from its destination as possible.

With Jackson, the conspirator who discovered the whereabouts of Florence, the Countess boards the train, when it is still many miles from New York and, pretending that she is returning from a visit to a country friend, in mock surprise and delight at seeing the girl again, embraces Florence warmly. Norton she also congratulates, expressing her concern at his strange disappearance, but before she can learn from either of them their version of the strange mishaps that have befallen them, concerning one phase of which she is already quite familiar, there is a terrific, grinding crash. The car lurches heavily to one side, tossing the passengers about in confusion. Many are rendered unconscious, among them being Florence, Countess Olga and Norton. Jackson alone is unhurt.

Dragging himself to Florence's side, Jackson carries her senseless body out of the train and into the woods. Reaching a road he hails a farmer driving a buggy and quickly makes arrangements with him for the use of his vehicle for the afternoon. For Jackson knows he is near a dilapidated hut, which is the resort of a desperate gang of thugs and cutthroats in the pay of the conspirators, and thither he takes the still unconscious Florence, who by this time is begining to recover from her swoon. When she does so she is in the clutches of the gang, and despite her struggles, tears and pleadings, she is threatened with instant death unless she reveals the secret cache of the missing million.

While Florence is in this desperate plight, Norton comes slowly to his senses. Failing to find her and thinking the she has been already rescued by some of the trainmen, he carries the Countess from the wreck and with her finds refuge in a nearby house. There he learns from the farmer, who had turned over his buggy to Jackson, of Florence's capture and, mounting a horse, he hurriedly makes his way in the direction taken by the conspirators. As he draws near the hovel where Florence is confined, the lookout sees his approach and notifies the ruffians within. Hurriedly binding the girl, the men hasten to a part of the road which Norton must pass, and there they lay in wait for him. As he comes up they drag him from the horse and after a desperate struggle carry him bodily into the hut. There they threaten Florence that unless she at once divulges the hiding place of the Hargreaves' treasure, they will carry Norton bound, to the railway, where the flying "Lightning Express" is nearly due. When she tearfully and for the thousandth time pleads her ignorance of its whereabouts, without further parley, they proceed to carry out their threat.

Florence, left home in the hut, struggles vainly with her bonds. Working her way to a window, she smashes it with her pinioned feet, and, with a haste born of desperation, succeeds in sawing through the cords that hold her wrists on a fragment of the shattered glass. Once freed, the girl runs wildly toward the railway, in imagination seeing Norton crushed and mangled by the wheels of the on-rushing express.

Nor is she any too soon, for hardly has she reached the reporter's prostrate form, when the whistle of the train warns her that she will not have time to untie his bonds before the engine will be upon them. With an energy born of desperation she darts down the track in the direction of the on-coming train and throws the switch. The next instant, the express rushes by at top speed, but on the track next to that on which Norton has been bound by the conspirators. It is but the work of another instant for Florence to cut the cords that hold Norton.

But their troubles are not yet over, for Jackson and his gang, viewing from a safe vantage point the escape of their would-be victim, give chase and repidly overtake the couple, both of whom are suffering from their recent trying experiences. Before they do so however, Norton has made good use of the signal box at the switch, sending a hurry call for help to the nearby town. Fortunately, the police station is near the railway and without delay several stalwart bluecoats requisition a handcar and set out to aid them. Even then they do not arrive any too soon for the gang have caught up with the fleeing couple and Norton is fighting desperately for their lives, when the guardians of the law reach his side and scatter or capture the ruffians.

No matter how thrilling a story one may read, interest is not sustained if poor type, poor paper and poor press work make hard work for the eyes. It's the same with motion pictures. A clear picture is as necessary as a good scenario.

Because the basic product is right, the clearest pictures are on "Eastman" film. Look for the stencil mark in the margin.

A Friendly Tip from Carl Laemmle

"The new Universal serial story, 'THE TREY O' HEARTS,' by Louis Joseph Vance, will be the hit of the new season. You can take my word for it that it is by far the hottest, liveliest, most exciting, most interesting story ever shown in moving pictures before a discriminating public. You know that I have never given you a wrong tip, and I am not going to start now. To be sure, 'LUCILLE LOVE'' was a big money maker, but 'THE TREY O' HEARTS' will beat it to a frazzle. By making arrangements now, you are absolutely assured of a record-breaking business the day you show the picture, for a period of fifteen weeks. It will cost you a little extra money, but it is well worth it. 'A word to the wise, etc.'"

MIRROROIDE THE WORLD'S BEST SCREEN

Why? Believe the evidence of your own eyes. Send for our large, free samples. Test, compare with any screen on earth. Surely seeing is believing. Put the eyes that God gave you to the test.
Why pay 75 cents a square foot for an imitation—an inferior product—when you can buy

MIRROROIDE, the Best Screen on Earth, for 36 1-9 Cents a Square Foot?

It's canvas, coated with a metalized glass surface guaranteed against deteriorating—turning black, cracking or peeling—for five years. Besides, it can be washed with soap and water.

It's made as you desire, in size and tint—Silver White, Flesh, or Gold. In medium matte or rough metalized finish.
See Mr. Richardson's article in The Moving Picture World, page 63, July 4th, 1914.
Next week see our weekly output. See our previous world's challenge, as published for our imitators.

MAJESTIC GUIDE FOR EXHIBITORS

(In which we try to tell only the truth about all Majestic Releases)

Sierra Jim's Reformation (1 Reel) Release date Tuesday, Sept. 8—An appealing story well produced.
The Final Verdict (2 Reels) Release date Sunday, Sept. 13—A strong drama of the early West.
Every Man Has His Price (1 Reel) Release date Tuesday, Sept. 15—Not as well played throughout as it might have been but interesting, nevertheless.
Down the Hill to Creditville (1 Reel) Release date Friday, Sept. 18—A typical Dorothy Gish comedy presented in a novel way. A valuable offering.
Her Awakening (2 Reels) Release date Sunday, Sept. 20—This should prove exceptional, featuring Blanche Sweet.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY

Story by Harold MacGrath Scenario by Lloyd Lonergan

Thanhouser's Million Dollar Motion Picture Production

Thirteen two-reel episodes of this stupendous serial production are now appearing throughout the country. A two-reel episode is being released each week. Each episode portrays some spectacular feature. The entire play will take 23 episodes. More than 200 leading newspapers are now running this story.

The continued interest in this remarkable story is due entirely to the merit of the pictures. The public has found The Million Dollar Mystery full of human interest—thrills—excitement. And theatres are always PACKED on "Million Dollar Mystery Night." Remember, $10,000 will be paid for the best 100-word solution of the mystery.

Bookings may be arranged by applying to the Syndicate Film Corporation's nearest representative. The Million Dollar Mystery is an independent release and may be obtained regardless of the regular program being used.

PARAMOUNT PICTURES CORPORATION

To Motion Picture Exhibitors:

"A success!"

The "idea" back of the Paramount plan was fundamentally right. Therefore, it was only natural that it would prove successful.

There was never the slightest question in our minds that we were on the right track, and every Exhibitor we have seen and talked with has quickly grasped the possibilities to him -- possibilities with a dollars and cents meaning.

This is not idle talk. We have letters in our file showing that Exhibitors consider it a privilege and an opportunity to sign the Paramount contract. Already hundreds of Exhibitors, from every part of the United States, have contracted for the Paramount Program. When the plan is fully explained, the progressive Exhibitor sees in it a chance to make his the highest grade motion picture house possible. Naturally, that is synonymous with success -- profits and prosperity.

The Exhibitor now knows that the Paramount plan is not merely a pack of promises -- he has now seen Paramount pictures and Paramount publicity. He has found out that Paramount has not stopped with the Exhibitor - he has seen Paramount go right on to the public, the men, women and children who patronize the theatres. He has seen that the Paramount appeal is to the better class. He realizes that Paramount has a purpose, and it is now very plain to him that the purpose is to educate that part of the hundred million individuals in the United States who can afford to spend not less than a dime, and up to half a dollar, to the better class of motion pictures. He has seen that only the better class of pictures are included in the Paramount Program, and that the better class magazines having a national circulation are being used to exploit Paramount Pictures.

If you have not yet investigated the Paramount Plan, it is high time that you do so -- it behooves you to negotiate immediately, if profits are an inducement to you.

If your house is a success now, Paramount Pictures in it will make it a greater success.

Wire, 'phone or write; we'll match our time with yours -- it will enable us to prove that your signature on a Paramount contract would be your first step toward greater success.

Sincerely yours,

The Lion of Venice

Made by The Photo Drama Co.
(Arranged in 6 Parts—Actual footage 4950 Feet)

A Colossal Production—Large, not in the sense of footage or ensemble, but Big in Conception, Big in Execution, Big in the small things that make Great Pictures !

The Lion of Venice was made in Venice, Italy, under George Kleine's personal direction. Before an actor donned his paint or a camera clicked a contract was drawn by the City of Venice providing "that the scenario must be undersigned by an eminent writer of Venetian history and the properties supervised by an eminent artist who will warrant the artistic value, the truthfulness and the seriousness of the film."

A Splendid Contract That!—and one which protects YOU quite as much as the City of Venice.

Aside from a story delightful in its quaint glimpses of Fifteenth Century life, THE LION OF VENICE will take rank as an educational subject of rare value. The historic Museums of Venice gave their best and most precious treasures to the making of THE LION OF VENICE. The shrewdest Antiquarian can find no flaw in its wonderful illusion !

A Venetian Captain accused of betraying his Nation to the Turks —An Engaging Love Tale—A Thrilling Sea Battle—these are the essentials of the story of THE LION OF VENICE !

Vendetta!

(Released through Special Feature Department, General Film Co.)

Five Parts (5071 Feet)

FROM MARIE CORELLI'S FAMOUS NOVEL

In the preface to "Vendetta," Marie Corelli says: "Its chief incidents are founded on an actual occurrence in Naples during the year 1848!"

Buried as Dead in His Own Family Tomb, returning to life to find his wife and dearest friend unfaithful; discovering vast riches in that self-same tomb left by a pirate generations dead; using this mighty wealth to satisfy a horrible revenge—these, in brief, are the central thoughts of a story that shames mere fiction in its terrific reality!

> Says James S. McQuade in the "World" for August 29: "The gloom and horror of the family vault are vividly recreated . . . the effect of the earthquake shock in the Romani ballroom and in the grewsome vault where the avenging husband metes out the full measure of his own sufferings to a false and heartless wife, are terrifying in their reality—positively terrific in their visualization."

Strong praise from a conservative critic—yet the mere echo of all who have seen it.

> "Vendetta" takes its place as one of the natural masterpieces—it possesses all the essential qualities of the extraordinary in picture-making.

You can book "Vendetta" now through the Special Feature Department of the General Film Co. The publicity campaign is complete to the last detail.

GRAND OPERA in RUBEVILLE

BY ASHLEY MILLER

Affairs in Rubeville are in a terrible state. The ladies of the choir are in a state bordering on hysteria on account of Will Green, the village choir leader's marked favoritism for Eldora Perkins. The arrival of a new vocal teacher causes great consternation when he announces his intention to produce "The Bohemian Girl," with the aid of local talent. The rehearsals are in full blast when a second love affair is announced between the teacher and Minetta, a village heiress. The opera takes place amid much local love guessing.

Facts and Comments

THE day when exhibitors formed a sort of bread-line in the exchanges and received their cases out of the hands of the clerk with the curt admonition: "Here's your show, get out," has passed, never to return. The needs of the exhibitor now receive intelligent attention and there is profitable co-operation with an incidental improvement in manners all around. Once in a while a distributing clerk of this antiquated school tries to revive the memory of these evil days by resort to threats to "hold up the show." This threat should never be heard and should never be necessary. Where a man is behind in his payments it is altogether just and proper to deny him service. Indeed, a good deal of discretion must necessarily be allowed to every exchange in the matter of service. Where, however, the cloud between exchange and the exhibitor is no greater than a disputed amount for royalties threats "to hold up the show" would seem to be poor policy, especially if no bill for royalties has been rendered and if the service is paid weekly in advance. The exchange may return the money and deny service, but a threat "to hold up the show" is absolutely out of place. High-handed methods are no longer fashionable or profitable.

IN one of our London contemporaries we find a reference to the "exclusive picture rights on the battlefields." The remark is intended to be witty, but there is apparently more complacency than wit. Every person with average intelligence knows by this time that cameras in any of the countries involved in the war are looked upon with great suspicion and are liable to put the owner in bad odor with the civil and military authorities. The possession of motion picture cameras is now considered prima facie evidence of being a spy. As all Europe seems to have gone "spy-mad" no man who values his life will be foolish enough to hang around military camps with such a camera. Indeed, it is exceedingly doubtful whether he would ever get within a mile of a military camp.

WITH the coming of a new season the educational picture seems to occupy a much stronger position than ever before in the history of motion pictures. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has surely helped to sow the seeds for this prospective harvest. It has been arduous work, but it is now having its reward. Two things were needed to realize the visions of the past: Working capital and the right kind of people to bring about a proper support from the churches and the schools. In small measure these two things seem now to have been found. The names of men and women who are justly esteemed as educators appear among the official guides of some of the new companies formed for specializing in the production and distribution of educational motion pictures. A survey of the entire situation reveals the remarkable fact that the demand for educational films, which up to now has been very slight, indeed, is growing. We cannot say that even this growing demand will exhaust the supply now on hand which on examination will be found to be generously large. One cannot expect the growth of the educational picture to be rapid. It has taken a solid seven years of persistent and conscientious work to advance it to its present state. With the pioneer work happily behind us the prospect of pictures produced primarily for educational pictures brightens. It is but fair to say that up to this moment financial return of educational pictures to the producer has been conspicuous by its absence. If the demand for educational pictures continues we may hope that eventually one or two producers may be induced to specialize in them to a greater extent than has been possible heretofore. The first important step in the further progress of the educational picture must be in the matter of direction. This direction must be in the hands of educators familiar with the needs of the schools and not less familiar with the possibilities of the kinematograph. Just as the educators will need the assistance of practical film men the latter will need the advice and direction of the educators. Properly tilled the field is inexhaustible. What it needs today above everything else is system. It will not do to work a corner here and another corner there. The task must be systematized. Educational pictures, to achieve the best results possible, must come in the form of complete courses paralleling the text books or as the case may be supplying and supplementing them.

Themes

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

"A SUBJECT or topic on which a person writes or speaks." Such is the Century Dictionary definition. Whether or not an author should have a theme may be left out of consideration for the present. There are bright stories, especially comedies, in which no theme seems to have been present in the author's mind. We take pleasure in some of them for all that they lack subject matter, but most strong plays have some governing conception or principle, in plain words, an idea. When that idea is formulated by mental operations into a play, it furnishes the subject or theme.

The plot in a general way is merely the scheme or plan by which the subject matter is contrived, though it is often confused with theme and quite as often with incident. An incident of many thousand plays is the embrace of hero and heroine at the end, an end to which antecedent incidents lead. Originality of incident is very rare and not always delightful at that. What occurs in one drama may occur in thousands of others, yet be new in its application, and it becomes particularly interesting when it shows the relation of society to remarkable individualities.

We have, to start with, a master subject, one to be treated with infinite variety, in "Labor." It is in what man has accomplished by labor that he has gained supremacy over nature. That "Labor" is unattractive as a name must be admitted—it is probably so because so few are in congenial occupations—but in this topic lies the secret of man's success, of his intellectual power. The average audience at a picture show is composed of people who work, and they prefer to see the leading characters achieve through effort than to have the results of effort merely handed to them.

Most of the subjects of picture plays unconsciously embrace one or more of the social forces at work. What are these social forces? I can only enumerate a few by way of illustration: "Avarice," "Natural Justice," "Civil Justice," "War," "Government," "Monopoly," "Love," "Marriage," "Education," "Inequality of Rights," "Patriotism," "Philanthropy," "Physical Fear Forces," "Psychical Fear Forces," "Selfishness," "Freedom," "Environment," "Heredity." These merely illustrate the wide range of subject matter from which this or that specific theme may be drawn.

Experience seems to show that an author may start his play with insecure premises, relying on naturalness of action and characterization to carry on the movement in a convincing way. Such may be the case in dramas fantastic, or those of the future, but clear and accurate motivation requires more than plausibility to be effective. Truth of atmosphere and detail are of great importance, but they are a part of the play's treatment. The fundamental idea should be studied in all its aspects to make it sensibly or even prophetically true and worth while. What is the use of accurately picturing this or that phase of life without stirring the depths of the heart with demonstration of some strong idea? As there is a straightforward purpose in splendid criticism, so should there be in splendid creative work.

Under the head of "Avarice," we have a favorite theme, one distinguishing between honest production and "getting" what the other fellow has produced. Men incompetent to produce anything of great value to the world have found that our system of law permits them to absorb a large part of what results from production. Herein is involved one of the vital problems of the day. Nearly all things worth having are the product of labor. It is perfectly well known that all wealth is the result of production. Yet wealth passes into the hands of men who conceive it to be honorable on their part to take what they can get. They appropriate the fruits of labor because of the power of avarice, the power back of war for territory.

The dramatist need not attempt to solve a problem so complex, but he may make a story of vital interest in showing the dishonesty of appropriating results of labor without adequate compensation. There will be many of the average audience in sympathy with his story. We are just now menaced with a law of force that is almost purely destructive. What a powerful theme! All the abuses of force in war may be used to illustrate the abuses of force under our form of civil justice to the end that natural justice may sooner triumph. Because moving pictures carry these lessons to all parts of the world, operating as a civilizing factor, the playwright is assured of sympathetic attention in presenting the claims of natural justice as opposed to existing codes. The prevailing sense of insecurity and a natural desire for protection will unite to make such plays attractive.

To drive at the code under which we are living, to drive at it intelligently and convincingly, requires either an intuitive grasp of what is unjust or a careful study of the subject. This code has been created from the edicts of Emperors and Kings, eventually sanctioned by jurists and has proven a guide for legislative bodies and judicial decisions. Such is our code. Its nature, quite as well as its origin, is no longer acceptable to the great mass of people. The whole fabric was called into existence by men of property, and its service is almost entirely in the protection of accumulated property. There is a big opportunity for the playwright to indicate the rights of producing individualism in a way to win sympathy, in a way to win freedom for many who are now oppressed.

Under "Love," "Marriage" and "Education" appear thousands of themes addressed to the family life and its improvement. Tremendous physicial passion is back of the power man exerts when he appeals to the imagination and affections of woman, only to wrong her, even to blight her career. The constant exercise of this influence and its resistance forms an intensely interesting subject. The gradual evolution of passion into a nobler sentiment, the perils of its degradation, the sociological effects of love sentiment, the question of natural selection as opposed to arbitrary determination in marriage, the finer conception of marriage, all these are in use as themes and provide an infinite variety of sub-subjects for the whole wide range of drama. But we are only on the edge of a still greater field, involving new relations under a finer conception of woman's mission on earth.

Chose a theme and develop it along lines of advanced information. Study. Incidents are of minor importance. Characterization is largely in the hands of director and interpreter. The plot will work itself out. The main thing is to start with a noble one and stick to it. If at first you don't succeed, you will be in good company. If it is a case of something for nothing at first, give it, instead of trying to get it in order to win.

War Films

By W. Stephen Bush.

IT is a well-known fact that none of the European countries now engaged in war have permitted newspaper correspondents to come anywhere near the firing line. In fact the day of the old-fashioned war-correspondent who was permitted extraordinary freedom of action seems to have passed away—at any rate there is no trace of it in the present war. It stands to reason that the same inhibition applies with probably even stronger force to the cameraman.

This policy of stern prohibition we cannot help saying is unfortunate in every way. In the forum of public opinion, no slight factor at this stage of human civilization, the film is accepted as conclusive evidence. The newspaper may be and often is colored according to its prejudice. We can scarcely expect a French or English or Russian paper to be any more disinterested than a German, or Austrian or Hugarian paper. The press at Berlin and Vienna will hardly expatiate on a British victory while the papers of London and Paris cannot reasonably be expected to relate in a perfectly matter-of-fact way a defeat of the Allies. None of these papers will ever be selected as organs of the American League of Neutrality. The only real and incorruptible neutral in this war is not the type but the film. The moving picture camera is convincing beyond the peradventure of a doubt. As a means of enlightening the public as to the honest truth of the situation it is an invaluable instrument in the hands of any and all of the warring nations. It is utterly without bias and records and reports but does not color and distort.

The prohibition of the moving picture camera at the front is nothing less than a loss to civilization and an additional hindrance to peace. It is easy to cite illustrations in support of this contention.

It has been claimed, for instance, that the Germans have committed terrible outrages against humanity in their warfare upon the unfortunate Belgians. We are told that a committee of prominent Belgians is now on its way to this country to lay evidence of such outrages before the President. Supposing these men had motion pictures of such outrages. Whether the president would receive them or not the members of the committee would be in a position to lay their evidence before the American public by putting it on the screen of the motion picture theatres of the country. If, on the other hand, these reports of outrages are false or greatly exaggerated it would be easy enough to disprove them by showing the actual conditions in the cities and villages where the wanton destruction is claimed to have occurred. At any rate the camera would render a service to humanity by giving a true and honest account of things.

This republic of ours more than ever before is today the bulwark of humanity and the citadel of civilization. Many of us think not without reason that this country will eventually be destined to recall war-ridden Europe to its senses and to mediate between the combatants. It would help us all around if we had kinematographic records of the more important incidents of the war and our appeal for peace and humanity would lose nothing of its potency if it were reinforced by camera records of the horrors of war.

The question of war films has another aspect: What attitude ought the exhibitor to take toward war films? We have read with some emotion what the effects of the war have meant for the exhibitors and producers in the countries over the sea. Some of our foreign exchanges have become pitifully and eloquently small and thin and all of them exhort their readers not to exhibit war pictures at all. Some of the exhibitors in London it seems being prevented by the government from showing pictures which are in any way connected with the war have thought it wise to revive old war pictures to accommodate the supposed demand for kinematographic war news. It seems a strong protest against this policy has been registered by the patrons. They say justly enough that the war has entered enough into their daily lives and that they go to the motion picture theatres to escape the atmosphere of war and to forget the horrors of it. It is pointed out that the women especially who have relatives at the front are subjected to needless pain by exhibitions of human slaughter on the screen.

While this is an entirely neutral country we are nevertheless deeply interested in the news of the war. There is no question that the public here want all the pictorial war news they can get and there is no reason whatever for withholding it from them.

Unfortunately, none of the war pictures now being exhibited all over the country are authentic reproductions of actual scenes from the war. Such pictures are not in existence, as we have pointed out above. With this lack of genuine pictures on the one hand and the insistent demand of the public for "war pictures" exhibitors are in a perplexing quandary. A series of old pictures showing the various armies of Europe in maneuvers have been taken from the shelves where they had been reposing in peace for many months or even years.

Old copies of Pathe's weekly and of other kinematographic news service bureaus have been ransacked and often duplicated just to offer the public something that might pass for war pictures. Of course, the public know as well as the exhibitors themselves that actual pictures from the front are impossible, but they seem glad of pictures of mimic war if the real article cannot be obtained. In the big cities especially, where foreign-born inhabitants form a considerable part of the population, this demand for something that looks like war is undeniably great.

It seems to us, however, that the showing of war films may easily be overdone in spite of the present strong demand. Authentic records being almost out of the question, the public, it seems to us, will soon tire of the old war pictures. The objection made against war films in the motion picture theaters of London seems to have some force in this country as well. We cannot lose sight of the fact that our audiences here are much like motion picture audiences abroad, composed to a very large extent of women and children. The women as a rule will be grateful to the manager for leaving the war pictures out of the program or at least showing them but rarely. It is altogether possible that eventually the prohibition against moving picture cameras at the front will either be revoked or materially modified. Such an event would, indeed, mean a revival of the interest in war pictures. Far greater, however, than its value as a means of entertainment would be the value of the authentic war picture as an historic record and an argument in the hands of Humanity against Barbarism.

"In the Nick of Time"

A Live Reliance Two-Reel Melodrama with a Punch.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

CAST:

Nicholson .....Vester Pegg
Bess Hooker .....Irene Hunt
Superintendent .....Richard Cummings

OF PRESENT interest and manifesting abundant energy, "In the Nick of Time" seems to have been produced under a full head of steam. It opens with activity, its first reel furnishing more incident than some two-reel dramas, and there is a practical question involved—the prevention of the drink habit where a victim is well worth saving. Without preaching any sermon in either action or subtitle, "In the Nick of Time" indicates a possible cure for those unfortunates who cannot be reached by ordinary means.

One wonders what is to happen in the case of Nicholson, young railroad operator. He is not one of those moderate drinkers who are easily controlled, but carries a flask with him to work. In spite of his enslavement, he has bright prospects in his business and in his social relations. He holds a responsible position and is beloved by a girl of single-hearted devotion. Neither she nor her father, however, can accomplish anything with Nicholson, and his conversion seems out of the question. He exhibits remarkable ability and courage when his station is attacked by burglars intent on getting possession of a large consignment of specie for shipment. With hands bound behind him, he discomfits the thieves and brings about their arrest by extraordinary methods.

For this feat Nicholson is promoted, but he cannot stand prosperity. He falls back into intemperance and inefficiency at a moment when his prospects seem brightest. He cannot resist temptation that is put in his way. He therefore resigns and seeks change of work on a nearby ranch. While temperance in the presence of drink is better than temperance where it cannot be easily obtained, it is through inner control that men must work out their plans of self-redemption. Life in the open stirs within him a certain amount of moral freedom and he finds release from alcoholism.

Near the ranch is an abandoned station, one still equipped with telegraph instruments, and the "call of the rail" leads Nicholson to spend much of his leisure time there. He haunts the place, affected by the memories it arouses, and, in this way, he is afforded another opportunity to demonstrate his ability to solve difficulties in an emergency. Some stone-laden flat-cars break loose from a freight train and run wild on a down-grade, when an express train is coming up. Hutchinson learns of this accident over the wires and finds that he is in a position to avert costly disaster. He is shown switching the wild stone cars to their desruction just in the "nick of time," an instant before the express flashes by, and this brings him to the notice of those whose good offices were unavailing. He re-enters his old work a new man and merits the double reward he receives.

The principal roles are enacted with unpretentious intelligence throughout, that of Hutchinson in particular—there is no attempt at the heroic—and the story is told with enough ingenuity of incident to place it far above the regulation melodrama. The fine motive, good acting, and the care shown in every detail of production constitute a superior sum of values, augmented not a little by originality of treatment.

Milton H. Fahrney

THE motion picture industry is peculiarly plagued in the number of well-advertised men who hold high-sounding positions in many of its constituent companies and combinations, and particularly blessed in its few geniuses who are seldom heard of—outside of trade circles, but who, working silently and with consummate skill turn out the real products which keep the game alive. High in this latter class of men is Milton H. Fahrney, playwright, actor, producer of big successes in the golden days of the legitimate drama, pioneer motion picture producer and now principal director of the Centaur Film Company of Bayonne, New Jersey.

Milton H. Fahrney.

Mr. Fahrney has persistently dodged the press agent and held aloof from the interviewer, believing that the public is interested in the story on the screen and not in the men in the studio. It is a long tramp to public recognition along this road, but to the people on the inside of the picture business such constant, reliable, unfailing producers as Milton H. Fahrney are as well known and respected as the greatest of film magnates. Brought up in the old school of legitimate stage directors, a protege of the peerless Augustin Daly, and a co-worker with Richard Mansfield, Mr. Fahrney mastered the technique of dramatic production, and has long been rated as one of the finest stage managers in America.

In 1908 David Horsley induced Mr. Fahrney to enter the film game. He was successful from the start, and in the six years which have elapsed since then, has produced some of the most elaborate and successful features ever made on the west coast of America.

Mr. Fahrney is chiefly noted for the atmosphere he gets into his pictures, and for the remarkable action he gets out of big ensembles, and for the care and judgment he uses in selecting locations and outdoor light effects. It is said that Mr. Fahrney has never directed a picture which was deficient in technical quality.

Mr. Fahrney has returned to his old employer, and is now directing a special brand of one-reel comedies for David Horsley's coming program of seven comedies a week.

"The Lion of Venice"

A Venetian Romance of the Fifteenth Century (in Six Parts) Set Amid the Architectural Splendors of Venice, Now Being Booked at George Kleine's Various Branch Offices.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

DURING his six months' stay in Europe last year, among his other activities George Kleine bestowed considerable care on the production of "The Lion of Venice," a six-part photodrama, a little over 5,000 feet in length. As the action of the photodrama is confined to Venice and its environment, and seeing that the municipal authorities of the city are especially severe in their censorship of the production of moving pictures which treat of Venetian history, considerable red tape proceedings were necessary before permission was granted to use certain city properties that were essential to the correct historical making of the films, and to the use of the Grand Canal, unimpeded by traffic, on a certain day.

A type of gondola used in the fifteenth century—many specimens of which are preserved in the city's museum—was necessary for the pictures. Bissones, these gondolas were called in their day, and the richness of the decorations of the small open cabin amidship indicated the prominence of the patrician family to which the vessel belonged. The use of these bissones and of other necessary properties and costumes were granted Mr. Kleine on his stipulating to pay all expenses for their taking out and bringing back, and as guaranty of their return in the same condition as when received the sum of 120,000 lire (about $25,000) was deposited with the city treasurer.

A carefully detailed program of the production was also required by the Mayor, and it had to bear the signature of an eminent writer of Venetian history and of an eminent artist, who were prepared to warrant the artistic value, truthfulness and seriousness of the films, the making of which they were to watch carefully. In addition, a commissioned officer of the Italian Army was appointed to accompany the cameraman in all his work, in order to prevent the filming of any view showing a fortress or any other forbidden object.

The foregoing is sufficient to show the historical and educational value of these films, aside from their main value and purport—the photodramatic.

Prominent among the beautiful pageants shown in the films are the ceremony of the Marriage of the Sea and the Orsini wedding procession. In the former, it is sought to impress on all loyal Venetians the importance of that great highway, or artery, of Venice—the Grand Canal. It may be interjected at this point that the spectator never sees a horse nor an automobile, nor any drawn vehicle throughout these 5,000 feet of film. The gondola is omnipresent. The beautiful ceremony referred to reminds one that from any point in Venice—with its 150 canals, its 72 islands and 450 bridges—one may go swiftly by water to the Adriatic sea and the great ocean without setting foot to ground.

In this historically accurate pageant we see the Doge and his Council of Ten, in their robes of office, marching out of the beautiful Church of St. Marks, followed by high municipal and other dignitaries. To their left, as they march with rich display of office insignias, is the noble Ducal Palace, with its magnificent series of arches. On they pass until the bank of the Grand Canal is reached, where the Doge and his Council board the bucintoro, the great barge of state. Majestically the vessel is rowed out to the mouth of the canal, in the Adriatic, accompanied by gayly and richly draped bissones, where the latter drop the straight line and rapidly circle around the bucintoro. There we see Count Orsini, the villain of the story, invested with the symbol of High Admiral of the Navy of Venice.

The story has strong dramatic interest. Captain Benito Rienzi commands a small Venetian fleet at Cyprus, which he attempts to defend against the Turks. He returns to Venice for reinforcements and finds that his sweetheart, Bianca, has been forced to marry the powerful Count Orsini. The Evil Count and one of his aides succeed in plotting the ruin of Rienzi, who is condemned to death on the charge of conspiring with the Turks to surrender the fleet of Venice. The sentence of death is commuted to banishment for life at the entreaties of Renzi's beloved sister, Adriane. She accompanies her brother, whose heart is filled with fury against his native city.

The Turkish fleet now sails to close with that of Venice in a death struggle. Rienzi, who has joined a band of pirates and become their leader, throws his strength with the Turks. As his vessel sails straight for the Venetian Admiral's vessel, which has become stranded and almost helpless, his sister climbs aloft and raises the flag of the Lion of Venice. Rienzi and his followers are fired with patriotism at the sight and make a fierce onslaught on the Turks, who have boarded Admiral Orsini's flagship. Rienzi saves the day, and Orsini, who has received his death wound, confesses his crime to Rienzi and craves his pardon before death claims him.

Rienzi is reinstated as admiral of the Venetian fleet and weds Bianca.

The acting of this photodrama is of high merit, the part of Count Orsini, particularly, being ably sustained. Everyone will be delighted with the photography. It is a positive treat to view the films from this standpoint alone.

"Monsieur Lecoq"

A Three-Part Picture Play Adapted and Made in France by the Eclair Studios. Handled in America by the Features Ideal Company.

Reviewed by Harry W. De Long.

THERE are many and various points to be taken into consideration as to the make-up of a pictureplay; the first of all being the photography. The cameraman can mar the best plot ever written, and can ruin the artistry of the best actors in the working out of the scenes. Few visualizations are produced that do not contain foggy and badly focussed spots that are painful to the eye and a detriment to the picture. When you are fortunate enough to sit through a picture of three reels length that is bright, clear and almost devoid of flicker, it is a treat, and you feel like grasping the hands of the director and camera manipulator and giving them a good hearty shake and compliment them highly. They deserve recognition and encouragement.

Many alley and narrow street scenes are embraced in the development of the plot, in which the light and shadow effect is remarkably well done.

Such is one of the merits to be found in "Monsieur Lecoq." The acting of each individual member of the cast is also up to the mark. Although it is highly melodramatic in some of the scenes in the action of the plot, intensity and repression by the participants give a pleasing effect to the whole.

The Duke of Sairmuse weds Blanche Courtleigh, a beautiful English girl. Shortly after she is blackmailed for money by a band of ruffians who threaten to inform the Duke that her brother is a hardened convict. Wild with anxiety she decides to meet the blackmailers and strive to effect a compromise.

Her husband, suspicious of her actions, follows her and has one of the gang try to steal her earrings; he breaks in and in a struggle kills them. He is disguised in old clothes to save his wife's honor and holds off the police until she escapes.

Monsieur Lecoq, the famous detective, captures the Duke, but to protect his wife he keeps silent. The famous detective tries various devices to entrap the nobleman and learn his real identity, but it is useless. At last they permit him to escape and follow him to his home. While the Duke's faithful servant, Otto, is parleying with the sleuth, the Duke changes his clothes and confronts him in his natural guise. Baffled, the hound of the law departs. The Duke discharges Otto, giving him a large sum of money, to avert suspicion.

Scene from "Monsieur Lecoq" (Features Ideal).

Meanwhile the husband and wife have reached an understanding and, forgetting the past, endeavor to regain their former happiness.

A short time later the Duke receives a letter purporting to come from his servant and requesting a further loan. It is presented by a ragged individual and while the nobleman is making out the check the bearer strips off his disguise and stands revealed as Lecoq. He explains it has been absolutely necessary for him to clear up the mystery and as Sairmuse has delivered society of three evildoers the matter may be dropped. Thus the reputation of the famous detective has been vindicated and husband and wife are left to renew their happy alliance.

FAMOUS KLEINE-CINES DIRECTOR RENEWS CONTRACT.

E. Guazzoni, one of the greatest motion picture directors in the world, has renewed his contract with the Kleine-Cines Company for an indefinite period. Guazzoni is the producer of "Quo Vadis," "Antony and Cleopatra," "Julius Caesar," and many other successes. The Cines Company is one of the few French and Italian manufacturers whose output will not suffer as the result of the war. Guazzoni is already at work on another great multiple which advance reports say will surpass the best of his former efforts.

PATHE FRENCH STUDIOS STILL PRODUCING.

Word has been received by the American offices of Pathe Freres that their French studios are still producing negatives, despite the war. There are a sufficient number of actors who are exempt from military service to insure a steady supply of good pictures. In addition to this there was a good stock of unreleased pictures on hand when war broke out sufficient in itself to meet the requirements of the American market for a considerable length of time regardless of the new productions. Altogether the feeling in the American offices of the great French concern is one of optimism.

ESTABLISHING ALCO EXCHANGE.

Al. Lichtman, of the Alco Film Corporation, has left on an extended trip through the eastern and central states to establish branch exchanges for the distribution of the Alco features. It has not yet been fully decided where these exchanges will be located, but he will visit the following cities: Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Columbus, Detroit, Chicago and Washington, D. C., and others. Six exchanges have already been organized, full announcement of which will be made later.

"Perils of Pauline"

The Thirteenth Episode Is Still Perilous for Pauline—Her New Adventures Will Make Gasps Again, Surely.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is more than one deep and heavy thrill in these two reels, continuing the adventures of Pauline. If the reviewer remembers rightly as to number, he shouted out good and loud twice while watching the first reel and once over the second. The first adventure of the danger-loving—she gets enough of it—heroine is with a big basket of flowers in which is hidden a snake lively enough and long enough to make quite a disturbance.

One would have thought that this would have satisfied Pauline for a time; but she needs must buy a hunter and ride him in a steeplechase. This race is participated in by so big a "field" that when one rider falls the others come pounding upon him. While they are racing there are six or seven terrible tumbles. There is no faking about these falls. The film was taken at a real steeplechase and, if one or two of the participants were not killed it in, the fault wasn't theirs. Pauline, too, falls, and is carried off the course unconscious.

But still she continues to go where danger calls her and, at a house party in the Adirondacks, "falls" for a fake message and gets lost in the forest. Harry, too, while seeking her, falls into the clutches of the gang and it looks, for a time, as though it was all up with both. But they dodge down a steep bank and are pursued to the lip of a rocky cliff by a pool which they leap. It seems to be a jump of about seventy-five feet into deep water and Pauline and Harry take it together. There is no fake about it at all and they really are seen both in the air and swimming for the shore in the pool. The whole is well and clearly photographed and will stir things up a bit in the picture house where it is shown.

SNAP SHOTS FOR "STILLS."

The taking of "stills" for use in advertising film productions has always been something of a problem. The most striking scenes, as a rule, are difficult to pose for a time-exposure so that all the dramatic quality of the action is retained, and the result is that they are likely to fall flat in the Scene Posed for a Still Picture.

"stills." Yet these very scenes, if they could be reproduced as they appear on the films, are the most effective for advertising purposes.

One of the producing companies which releases through Warner's Features has found a way to get stills with real action in them. It is the United States Film Corporation, operating on the Pacific Coast under the direction of J. Arthur Nelson. The idea is simple, but effective. Mr. Nelson has a man with a camera follow the players about and take snap-shots of scenes while the action is going on.

Of course, this is not always productive of first-class photographs. The exposure is generally too short and the negatives thin. But he certainly does get all the action and dramatic quality there are in the scene, and, after all, that is more important from the advertising view-point than the photographic quality.

Two stills of "The Brand of Bars," a new release, are shown here. You can tell at a glance which one was taken during the acting of the scene and which one was posed for. And while the former shows motion and is very much underexposed, it gives a distinct impression of something doing. Further, it reproduces quite well in half-tone.

This snap-shot method ought to be employed in taking stills wherever it is practicable. But to get the best results a very rapid lens should be used.

A. G. Spencer

IN one respect A. G. Spencer, of Chicago, resembles the motion picture industry in a peculiarly strong manner. He is young enough to have his future before him. To be arithmetical, Spencer is only twenty-three years old and went to work in the mills of filmdom when both he and the films were in their infancy. Like a good many of the successful film men of today young Spencer went to school with the General Film and was connected with the Chicago branch of that organization for about two years. When the feature began to be strong enough to develop into a department of its own Mr. Spencer, who is endowed with the gift of discerning the signs of the times, took up features as his forte, and he claims the credit of being the first man who handled the really big features in Chicago. He organized the General Feature Film Company just about a year ago, and it has been a success from the start. His exchange covers the territory consisting of Illinois and Wisconsin. Both the name of Spencer and of the firm are well known to big and little exhibitors throughout that progressive and prosperous section of the country.

A. G. Spencer.

In appearance and manner young Mr. Spencer is modest and gentlemanly. In spite of his youth he has the keen and unerring judgment of an old film general. He is quiet but ambitious, has a strong grasp on affairs and cherishes many a great project for the future. He is a thorough believer in quality and knows how to look at things through the eyes of the exhibitor—not a common qualification for an exchange man.

"The Viper"

Heavy Villain's Work in Coming Kalem Two-Reeler Will Win Hisses from Sympathetic Spectators.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

OPENING smoothly with a convincing, easy flow of carefully produced and naturally acted business, this picture featuring Alice Joyce and Henry Millarde and carrying through to its close without places of marked slack interest, gives acceptable entertainment. It is an interesting, likeable picture that depends on its story rather than on austere character drawing or sterling humanity, but has in its mean, thorough-going, hissable villain a tower of strength when it is considered as an offering on the screen with a thousand spectators, more or less, seated before it.

In its early scenes, the heroine is deeply interested as a character—a petulant, spoiled, only daughter who will marry the weak and worthless but good-looking clerk of her father's office and who forces her father to give his consent to the wedding. But while it cannot be said that this girl is plot ridden, yet in the later parts of the story the really salient, sharp-edged traits of her character are dulled; she becomes almost a figure. Her father, played by Henry Hallam, is sharply drawn; but his place in the story is slight. Her father's partner, whom she at length marries after it has been reported that the villainous scamp is dead. is never anything but a figure. This man is the melodrama's hero. In the early scenes he spoils his "pull" with the average spectator by attempting to show his pain at being a refused lover conventionally; that is by putting into his face how very badly he feels. This is real life in weakness. Hero-lovers who weep or almost weep in full public in an office or parlor at being refused, are not attractive to healthy spectators. The picture's story by Mildred Mason was put on by Kenean Buel, and is clear and understandable all through.

Scene from "The Viper" (Kalem).

In a rich man's office there is a partner whom he would like his daughter to marry; but there is a handsome clerk whom she wants whether he be worth while or not, and she gets him. The fortunate, that is, fortunate in one sense, youth is now rich and riches turn his head. We don't see him any more in the office. He is out at the clubs playing for high stakes and is apt to come home drunk. The girl's father sees it all; he knew it was coming, but the youth is now his son-in-law. The girl didn't or wouldn't foresee it; but he's now her husband. They pay his debts. Things go from bad to worse and he is more in debt than ever. One night, while forcing the drawer of his father-in-law's desk to get some money, he is surprised by the butler, tries to hide and is mistaken for a burglar. The butler gets a pistol; there is a struggle and the butler is killed. The father at the other end of the telephone hears it, but protects the youth from the police. He escapes and very drunk goes to a gambling house, which is fired during a struggle of which he is the occasion, and he is reported in the papers as dead.

The girl's father is killed in an automobile accident and she marries the other man. The villain is taken from an open boat by a band of smugglers and treated kindly. The newly married couple are having their honeymoon on a yacht near the smuggler's lair. The youth tries to sell his new friends for money, but is found out. He is chased and takes refuge on the yacht. The band of roughs attack this but are repulsed. Here is a pretty kettle of fish; for the villain claims his wife. But just at this point a smuggler puts his arm through a port hole and shoots him dead.

"Captain Swift"

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE most striking feature of the Life Photo Film Corporation's latest offering, "Captain Swift," is the startling way in which it develops to situations that are sensational and gripping to a degree. It is this rather than speedy action that gives interest to the offering. Let us hasten to add that it is impossible to develop effectively startling situations without good, effective action, and that the picture has plenty of the latter. The worst that can be truthfully said of it is that it has some action, particularly in the last two reels, that is of minor interest and somewhat noticeably blocks the free flow of the story. Among its many fine characters are two (the butler and a peculiar youth, Harry, who didn't really get over strongly), who are more of hindrance than help. The entertainment value of the piece could be strengthened by eliminating as many of the scenes in which these two appear as possible. It is not because these two were poorly acted, but because the characters were weakly conceived by the writer of the scenario, who noticeably sticks to the text of the play for the stage especially in its last act. The director, Edgar Louis, deserves especial commendation for the smooth and natural way in which the action is presented wherever the script would permit. The story decidedly interests, as it is, and held the respectful attention of most of the audience.

Iva Shepard plays very acceptably the role of Mrs. Seabrook. In her young days she had trusted; her lover had been killed and she became a mother of a child whom her family had to hide. He was "put out" with a foster mother and runs away to Australia, becoming "Captain Swift," a hold-up man who makes a big haul and comes back to England. Fate introduces him into the home of his mother, who has married a man of wealth; she has a daughter and a son and there is a niece staying in the house with whom the son is in love. The butler of the family is the Captain's foster brother. He is a villainous character, a bit too melodramatically villainous to be an effective villain. He suspects that the captain is his foster brother and also suspects, we don't know how, that he is the notorious robber. He determines to betray him for money and also to get revenge on his mistress, the captain's mother, he being discharged when caught snooping. Mrs. Seabrook finds that the captain is in love with her daughter and knows that he is her son. A millionaire from Australia has, just before this, arrived and recognized the captain; but half admiring him is friendly. Then a detective comes and to him the evil butler gives enough information to make him want to make an arrest for the sake of a reward offered for the captain's capture. The development brings nearly everyone concerned, at the same time, to the rooms of the millionaire. There is some good stage counterplay between the different characters and, as a final, the detective shooting at the escaping captain kills the butler and the butler just at the same instant shooting kills the captain. Thus is the tangle unraveled.

Two New Melies Comedies

A Fresh and Distinctive Atmosphere Characterizes New Offerings Under the Melies Brand.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THOSE who have been watching pictures for the last four years or longer hark back with pleasure to many pictures of the Melies make, among which have been some like that veritable masterpiece of about four years ago, "Tony the Greaser." This picture was universally liked. It was produced by William Haddock for Melies and the leading woman's role was taken by Edith Story. It isn't a picture that can be forgotten. There were other excellent offerings; but there came a time when Melies releases were not quite up to that standard they had themselves set; and following this came the Melies trip around the world. Many of the pictures of this period deserved a wider popularity than they got. They were absolutely new (in large part), as well as entertaining and instructive. Some of them were over the heads of the gallery perhaps. Now we have these new offerings that promise well (assuredly one of them does), for the future. In both we find good acting and able stage craft, and in one there is a note of fresh humor in idea and situation that is quite refreshing.

"The $1,000 Pants."

There is an amusing situation in this picture and it has been worked up fairly well; but it is too slight to be a substantal laugh-getter. Nevertheless it has quality, for there is one character, an old Jew "cash-clo" man, who acts the comic role with vigor and is worth seeing. The fun in the plot springs out of the foolishness of a guy of a husband who makes a thousand dollars and hides it from his wife in a pocket of an old pair of trousers. Wifey hears "cash-clo" sung in the street and comes to the window to invite him in. After which she disposes, not without some bargaining, of the pants and the hidden thousand. Down the street a bit, the old clothes man meets a tramp sadly in need of repairs in that part of his apparel called by the old man "breeches," so he makes him a present of the $1,000 pants. Hubby discovers his loss and gets acquainted with the tramp on whom he recognizes the peculiar stripe that guards his treasure. His manoeuvers to get back the "dough" carry the two to a saloon, a restaurant and then to the beach. At length hubby does get the pants; but, alas, the roll is not in them. As a close we see Mr. Tramp counting the bills.

"A Circus Romance."

This is even a funnier comedy. There is more substance in its situations and more first-class acting in it. We count it a very entertaining and laughable picture. It was taken in a real traveling circus with the big tents, the crowd of country people caught without make-up, the well-acted bench of "freaks," and the paraphernalia. The story is of these freaks and of a tramp who is caught for a wild man. He had stolen a fine new suit before he discovered that it had belonged to a small-pox patient. The nearest wrap happens to be a leopard skin rug hung out on a line, and covered with this, his costume is complete to excite the rubes who catch him with pitch forks and bring him "home" to the circus, where he is taken on regularly as "the wild man" and falls in love with the bearded lady, thereby making the fat woman jealous. Extremely able and personable acting makes the incidents of this love affair go well. It is sure to please. The close of the picture shows us the second generation. The youngsters, girls and boys and baby, all are bearded.

"The Chimes," by Charles Dickens

Trotty Veck's Christmas Dream Played by Tom Terris and Company of Dickens Players Makes Desirable World Film Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

IT is the indescribable spirit of Dickens, especially in that lovable character, Trotty Veck, as played by Tom Terris, that makes this Christmas story by the most humanly lovable of story tellers an offering to warm the hearts of Dickens' lovers everywhere. There are some people, adherents of our modern hot-brained and cold-hearted realism, who dislike Dickens on account of his tenderness and sentiment, the very qualities that endear him to the majority. Those qualities are marked in this five-reel picture from the Blache studio and we commend it to exhibitors as an offering that will be generally liked. It is not a perfect production; but, except that this Christmas story was made in the summer season, the out-door backgrounds are well chosen while the sets and interiors show excellent stagecraft; they are very good. Then, as we have already noted, the heart of Dickens shines through these characters and that is the great thing after all. We can not recall a single instance of story, play or picture which protrayed this simple, homely human sentiment and fell short of a very decided success. There was that Edison picture, "Betty Climbs Upstairs;" that Vitagraph picture, "The Carpenter;" there was that play in which Forbes Robertson played, "The Passing of the Third Floor Back;" and many other pictures and plays and they all were decidedly popular. This is a better story than any of these.

Scene from "The Chimes" (World Film).

It is a mighty fine thing to see these old classic stories in pictures. It gives one a different idea of them. It is something like plucking the heart cut; we are not bothered by words—at once both loss and gain—and we see the different parts of the story more clearly in their relation to the whole. Take this picture, "The Chimes": it makes the object of Dickens clearer to us than the printed pages did. What a thoroughly human and heart satisfying story it is that Trotty Veck dreams on Christmas Eve when the chimes that he loved so well call him out and show him what life really is. The very fact that the philosophy of the tyrannous, selfish and hypocritical squire has fooled him for a while is in his favor, child-like, lovable old man that he is. He is a messenger boy and so poor that Meg (Fay Cusic), his daughter, brings him his dinner, a bowl of hot tripe and a hot potatoe, and eating it on the rich man's door step he thinks it a feast. But the rich man comes out, makes sport of his tripe and, learning that Meg is in love with Richard (Alfred Hemming), grows pompous and forbids their getting married. "The poor have no right to get married and bring children into the world." It seems wise counsel to Trotty until he has his dream and for a while he refuses his consent to the wedding.

The dream is a vindication of the poor man's right to live. In it, a mob, led by Fern (Clarence Harvey), wrests concessions from the rich and tyrannous squire. It is a regular Runnymede for the lower classes, to which the genius of Dickens gives a touch of grace, all his own, by bringing Trotty to do the bargaining. Trotty was not a part of the mob—Dickens keeps him clean of all that—but is captured by the servants of the squire and accused of working with them. He never denies it; and claims that he is not the squire's prisoner, but that the squire is his, and scares him into giving the poor the concessions.

It is a picture that grows on one as he watches it; he is apt to like it much better at the close of the third reel than he thought he was going to, and will like it better still at the close of the fourth and again at the close of the fifth. Times change and things that often are needed at one time are better left out at another. There is a short view of a man hanging; for modern spectators the picture would have gained by its absence. It is filled with things, bits of character drawing, situations and the like that draw sympathy to it strongly. Fern's little daughter (Milly Terris) is thoroughly charming and the part she has to play will engage the spectator's tenderest feelings. The dream comes to Trotty after he has given shelter to Fern and this child. And in the dream she has grown up to be Lillian (Vinnie Burns), who sells herself to the tyrant squire (Alfred Hemming) to have her father released from prison. Meg tries in vain to get her to leave the squire's house. Richard, Meg's lover, has gone to the dogs after being forbidden to marry her; but she goes to the tavern to get him to help her, and he, poor drink-fuddled Richard, is a weak reed to lean on. Then Lil is turned out of the rich man's house with her child and comes home to die, and Fern gets out of prison and hears of it all. Then comes the mob and the fine ending. There is not one of these characters who is not presented clearly and who fails to reflect in good measure the intention of the author. It is a good picture; one in which the faults are much out-weighed by the virtues.

Harry Linson

ALONG in years but modern in ideas, may truly be said of Harry Linson, the grand old man of the Edison Company. Mr. Linson first saw the light of day at Louisville, Ky., on August 26, 1839, just seventy-five years ago. He entered upon his vocation in life at the early age of ten, when he played the part of "Little Arthur," in "King John," at the old Bowery Theater, in New York City. Among the many plays with which he has been connected during his long career on the legitimate stage, may be mentioned "The Banker's Daughter," "Michael Strogoff," "The Gladiator" and "Under Southern Skies." At the outbreak of the Civil War, Mr. Linson joined the ranks and fought in many of the important battles. At Gettysburg he received a bullet wound in the abdomen, the mark of which he carries to this day. After the war, Mr. Linson returned to the stage and continued the work which had been interrupted by that glorious spirit to fight for his country. It was not because he was "done" as a legitimate actor that he quit the stage to join the Edison Company, five years ago, but because the same energy that made him shoulder the gun is still in him, and like any other "young feller," he wanted to try something new and make a big thing of it. Mr. Linson has appeared as magistrate, merchant, minister and military man in Edison films, and, in spite of his years, has the agility of his much younger coworkers.

Harry Linson.

He is a total abstainer, but uses tobacco in moderation. His regularity in eating, and his love for outdoor exercise have gained for him the state of robust health he now enjoys.

"NEW MANAGER" AT CLINTON, ILL.

J. C. Wilson, of Clinton, Ill., announces that a new manager for his house, the New Star, arrived on August 29 and took possession at once. He weighed nine and one-half pounds and is twenty-nine inches long. Mr. Wilson declares that he joins the happy father in wishing the continued success of the World. The compliment is returned many fold.

"The Long Way"

An Edison Three-Part Feature of Exceptionally Fine Treatment and Interpretation.

MARY IMLAY TAYLOR has written an interesting story in "The Long Way," and Brabin has handled it in masterly fashion. It has been said that he enjoys an advantage in having such a company of fine actors to draw upon, and this is very true, but this does not detract from the merit of his work. It may as well be said that they have an advantage in plays of opportunity, or that author and interpreter enjoys an advantage in having such a capable director. The business is composite, the artistic essentials being an interesting and well-constructed drama, a director able to grasp all that an author intends and visualize it with taste, and actors of marked intelligence in combination with personality that holds attention.

Scene from "The Long Way" (Edison).

While the component situations in "The Long Way" are traditional, it will not on that account be less enjoyable. The plot works through a triangle to a quadrangle and becomes a five-sided affair, a "pentagon." Eva Leven is loved by Belhaven, but throws him over for the sake of ambition and marries Astry. Meanwhile, Charter loves Rachel Leven and his love is reciprocated, but the modest officer cannot summon courage enough to make his declaration before he is called to service in the Philippines. He is there stricken with cholera and we are supposed to understand that communication between him and Rachel has been interrupted—I say "supposed," because it is not made clear that they cannot interchange letters. Rachel hears that he expects to wed some other woman on his return and accepts this hearsay as a fact.

What I should call an error is made at this point. Rachel is supposed to be a woman of fine motives and considerable intelligence. She must be aware that an army officer's silence may be due to many causes in active service and she should realize that idle gossip is less worth belief than a noble fellow's visible devotion. Rachel is shown as renouncing Charter and tearing his picture to pieces, even throwing them into a grate fire that is burning in midsummer. A woman may do this—I deny her no privilege—but such an act, apparently of no great importance, is apt to alienate sympathy. She could have been shown as bearing her trial without exhibition of resentment.

Mary Imlay Taylor may be realistic in showing woman to be without fortitude in one case, that of Rachel, and without principle in another, that of Eva, but it leaves the story bare of sympathetic interest for its womankind. Eva is not long married before she enters upon a dangerous intrigue with Belhaven. Her husband, Astry, discovers her in the arms of Belhaven, on a settee in his own garden. He does not kick Belhaven off his grounds, but listens while Eva declares that she was imploring her former suitor to marry Rachel, whom Eva says, he has compromised. A very interesting "pentagon" is now started.

Rachel must now marry Belhaven to save the unprincipled Eva. Eva's husband says he must or "I will kill you." Eva says that Rachel must, and Rachel consents to a deception involving her own future as well as that of Belhaven or there will be trouble. It is just like reading a novel by Ouida. We are perfectly aware that it is impossible, still, we are interested in the outcome. How is this tangle ever to be untangled? So fascinating are the types, so charming the scenes, that we do not care a rap whether it really and truly occurred or not. The worst part is the author has led us into a maze and cannot find her way out. She is between the unacceptable alternative of cutting her way out by force or leaving us to the mercy of conjecture.

Charter comes home and declares himself to Rachel. She shows him her wedding ring, but convinces him that she did not marry for love. "What then?" "To save Eva." Charter does not see the necessity of saving Eva or Belhaven either. The officer puts it up to Belhaven to give Rachel her freedom. She is much more conscientious about breaking marriage than she was about making it, and refuses to be a party to divorce. There is nothing left for poor Belhaven to do—he has meanwhile fallen in love with his wife—in order that Charter be enabled to marry Rachel but commit suicide. Belhaven, therefore, in a lofty and commendable spirit of self-sacrifice, walks down to the lake—there are a few ripples—he is no more. Having committed the unpardonable atrocity of loving a woman who threw him over for a man of wealth, and of loving the woman he married, Belhaven must die, but this leaves us in the air as to the interesting relation of Astry and faithless Eva. It is to be hoped that she reformed.

Scene from "The Long Way" (Edison).

Mr. Brabin has accomplished marvels in handling "The Long Way" and MacDermott, Conness, McRae, Mabel Trunnelle and Miriam Nesbitt have put their hearts and souls into their work, with results that count, so the play, despite its psychological incompetence, is a production of decided merit.

DIFFICULTIES OF CAMERAMEN IN EUROPE.

Some idea of the difficulties that the cameramen for the "Animated Weekly" in Europe, have to encounter, may be gleaned from the following excerpt from a recent letter from General Manager John Tippett of the Transatlantic Film Company to Jack Cohn, manager of the "Animated Weekly":

"When we tell you that our man was captured and hung up by the Belgian authorities, and had to stand for four or five hours with a bayonet stuck to the middle of his back, you can get some idea of the difficulty which has to be faced. The only way film can be got out of Belgium is to smuggle it, and you are liable to be caught by the military authorities at any time. However, we are expecting any minute that our man will arrive back from Belgium with some more film, as he promised to be here on Saturday last."

The Next Two Eclectic Offerings

"Black Roderick" and "The Pawn of Fortune" Provide Interesting Subjects.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

ONE expects variety among offerings so carefully chosen as are the Eclectic. This week the two special feature pictures added to their list are "The Pawn of Fortune," which is all kinds of a yarn in five reels by the Wharton Company's studio, and the other is "Black Roderick," a two-reel picture of the Highlands, taken in the land of Burns by the Big Ben Company of London.

"Black Roderick."

This two-reeler gets pleasing quality from its Scottish backgrounds, its adequate sets and its well informed, careful direction. The story (in which an old man wounded by a poacher and thought to be dead revives in time to bear witness against his assailant and so clear a youth whom the poacher, Black Roderick, had accused of the deed) is quite fresh in this presentation, though it has been used often enough. We have not had so many Scottish pictures that we have grown tired of them and this gives a sense of pleasing novelty. The acting is simple and with the costuming and the whole deportment of the players gives a sense of actuality to the incident that makes us think we are reading Scott. That scene where the magistrate conducts his inquiry, for example, seems to us like an illustration torn out of some one of the Waverly novels. The photography is simply perfect and the whole is a desirable offering.

"The Pawn of Fortune."

In this five-reel Wharton offering we find, in part of it, a touch of Ryder Haggard quality, and the rest is a high-class crook story with a new and interesting twist to it. It is just a yarn, meant to be diverting, but not attempting to hamper itself by a closer adherence to logic or even probability than is necessary to keep it pleasing. Its quality is a certain liveliness that keeps the attention engaged, and this has been attained by contrasting atmospheres with a liberal use of cut-backs which keep a sharp edge on all parts of the story, and also by careful attention to detail. One notices no padding to speak of. It is an especially well cut and joined picture. The hero is a mechanical genius. He is out of work; is captured by a gang of high class crooks and disposed of by being landed in Yucatan. The captive of the Mayas—these scenes are fine—he is loaded with gems as the victim to be offered to the Sun God and escapes in all the finery. Back in the United States, he finds his wife but not his child, a girl, whom the mother had lost while unconscious. She has been adopted by the chief crook and has inherited her father's genius which her foster father, keeping her innocent, uses to further his robberies. This is the new twist in the crook story. The gang is caught and a detective on the job unravels the mystery. We find in this picture a fault that is too common in offerings, and this is an emotionalism in a male part that really spoils for a time the effect desired. This story didn't need the hero's mourning in a womanish way for his daughter and when he hadn't seen her for eighteen years or since she was a year old. There are two places in which an added subtitle would aid substantially in keeping the characters of the story clear to the spectators. It is, on the whole, an interesting picture and a safe entertainer.

"The Dollar Mark"

Vigorous Action in Its Love Story Wins Enthusiastic Reception for Newest World Film Picture from George Broadhurst's Melodrama of Finance.

ROBERT WARWICK, as "Jim" Gresham, and Barbara Tenant, as Alice Chandler, do splendid work and win cordial praise from spectators of "The Dollar Mark," a five-part picture made for World Film Corporation by the Peerless Feature Company of New York City. The action opens in Cobalt (these scenes were taken there) and closes in the East—Newport and New York City. It is markedly a picture of vigorous action which rings true through nearly all of the picture surely, and suely every part of it holds the interest strongly. The best part of the story is the adventures of the two lovers in a flood. A terrible storm has driven the girl into the hut of miner "Jim," owner of the Nellie Davis mine, a property worth millions and which the Trust, of which Alice's father is one of the leading spirits, wants to get cheaply. The dam above the hut breaks, the water washes down the valley, and the hut goes with the rest of the primitive buildings. The hut's heavy door serves Jim and Alice as a raft. The stream washes them furiously along toward a terrible fall. Every inch of film during this episode holds as tight as a blacksmith's vice.

The trust fails to force Jim to sell his mine. It becomes a big success and Jim with his partner are in New York where, backed by the resources of the mine, they are doing a banking business. But the vindictive and wiley head of the trust has not given up hope of getting the "Nellie Davis." He puts his underlings at work to start a run on the bank and a strike at the mine and then uses Alice to lure, innocently, of course, Jim out to Newport. Jim gets word of how things are going and is for hurrying back to the city, but accepts an invitation to go on the yacht of a friend who, it happens, is under the thumb of the magnate. The plot is to keep him away from the city until it is too late. This he discovers and, after locking up the magnate, compells the captain to turn the yacht back to New York. Even then he would have been too late had not his partner hurried to Cobalt and persuaded the miners to go back to work. When the clearing house committee hears of this, enough money is given to Jim to weather the run on his bank, which is in perfect condition financally and so he and his partner come out on top. Alice has seen through the plot and comes to the office where there is the usual happy ending. Acting, photography and stage craft, all are commendable. It is a good offering of entertainment and a sure feature picture.

The Educational Picture

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S.T.B.

WITH the approach of fall and the opening of the schools, the educational picture seems to be taking on a new lease of life after its almost total disappearance since last spring. Several of the manufacturers have announced such pictures for their September programs and we give below some hints and suggestions with regard to some of them.

Vitagraph's "The Reward of Thrift."

This picture, to be released September 19th, was arranged in co-operation with the Savings Bank Section of the American Banker's Association, and points out not only very forcibly, but also very interestingly and entertainingly one of the hardest lessons both to teach and to learn, namely, the value and importance of thrift, the putting away something for a rainy day. The picture not only portarys some interesting and important phases of banking methods; but in a highly dramatic manner depicts the everyday life of men in dangerous occupations, the prevalent heedlessness of such workers to provide against accident and time of need for those dependent on them, and the wisdom of the man who by self-respect and thrift not only gains material benefits for himself and family, but also wins prosperity and the esteem of others for himself. It is a good picture to enlist the sympathies of all civil and social workers and business and commercial associations, etc., as well as of all schools and churches; and at the same time it is a highly entertaining dramatic exhibition. The music portrayals for the picture given in the "Vitagraph Life Portrayals" are exceptionally good.

Essanay's "The Way of His Father."

This picture, to be released September 15th, is an adaptation from a story in one of the Munsey Magazines, and is an excellent sermon on the rewards that come from obedience to the Fifth Commandment and the blessings entailed on fulfilling one's duty to one's parents. It is an excellent release to be called to the attention not only of schools and churches, but also to all clubs and associations of young men and young women.

Kalem Releases.

The Kalem two-reel, to be released September 30th, contains a four hundred foot educational that is both timely and very interesting, called "Food for the Dogs of War." It is a picture of the work done in one of the world's largest arms and ammunition factories and depicts vividly how shells are loaded, projectiles cast, arms and ammunition are tested, etc.

For lovers of the old drama, Kalem has produced photodramatizations of two of the famous old plays that our fathers went wild over. One of them is a re-issue of Samuel Lover's most famous and successful novel and play, "Rory O'More," which was one of the first of the Kalem pictures made in Ireland and was originally released September 4, 1911. An extended review of it will be found in the Moving Picture World, volume 9, page 445, and the synopsis 9:637.

The other reproduction is one of the Kalem Masterpiece Features and is a three-act photodramatization of Chanfrau's famous drama "Kit, the Arkansaw Traveler," which in turn was a drama based on a much older and famous popular air of the early part of the last century. A special review will be found in the current volume (21) of the Moving Picture World, page 1075.

Edison Releases.

Edison educationals have always been noted for their excellence and value and comment other than descriptive almost borders on fulsome praise. Their September releases of this character are no exception to the rule. This month there are the records of two historical events, and a "safety-first" drama.

New York Police Department Carnival.—This picture, released September 1st, is a record of the carnival held at Brighton Beach race track, June 26 and 27, 1914. Among its noteworthy features should be mentioned the drills of the honor legion and of the mounted squadron, the exhibition by police dogs, the close views of celebrities attending, the various kinds of policemen shown, mounted, on foot, motorcycle, automobile, bicycle, and finally the latest and most novel addition, the aero-policeman.

Generals of the Future.—This picture, to be released September 14th, is a record of graduation week, 1914, at the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., and picturizes the many interesting events then taking place. Coming out now, it is not only extremely interesting, but also opportune.

Making a Convert.—This "safety-first" picture, to be released September 15th, was produced in co-operation with the Public Service Railway Company of New Jersey and the script was written by E. W. Sargent. It is a strong dramatic story that not only entertains and pleases, but it brings home in a most emphatic manner the sorely needed lesson that most of our street accidents are the fault of the carelessness that seems to be ingrained in the nature of the American traveling public.

George Larkin

GEORGE LARKIN, the handsome leading man of the Universal Gold Seal brand, who is at present playing the part of Alan Law, the hero in "The Trey o' Hearts" series, under the direction of Wilfred Lucas, is rapidly rising to the higher ranks and ere long another popular matinee idol will smile out to the thousands who are already eagerly watching for new installments of this wonerful series which was written by Louis Joseph Vance, the famous author. Quite modest, and with a world of personality, combined with his athletic experience and a physique that defies, Larkin is well fitted to play the important part that he has been cast in.

George Larkin.

This promising young screen star was born in little old New York during the late fall, and he is a sturdy specimen of the east. Back in the years when he was a boy, George was one of the leaders in his set, always doing athletic stunts of daring which in many cases were never followed by his companions. Later he earned for himself the name of "Dare Devil Larkin," and since that time the appropriate name has always closely followed him in his travels and adventures. Larkin first appeared before the people in vaudeville during the latter part of 1900, and after that he was seen both in specialty work and stock. Seven years later the Edison company recruited him in their eastern studio and he remained there for three years, going to the Pathe firm in 1910. Later, and in 1912, the Eclair claimed this daring young actor whose many stunts could not be duplicated, and for a year he worked in big parts for this company, being featured in "The Wager" and "A Choice by Accident." In Pathe films Larkin was seen in "The Cheyenne Brave" and "Under Both Flags."

In 1913 Larkin came west with the Pathe Outfit and played some good parts here, later joining the Kalem at Santa Monica, where he was seen in some funny comedies with Johnnie Brennan. He received quite a write-up in a local paper when he rescued Ruth Roland who had jumped from the pier into the sea. His great athletic ability, and wonderful physique have allowed him to perform as no other man his size seems able to. When the Kalem closed shop George waited around in Los Angeles awhile and then joined the Universal after having a talk with Isadore Bernstein, and now he is proving his worth, much to the satisfaction of the general manager, who is quite interested in the young ctor.

Larkin is a thorough gentleman, and in addition, has a bearing and greeting which is hard to resist without a smile. When once he takes your hand and smiles into your eyes with his deep brown ones, you are his friend, and he is yours, and that is George Larkin.

"Richelieu"

Bison 101 Company Stages an Entertaining Four-Reel Version of Famous Old Play.

Reviewed by Robert C. McElravy.

THIS finely photographed four-reel production of "Richelieu," besides being good entertainment, has a pleasing historical interest. One should be pretty well up on the life of Richelieu to get the most out of this. Familiarity with both French history and the influence of the crafty old cardinal upon his era are necessary for a full understanding of the story, but the ordinary observer will get much out of it as well.

Scene from "Richelieu" (Bison—101).

A strong cast was assembled for presenting this drama. Murdock MacQuarrie gives a fine characterization of Richelieu, though it scarcely ranks with his recent notable portrayal of Francois Villon, the vagabond poet. Villon is active, young and full of spirits, Richelieu is a doddering old man, alive only to his scheming brain. It is more difficult to get the full force of a quiet characterization on the screen, but before this picture is concluded the cardinal does some memorable work and the story interest proves satisfactory.

Scene from "Richelieu" (Bison—101).

The drama is one of court intrigue and replete with good situations. In the first reel the king is seen paying his unwelcome attentions to Julie, the cardinal's ward. The girl loves De Mauprat, who has been sent on army service to Spain because he seized a French town without his leader's orders. When De Mauprat returns he has covered himself with glory by his work as a soldier. Beradas, who also loves Julie, works up a conspiracy against both king and cardinal, planning to kill the latter and dethrone Louis. De Mauprat, whom the cardinal dislikes, is drawn into this.

Richelieu gets wind of the conspiracy and orders De Mauprat executed. But Julie makes a successful plea for his life and they are allowed to wed. The king again pursues Julie, but the young wife appeals to the queen, who saves her temporarily.

De Mauprat's ear is poisoned a second time by the conspirator, who lead him to believe the cardinal has tricked him. Once more De Mauprat vows to kill the high church dignitary. In the final reel comes a series of absorbing scenes, with occasional bits from the sonorous text of the original drama used as sub-titles. One of these is the familiar: "Beneath the rule of men entirely great, the pen is mightier than the sword." Another, the dramatic threat to launch "the curse of Rome" upon the head of the cringing king.

The conspirators are outwitted by the sharp old cardinal and the lovers reunited.

The costuming is pleasing throughout this production, the photography exceptionally smooth and inviting, and the choice of settings admirable. The production was staged under the direction of Allan Dwan.

Pauline Bush appears as Julie, William C. Dowlin as De Mauprat, Lon Chaney as Baradas, Edna Maison as Marion and James Neil and Edith Chapman as the king and queen.

William W. Wing

ACCORDING to the eminent producer, David Griffith: "One of the brainest and cleverest chaps in the photoplay business" is William W. Wing, now associated with the California staff of the Selig Polyscope Company. This writer, who has had a quarter of a century's experience in newspaper work, began writing for the screen three years ago for the Biograph—at first comedies and then allegories and melodramas. In this capacity he furnished them with upwards of a hundred scripts, and then took similar service with the Vitagraph.

Film fans will recall "By Man's Law," "Death's Marathon," "Olafan Atom," "The Power That Rules," "Patio Days," "Una of the Sierras?" "Omens of the Mesa"—with such film favorites as Mary Pickford, Henry Wathall, Mary Charleson, Ann Schaffer, Mary Oakley, Arthur Johnson, Dorothy Gish, Clair McDowell, Kate Bruce, Lionel Barrymore and others associated with these plays. This does not take account of his remarkable activities in comedy with Mack Sennett and a lot of other fun makers—that made real fun without a slapstick.

William W. Wing.

After Colin Campbell put on his first story with the Selig Company Wing felt a fresh inspiration to do higher class work, "Hope," "Phantoms," "When a Woman's Forty," "Reporter Jimmie Intervenes" and others of this sort were conjured in quick succession. "The Heart of Maggie Malone," "The Fire Jugglers," "The Mistress of His House," showed another angle of his genius; while comedy again began to ooze from his unctuous pen in "The Red Head" series, "King Baby's Birthday" and "Mike, the Avenger."

Wings' reputation for theme, strength and beauty of story is as strongly established as any other writer in the field of photoplay—while his versatility is remarkable. His Kinemacolor production, "As the Candle Burned," was for some time regarded as the model of what a truly good picture play should be, minus long announcements, involved complications, "stalling" in shaking hands and pother about nothing, that seems to possess so many who leap from the printed page to the flying film without calculating the change.

Happily this writer has the natural gift for this business. He frankly declares that he has no rules, that other writers might study with safety. He humorously hints that they might follow Bill Nye's advice: "by studying my methods—and then doing differently." Quality and superior workmanship characterize his work; but they are created through a power that cannot be imparted to others by rules and regulations. Wing says: "I write from character most of the time, but the critics do not recognize the fact of much of the themes. It is a matter of regret that melodramas founded upon mere criminal instances seem to please them better than lofty themes."

The study of scenario by William W. Wing—for they are worthy of close inspection—should aid an ambitious writer; but they must bear in mind that the underlying creative crux is not to be reproduced through any set of forms or figures.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

TO MEET IN MILWAUKEE.

Charles H. Phillips, as Executive Committeeman, Asks Wisconsin Exhibitors to Meet in Convention September 15.

The following letter has been addressed to all exhibitors of the State of Wisconsin by Charles H. Phillips, member of the Executive Committee of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America:

Milwaukee, Wis., Sept. 6, 1914.

Dear Exhibitor: You no doubt know that the International Motion Picture Association and the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America effected an amalgamation of the two organizations at the convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, held at Dayton, Ohio.

The undersigned, who is the president of the International Motion Picture Association, has been appointed on the Executive Board of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and as such member respectively calls your attention to the necessity of forming a strong organization in the State of Wisconsin for the purpose of preparing to fight proposed legislation which will be introduced in our next Legislature.

We have been informed that the bills which will be introduced are already being drawn by the Reference Librarian at Madison. The bills with which we are likely to be confronted are those relating to state license, state building code, censorship, and last, but not least, a law empowering the fire marshal to inspect theatres.

Milwaukee would not be affected by any of these bills, with a possible exception of the censorship bill, which may increase the cost of service.

The Motion Picture Association of Milwaukee feels it its duty to fellow exhibitors to prevent any legislation adverse to the interests of the moving picture industry in the State of Wisconsin, and to that end invites a solid organization that can go before the Legislature and present its claims.

We have therefore decided to hold a convention at the city of Milwaukee on Tuesday, September 15th, beginning at 9 o'clock in the morning, the meeting to be called at the Plankinton House Club Rooms. This is State Fair Week and you should find an opportunity to attend both the convention and the State Fair. Arrangements have been made to entertain all of the exhibitors at a luncheon at 1 o'clock p. m.

If it is impossible for you to attend the convention and assist us in electing competent and efficient officers to represent the Wisconsin exhibitors, we respectfully ask you to show that you are a live exhibitor and not one who depends upon others to protect his interests, by sending to Mr. George Fischer, Temporary Treasurer, in care of the Alhambra Theatre, Milwaukee, the sum of $6, which includes your initiation fee and dues for one year. This amounts to but 50 cents per month, with which you will protect your interests against unfair legislation in the State of Wisconsin.

Respectfully yours,
CHARLES H. PHILLIPS.

P. S.—Kindly notify us whether you will be present so that we can make arrangements for the luncheon.

BIG MEETING IN OHIO.

The motion picture exhibitors of the state of Ohio will celebrate their fifth anniversary in Columbus, Ohio, at the Southern Hotel, in the historical hall, on September 15 and 16. A big banquet will be served, and a general good time with other entertainments will be given on the night of Tuesday, September 15, beginning at 8 o'clock. Governor James M. Cox will positively be present and address the banquet. Chief Building Inspector T. P. Kearns, National President Marion S. Pearce, and several distinguished exhibitors will also address the banquet.

The meeting will open at 2 p. m., Tuesday afternoon. An address of welcome will be delivered by Mayor George Karb of Columbus. On Thursday morning, September 3, President M. A. Neff sent out from League headquarters, 1003 Mercantile Library Building, 686 letters. On Saturday morning in the first mail he received 126 replies from members, stating that they would be present. This quick response is evidence of the large gathering that will be at Columbus, and the anniversary, hail good fellow, well met, will be the largest gathering of exhibitors in the history of the League.

Those who have attended the Ohio State Conventions all fully understand that when the Ohio State League calls a convention, the boys all enthusiastically respond, and accomplish something, and stick together. Ohio is noted for its unity of action. At the last convention held in Cincinnati, seventeen resolutions were offered. Sixteen of them were passed unanimously, and there was a debate only upon one. After discussion, with a slight amendment, it was unanimously passed. The organization in Ohio does team work. In other words, they have confidence in the ability and integrity of their officers.

The exhibitors will meet in the same hall where the eleven original exhibitors met when the League was organized. Ohio will make history on the 15 and 16. A cordial invitation is extended to every member of the League, not only in Ohio, but throughout the entire country to join with Ohio in celebrating the 5th anniversary of the League.

WILL MEET IN SAN FRANCISCO.

The convention of the California State League, formerly announced to be held early in October at Sacramento, will be held in San Francisco instead. The exact date has not been given to the Moving Picture World.

NEFF SUGGESTS ARTICLES FOR TAXATION.

Sufficient reasons to cause the government to hesitate in its plan to impose a tax upon motion-picture admission tickets, as well as those to other amusements, and some suggestions for subjects of taxation regarded as more appropriate, were advanced by M. A. Neff, of the Ohio Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, in a telegram which he sent to Secretary of State Bryan last week on behalf of the organization. The message in full was as follows: "I beg to submit the following for special taxation: Cigarettes, diamonds, dogs, automobiles, cattle when slaughtered, $1 a head; hogs and sheep, 50 cents per head—packers to pay tax; all slot machines. Owners of dogs, diamonds and automobiles should be willing. In behalf of the motion picture shows I wish to forcibly protest against taxing them. Many losing money. If taxed will be forced to raise price of admission from 5 to 10 cents. The picture show is the poor man's education and amusement. Our party cannot afford to levy a tax on picture shows."

Foreign Trade Notes

PARIS LETTER.

Paris, August 24, 1914.

THERE is no getting away from the fact that the French moving picture industry has been very seriously affected by the war. Many studios and film works around Paris have been requisitioned by the military authorities. At Pathe Freres huge place at Vincennes there are 1,600 soldiers—many of them Pathe's own workmen. Messrs. Pathe Freres, in common with other firms, have temporarily lost practically all their best cameramen as well as hundreds of artistes, including Henri Kraus, who played Jean Valjean in "Les Miserables." The company's ten branches in Germany are all closed. The principals of the subsidiary corporation, Der Firma Pathe Freres, fled from Berlin, but arrived in the French capital without great difficulty. Charles Pathe assured me that he had sufficient negatives in stock to guarantee regular weekly releases for the next six months. "We shall continue to supply our customers throughout the world," he said, "and the taking of photoplays and topical pictures will not be stopped.

Elge City, headquarters of the Gaumont Company, has not been invaded by French soldiers. Leon Gaumont is striving hard to carry on business as usual. He has had no news concerning his seven or eight branch offices in Germany, but his Berlin manager has returned to Paris and is in charge of the topical department.

Messrs. Jourjon and Vandal, of the Eclair Company, are fighting for their country. Jourjon is an officer in the 113th Regiment and Vandal is also an officer in the 156th Regiment. The company has placed the greater part of its extensive premises in the Rue Gaillon at the disposal of the Red Cross. The Eclair Journal continues to be published.

Louis Aubert, the renter, and every man in his employ is under the colors. The firm will probably be closed down until hostilities are over. The war has come as a cruel blow to Aubert who, starting at the bottom rung of the ladder, has gradually mounted to the very top. He was building a magnificent theater on the boulevard and his new offices in the Avenue de la Republique were only opened about a month ago.

* * *

A strict censorship has been established. Every showman must now submit to the authorities a list of the films, with correct titles, that he proposes to screen. Many topical films have already been banned.

Some of the Boulevard movies have returned almost to the primitive stages of cinematography. Old picture plays are being screened while many of the so-called topical films are obviously the work of amateurs. Nightly the public's intelligence is insulted by the exhibition of fake topical films. I saw one film last night entitled "British Troops in Belgium." It showed British soldiers right enough, but the appearance of four typical little English boys instantly shattered the illusion.

John Calvin, the American amusement caterer, is here. He has organized a service of boats to carry stranded Americans from Paris to Havre.

* * *

The scarcity of French topical pictures has forced the news film people to insert quantities of American topicals.

Though the competition of theaters and music halls has been eliminated, attendance at the movies now open are falling off.

I understand that the manufacturers have agreed not to release any new subjects until the end of the war. All branches of the trade here have decided to co-operate in order to keep the trade in a position as near the normal as possible.

* * *

Even now it would seem that German commerce has not been entirely killed in Paris. At a movie in the Boulevard St. Michel a picture entitled "The Pluck of a Frenchwoman" is being screened with tremendous success. There is little doubt, however, that the enthusiastic spectators are ignorant of the fact that the film was produced by the Messeter Co., in Berlin, and the heroic "Frenchwoman" is no other than Fraulein Henny Porten.

William N. Selig did a gallant action last Sunday. At six o'clock in the morning he went to the Nord station with the intention of going to England. The train was packed, but Mr. Selig had reserved a carriage. About five minutes before the train was due to start a poor woman with four children came rushing up the platform. Selig, observing her sorrow at not being able to find a place, immediately gave up his carriage and remained in Paris.

Felix Isman spends most of his time assisting stranded Americans. He has spent a small fortune in cabling on behalf of his unfortunate fellow countrymen and he has succeeded in sending many of them back to the States.

Charles Pathe is essentially a practical man. Rising from a country travelling showman to president of the great firm of Pathe Freres, he knows the ropes of the picture trade from A to Z. As stated in my previous despatches, Pathe Freres' best camera men are now fighting at the front. Notwithstanding this, Charles Pathe decided that at all costs the famous Pathe Gazette should not cease publication. Necessarily, a number of amateur photographers were engaged and sent out to do the best they could. With few exceptions the efforts of these tyros have been far from satisfactory.

A few days ago the intelligence department of the firm heard that there was a chance of getting pictures of extreme interest to the public. The question was raised at Vincennes as to who could be relied upon to do the work thoroughly and economically. After the previous accomplishments of the newly-enlisted staff of photographers had been reviewed it was decided that it would be unwise to entrust the commission to any one of them. What was to be done? The picture had to be obtained, but who was to take it?

Charles Pathe pondered over the gloomy problem for about five minutes before finding the solution. Then he phoned down to the camera department and a few seconds later could have been seen leaving his sumptuous office with a big camera slung over his shoulder. His fast automobile rushed him to the scene of action just in time to permit the setting up and focusing of the apparatus. The event duly took place and Charles Pathe thoroughly enjoying the work turned the handle with fine skill.

His scoop, however, was nearly spoiled by the appearance of a couple of police officers who, taking him for a spy were about to arrest him and seize the camera and film. Pathe, however, soon explained matters, and on discovering the identity of their "prisoner" the officers cleared a passage for his auto, enabling him to regain Vincennes without further delay. The result was a perfect picture. Charles Pathe will probably be his own chief camera man for some time to come.

EXHIBITORS WARNED AGAINST USING KLEINE'S WAR PAPER.

The attractive lithographs issued in connection with George Kleine's war film, "European Armies in Action," has tempted many exhibitors to the unscrupulous use of such paper in connection with other alleged war film. Such practice is not only reprehensible in a moral sense, but highly dangerous. Exhibitors are warned against using the Kleine name and paper in the exploitation of any but Kleine film.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

A WRITER in a recent number of a publication dwelling upon matters pertaining to the motion picture business devotes some space to the subject of "extras." Among other things he says: "The professional extra covers the men and women who have had experience on the stage as a rule, or have acted in pictures for some length of time, or are those who have grown old in the acting game and who have, for various reasons, lost all ambition, but who can do nothing else."

Every professional now doing extra work has a reason for the choice, and that reason cannot be charged to lack of ambition. None who has been acquainted with, or paid attention to the theatrical profession, can say that any member of it ever grew so old as to lose his professional ambition. The greatest players achieved their greatest success after years of struggle.

* * *

In view of the position taken by the writer referred to a question arises as to what is an "extra." Ordinarily it means a person selected to fill a part when the regular company does not contain a suitable person. Under this definition some of the greatest players of the day may be termed "extras," and surely there are scores of such who cannot be charged with lack of ambition.

* * *

In the motion picture field there are two classes of players —stock and extra. To the uninitiated the latter seem to be nothing more than "supers," yet many extras are capable of, and have done, better work than many in the stock. Some of the leading photoplayers have started as extras. Some of the extras of today represent the flower of the regular stage.

The writer knows of at least two persons who came to this country with Sara Bernhardt, and had important parts in her productions, who are today working as extras for the "movies"; a lady of undoubted talent, who supported some of the best leading actresses of this country, is working as an extra. A man who was a headliner for years and commanded a big salary is now doing what he calls "jobbing." In all these cases the ambition remains the same, but the opportunity is lacking.

No one will say that the stars of a year or two ago went into the "movies" because their ambition was on the wane.

Now that the extra has been treated as it has by the writer referred to it becomes necessary to say that extras are not all alike. Most of them are supers—plain, old-time supers. Many directors find in the army of extra people of peculiar type and talent they cannot find in stock. The term "extra" is too frequently and mistakenly confounded with "the mob."

But a short time ago the writer saw playing with one of the best known comedians in a photoplay an extra who, up to that time, might be classified as one of the lazy, super type. The extra displayed so much judiciously exerted ambition that he really over-shadowed the star. Upon the conclusion of his work the star and all who witnessed the work extended congratulations of a most hearty character. The extra then confessed that he had been upon the professional stage, but had never been given an opportunity to display his talent.

The writer who criticises the extras says he knew "a knot of these boys who are all about the same build and who interchange their clothes and live on each other's earnings." Chicago is noted for many things that are of the distinctive "Chi" character, but you cannot find in the East a similar knot of boys.

But one case resembling the one referred to by the Chicago writer has come to our notice. One day two young men made a bargain that whatever they earned should be divided between them. If one worked and the other remained idle the fortunate one was to share with the other. One of them received an assignment for five dollars. The other rested upon his oars and was consoled in the thought that he would get $2.50 whether he worked or not. Almost towards the close of the day the latter was booked for a ten-dollar job and the screams of joy from the five-dollar man could be heard for blocks. He was getting $7.50 for $5 worth of work.

The magazine writer has the right dope when he says "They know everybody's business and discuss life in the studios downtown, and they always seem to know more about what is going to happen than anyone else." That is an indisputable fact, with the modification that it applies chiefly to the cheaper extras, or supers. They are, as a rule, young men and women who frequent cabarets and cheap dance halls and saloons. Quite frequently they tell those they chance to meet in such places that they are stock members. The object and results are obvious. But the real extra never indulges in that kind of false pretense. Pick out the extra that does it and you may readily locate the cheapest kind of super.

It is opportune to state here that sixty per cent. of frequenters of cheap resorts try to build up prestige by claiming to be players, or otherwise prominently connected with some moving picture company. Young men resort to it with a view to attracting attention of young women, and young women do it through a craving for prominence in their sphere.

This recalls to mind a case which, unfortunately, the parties interested cannot see their way clear to place in the hands of the District Attorney. A young woman of indisputable character was brought in contact with a man who conducts a theatrical agency in the White Light district. She was "movie struck," and felt that she must appear in pictures. The meeting with the agent seemed to open the gate and when told that the agent had an interest in one of the most prominent companies of this city the joy and anticipations of the young woman overwhelmed her. But fortunately the intended victim retained self-possession enough to reject the condition upon which her connection with the company was to be consummated. Shortly after, through other sources the girl became connected with the company, and it was not until then that she learned the agent whose proposals she had rejected was not only not connected with the company, but was entirely unknown by its officers. The indignation aroused by the young woman's story has put certain official departments on the alert and it would not be surprising if the agent referred to and others of his stripe should fall into a trap in the near future.

Score another point for the good that can be accomplished through the motion picture houses in behalf of the people. A prominent resident of Brooklyn who claims to be acting in co-operation with Borough President Pounds of that borough is making a circuit of all the picture houses of Greater New York and delivering lectures to the people on how to combat the high cost of living. He tells his audiences to write to President Pounds and he will forward to them printed blanks which will enable them to deal direct with manufacturers for anything they may require. The lecturer stated that he induced his daughter to adopt the plan with the result that she went to a manufacturer of hats and returned home with two hats she had purchased at a price she would have been obliged ordinarily to pay for one. Somebody in the audience remarked that people could not eat hats, to which the lecturer replied that the plan applied to everything and blanks could be secured at the box office of the house in which the lecturer was speaking. This lecture took place in Feltman's picture house, on Flatbush avenue, Brooklyn, one night during the past week.

ATLANTA HAS NEW HOUSE.

The newest and handsomest picture theater in Atlanta, Ga., was opened August 31. It is called the Strand and seats eight hundred persons. Among the features are a forced draught cooling system and a nine piece orchestra. The first program included the Eclectic feature "The Boundary Rider." Mutual service is used in connection with Eclectic features. Of the latter "The Stain" and "The Last Volunteer" are booked. Gatrell Holsbeck is manager.

MEADOWS LEAVES COLONIAL.

F. Meadows, until recently sales manager of the Colonial Film Company, has left that concern and will engage in a new advertising proposition in connection with motion pictures. Mr. Meadows is said to have a plan for the distribution of ad-film productions which will overcome the difficulties now experienced in getting pictures of that character before the public.

Terrible Slaughter on the East Side

War's Awful Carnage Depicted in All Its Terrors in Posters and Banners.

Lawrence Marston, motion-picture director and veteran stage manager, took a walk through 14th street and the lower East Side this week. Startled by the lurid lithographs decorating the fronts of the moving picture theaters which he passed, Mr. Marston took out his trusty stylus and papyrus and made permanent record of the titles of the following sanguinary war photoplays which greeted his eye:

"War Is Hell," showing "burning war balloons and the last desperate stand of a fallen aviator;" "With Serb and Austrian;" "The Battle of Waterloo;" "The Battling British;" "The Tyranny of the Mad Czar;" "The War of Wars, or the Franco-German Invasion of 1914,—the kickiest two-hour show ever,—an enternal masterpiece of tremendous magnitude;" 'The Last Volunteer," "so real you can see the damage of the bullets;" "Faithful Unto Death," advertised to contain "scenes showing actual engagements, bursting bombs, blown-up bridges, severed telegraph wires and sparing none of the horrors of war."

Walking further, but not much further, Mr. Marston jotted down the titles of the following other thrillers: "Ambushed;" "A Born Warrior;" "The Kaiser's Challenge;" "The Great War of Europe;" "Napoleon," "the warfare of one man against the whole of Europe comparable with the present situation of the German Emperor;" "European Armies in Action, showing an entire army crossing a chasm thirty feet wide" and cannon in the making, "awe-inspiring, death-dealing monsters."

"Up in the Bronx in the foreign colonies," declares Mr. Marston, "I was startled by posters advertising an English film company's thriller, 'The Terror of the Air,' depicting the dangers which London fears from German Zeppelins; by an Italian film, 'The Next in Command;' a German release, 'Kaiser Wilhelm II;' 'Northern Lights,' a film in which a coward was billed to duly redeem himself on the battlefield; 'The Envoy Extraordinary, or The World War;' 'The Three Allies;' 'Germania;' 'England's Menace;' 'The Warfare in the Skies;' 'Under Fire in Mexico;' 'The Battle of Shiloh;' 'Dan,' an American civil war drama; 'The Dishonored Medal,' 'featuring the death-dealing European conflict at close range;' 'The War of the Powers;' 'The Man o' War's Man;' 'Private Denis Hogan;' 'The Birth of the Star-Spangled Banner;' and 'Across the Border,' a Mexican war feature which was followed on the program by 'The Battle of Torreon and The Life of Villa.'

"In the Yorkville section," continued Mr. Marston, "I had my feelings ravaged by the following: 'The Old Army Coat;' 'Buffalo Bill's Indian Wars;' 'The Foreign Spies;' 'All Love Excelling,' showing the 'undying devotion of a woman which carries her through the Crimean war;' 'The Boer War;' 'Shannon of the Sixth;' 'Wolfe, or The Conquest of Quebec;' 'Francis Marion, the Swamp Fox,' a tale of Revolutionary days; a picturization of the battle of Fontenoy entitled, "A Celebrated Case,' and 'Captain Alvarez,' a drama of the Mexican revolution.

"I am a peace-loving man," declared Mr. Marston, "and when I came to a house on 125th street which featured two peace-propaganda films, 'Lay Down Your Arms.' and 'The Curse of War,' I willingly paid my dime and stayed to the end of the show."

PICTURE PLAYHOUSE FILM COMPANY OPENS CHICAGO OFFICE.

The Picture Playhouse Film Company has opened a new office at 5 South Wabash avenue, Chicago, under the management of S. C. Bestar, who has had a long experience in the field and is well known to Chicago exhibitors.

The Star Theater, the exclusive feature house in Madison street, has booked first run on all the Picture Playhouse's feature releases, past and future. A number of the other houses have booked, following the lead of the Star, and the outlook for big business looks good.

The Picture Playhouse has now five exchanges open and several under negotiation, and all are reporting increasing business.

CHICAGO CENSORS REJECTS "THE CHIMNEY SWEEP."

"The Chimney Sweep," a five-reel production released by The Picture Playhouse Film Company, was passed by the National Board of Censors in New York, and passed in Pennsylvania and Montreal. It has been playing to good houses in Philadelphia, New York, Montreal and other cities, but when the Chicago Board reviewed it they flatly refused it, claiming no reference must be shown on a screen to an illegitimate child, and the entire play must be revised.

Rose Elizabeth Tapley

ROSE ELIZABETH TAPLEY, of the Vitagraph Players, was born in Petersburg, Va., June 30, 1883. Her father was Moses Bartlett Tapley, of Amesburg, Mass., a direct descendant of Josiah Bartlett, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. Miss Tapley is a cousin of Capt. Robert Bartlett, Commander of the S.S. Roosevelt, used on the Peary North Pole expedition, and the S.S. Karluk, now lost in the Arctic Ocean. All of Miss Tapley's relatives on her father's side for the past several generations, have been seafaring men, her grandfather's generation including nine sailing masters or captains, all brothers, and seven of these nine brothers owned the vessels which they commanded. Her mother was Elizabeth Stagg Riker, who was a granddaughter of Abram Polhemus, one of the founders of the old Dutch Reformed Church in New York City and a merchant marine prince in his time. Miss Tapley's mother was the first in her entire family in many generations, to marry outside an old Holland-Dutch family—which ancestry is believed to account for much of Miss Tapley's pertinacity.

Rose E. Tapley.

Miss Tapley was educated in the public schools in Malden, Mass., after which she attended High School in the same city. Afterwards, for a short time, she attended the Boston University.

When about ten years old, Miss Tapley was well known locally as a professional elocutionist. Her first theatrical engagement was in 1900 with Myron B. Rice's company as Bernice in "My Friend from India." During that season she played every other woman's part in the same play. Subsequent engagements were with Richard Mansfield in "The First Violin," in which she played Anna Sartoris. She also supported Mr. Mansfield in "Beau Brummel," Monsieur Beaucaire," "A Parisian Romance." Later she was with Weeden Grossmith at the Princess theater, in New York City during the run of "The Night of the Party," Miss Tapley being the only American in this typical English company. She was also associated with J. H. Stoddard in "The Bonny Brier Bush," and with Chauncey Olcott. Robert Edeson, "Sign of the Cross," "The Lion and the Mouse," "Seven Days" and many prominent stock companies.

More than ten years ago Miss Tapley, who refused to remain idle during the forced summer vacations in her theatrical career, did her first picture work with the Biograph Company. She was associated with the Edison Company on different occasions. Her first two years of the several she has been with the Vitagraph Company were broken into by her being compelled to fulfill her theatrical contracts which had two winters to run after she first associated with the Vitagraph. When she had filled these theatrical engagements she became permanently associated with the Vitagraph organization and has remained with them continuously ever since.

Miss Tapley has written many scenarios for motion pictures and while with Richard Mansfield won a valuable prize which that eminent actor offered to the members of his company for the best scenario submitted to him for a play.

Miss Tapley has played in a great many pictures, some of her successes being in "The Way of the Cross," "Vanity Fair," "The Money Kings," "Out of the Shadows," "The Lady and the Glove," "War," "His Wife's Secret," "Memories that Haunt," "He Never Knew," "The Diver," and "The Shadows of the Past." Two of her famous parts were Gretchen in "Rip Van Winkle" and as Queen Victoria of England, in "The Victorian Cross."

Miss Tapley married Frank E. Holaban, in Watervliet, N. Y., on March 20, 1906. She has one daughter, Rosemary, born Jan. 18, 1907.

Moving Picture Educator

Conducted by the REV. W. H. JACKSON

THE CHURCH, THE PEOPLE AND THE PICTURES.

AT a recent "Country Life Conference of Maryland Ministers" held in connection with the Maryland Agricultural College, Congressman Linthicum made an address which contained a great deal of good advice relative to the position of the church when dealing with the social life of the people. He expressed the belief that the churches should be places of social entertainment during the week days, and that the coming of the moving pictures had brought an opportunity most peculiarly fitting for the combining of the social and instructive functions for which the church stands as ministering to the material as well as the spiritual welfare of the people. The Riverdale (Maryland) Sentinel, of which Henry A. Johnson, formerly Washington, D. C., correspondent of the Moving Picture World, is moving picture editor, sends us this interesting account which we trust many exhibitors will be able to show to the ministers in their neighborhood:

"This demand of the people for amusement and instruction through the medium of the moving picture has presented an immense opportunity to the church," said Mr. Linthicum, "yet few churches have availed themselves of it. It occurs to me that there are great possibilities in such adaptation. We should recognize that the moving picture is a modern invention bringing to us at small cost not only all the important plays, dramas and comedies, but that it is an ideal means of reproducing life and nature in all parts of the world. It is this kaleidoscopic portrayal of life, both educational and amusing, that appeals to the people.

"I am told that it is the policy of many churches that the church confine itself to the spiritual problem of leaving the other problems to the solution of others. In my view this is wrong. Wherever human rights are abridged, wherever humanity is contending for the advancement of mankind, the church should be there. The duty of the church is on the firing line in human progress. If you go back in history you will find that never was Christianity stronger, never was it more deep-rooted in the hearts of the people than during the days when it was fighting for human rights.

"If there was a problem that deserves the attention of your church, it is this: Men in your position ought certainly to see that the working women in your congregation are not being paid wages that are inducements to immorality. Until the church takes an interest in such problems, until the pulpit becomes a force in those affairs of life that contributes to the daily comfort of the people who summer it, it will not exercise its greatest office for good."

Mr. Linthicum then referred to the great social service the United States government is doing for its people. He said the man, no matter which way he turns, finds a helping hand from the government for the betterment of his condition. He contended that the church should make itself a part of the man's daily life as the national government is doing for his protection, and when it does the church will be stronger than ever.

EDIBLE FISHES OF THE ENGLISH CHANNEL—PATHE.

Edible fishes found in the English Channel is a pretty and instructive series, the Plaice in its habits and the Leach in its seaweed home, with the Dragonet burying itself in the sand, the small Goby and the young Sticklebacks, each in its peculiar habits and methods, give to the scientist causes for the varied tastes of the epicure, while no aquarium can be half so entertaining to the young people, to which must be added the educational knowledge imparted. The lessons of courage and persistence seen in the Lump fish which swims up-stream against the current, leaping up the waterfalls again and again until it has reached the higher stream will have its good points for the teacher who will be able to combine a lesson in natural history with a determination to overcome obstacles exceedingly helpful and encouraging. The Cuttlefish, Sepiole and Blackfish are also shown.

A MOVEMENT ALONG RIGHT LINES.

The office of this paper was pleased to receive a visit last week from Mrs. Henry Anderson, of Nashville, Tenn., who, with her husband, was visiting New York and other places for the purpose of acquiring all the necessary advice to enable them to more efficiently and thoroughly launch in their home city a moving picture enterprise as perfect as possible, having for its main purpose the requirements of the children and young people in all possible educational advantages. It was a pleasure to know that the Educator had been a source of inspiration to these enterprising people, and it was a greater pleasure to place them on the way of securing everything they needed to make their new movement a great success. Mrs. Anderson is evidently one of the leaders among the women of Nashville who are working for the social, civic and educational good of the school children. They have already "A Story-Tellers League" which it is only natural should grow into a moving picture illustrator league. With the backing of a committee of about twelve ladies, and with the school authorities and clergymen giving a cordial support, it is proposed to organize a "Little Theatre" for the children first and the adults in a secondary manner. The people of the city are giving them generous support, and a special theatre is in contemplation. As this is exactly along the lines wished for by the Educator, we congratulate Mr. and Mrs. Anderson on the courage of their enterprise and are assured that nothing but good will result from their endeavors, a good that will educationally and morally benefit first, and render financial gains afterwards. In wishing them success we can only hope they may have many followers, all of whom may be sure that the Educator will only be too glad to help in every possible way.

NEW AND INSTRUCTIVE SCENICS BY HYDRO-AEROPLANE.

The Pathe Company has just released a very entertaining series of scenic views which will be a valuable addition to the educationally scenic and travel pictures so much in demand by the scholastic world. The Rapids and Falls of Frondhjen, Norway, are among the most picturesque ever filmed, thrilling with rugged grandeur. Kindred Norway scenes and of Brittany sights and customs are new and beautiful. A journey by hydro-aeroplane from Havre to Buc is at once most thrilling and beautiful, the beholder does not need to stretch his imagination in any way as one actually seems to be riding over the beautiful country; without doubt the journey was selected for its scenic advantages. Beginning with a real bird's-eye view of Havre we travel above Candebec across the Seine to Rouen, over Vernon, Mantes, and descending at Buc, thirteen miles from Paris, finish the most pleasing little trip ever taken; traveling above the earth and beneath the blue sky while sitting in a comfortable chair at home.

"CABIRIA."

It has not been necessary on this page to give any review of Annunzio's famous picture "Cabiria," it would, however, be an oversight if no mention were made of it. In the first place every high-school ought to see that the pupils have an opportunity to see this greatest of pictures. As a kinematographic production it is wonderful, amazing even the most familiar follower of the highest art of moving picture making. As an educational production it is without an equal and is at once a revelation and inspiration to everyone who sees it. The producers of this great work deserve the thanks of the educational world, not only for lifting the moving picture into the highest place, but by also producing such a powerful subject at the same time; it makes an epoch in moving picture work in every way.

MR. ROUSSEL OF PATHE SERIOUSLY ILL.

Arthur Roussel, vice-president of Pathe Freres, is still seriously ill at his residence in West New York. That his condition shows no marked improvement will cause regret to the many friends whom he has made among the trade.

Doings at Los Angeles

"WAR IS HELL" in the film was bad enough, but the war in reality is far worse, and everyone in the west including the large number of photoplayers is realizing that. As the days pass on and the news of the thousands who have been slaughtered is realized, the people only wonder, and ask one another how long it can last. Anxiety is being felt more keenly than at any other time, and many people are really worried for their relatives who are abroad. The film business remains the same only for a few changes in the personnel of several companies who have been forced to let out a number of their actors.

Charming little Mildred Harris, the famous child player who has been featured in so many New York releases, and who has played with the Broncho brand for so long a time, has left that company for the new Oz Co., at Hollywood. She appeared in the second fairy picture as Princess Fluff, and has made quite an impression on the managers. This dainty little child actress will be seen in forthcoming Oz pictures, and her winning personality, simple manners, and fairy-like appearance will surely win for her a place in the hearts of every child and man and woman who sees her in these films.

Ruth Roland had a birthday, and she is now wearing a most gorgeous diamond ring, one of those "class A" ebony ones. There is a large central stone, surrounded by nine little ones, all gems of quality. Ruth received a large number of presents from friends and admirers. Marshal Neilan was the busiest man in town that day, he was putting on a cabaret scene and his big stage was crowded to the exits with fair femininity and society lions. He had the real atmosphere all right.

George Larkin is surely doing a wonderful lot of work in the 8th and 9th installments of the Universal wonder film "The Trey o' Hearts," by Louis Joseph Vance. In the past week he has been making history in the production of film. At the Universal ranch a three-story water-front house was built and burned for the scenic effect. Larkin rescued Rose, by swinging across the street on a rope, from an adjacent building, and grabbing the girl in his arms. The rescue was thrilling, and the actors nearly fainted before they were pulled out of the smoke and let down to the ground. The intrepid George swam around in the water and let Captain Hudson swoop down on him in a hydro-aeroplane and light on the water over his head in a rescue that was done on the bay at San Pedro. Larkin grabbed the struts on the machine before it stopped, and pulled himself up onto the machine while it skudded along on the water. Without stopping the aviator took his man up and away to a far-away point where another flight was made.

Recently Ellen Beach Yaw, the famous singer, was assisted my Myrtle Gonzales, of Vitagraph fame, when she gave a newsboys' benefit in her beautiful sunken gardens in Covina. Miss Gonzales besides being a leading lady in the films seems to be quite a singer. She has invested in a cute foothill bungalow on Pasadena avenue.

The Universal studios is missing Mrs. Rose Janowitz who, for the past year, has been secretary to general manager Isadore Bernstein. She left last week with Mr. Bernstein's daughter, Miss Sylvia, for Louisville, Ky., where the young lady will attend a young ladies' school. Mrs. Janowitz will enjoy a long vacation, returning to the west coast studios this fall.

Guy Price, of the Evening Herald here, writes the moving picture news and a few nights ago he said: "Does acting pay in the movies?" "Yes, it must, for here are a few Southern California automobilists, being the leading people of the Kalem, under the direction of Albert W. Hale, who himself owns a big Packard, John Brennan a Rainier, Ethel Teare a Hudson, Carrie Clark Ward a Ford, William S. Crolley a Dudley bug, and Fred Hornby a Sunbeam." Fred read the story and looked up at the sky and said: "Yes, I own a million sunbeams, and they travel millions of miles an hour."

P. C. Hartigan, who was making Hartigan Comedies to release through Pathe, has ceased production. Bruce Mitchell, releasing under the same brand, is still at work with his two companies.

According to our unwritten law of the studios, that one who is allowed to enter must never tell what he sees inside, we are compelled to withhold good news, but that does not matter much, for here is one they told us to tell. It seems that soon the market will be flooded with war stories. Nearly every studio is putting on a story of this kind, and they are all widely different. Here one director is doing a sobbing drama, while across the street some fellows are shooting up the pavement with a travesty on the present unpleasantness in Europe. Still another plant will be doing a pleasing comedy with a neat backing of war atmosphere. They all will be sellers, however. Allen Curtis is starting a light travesty on the war with William Franey, Gale Henry and Louise Fazenda as the featured players. The war between France and Germany is the background for the family row, while the two children of the nations remain in love, and neutral to all fights. Their marriage, and later the little child brings about a happy reconciliation between the families.

W. H. Clune, the movie theater magnate, has been away for a few days getting some kind of a collection of new ideas for use in his many theaters. He has booked for his Auditorium theater some of the latest and most wonderful of feature pictures. Exhibitors around here are still doing lots of business.

Dolly Larkin has left the Frontier company, having been featured in "A Rose of Yesterday," produced by Willis L. Roberts. This picture is quite unique in that it does not contain a single sub-title. The former leading lady for this company is in Los Angeles awaiting a new engagement.

D. W. Griffith has a sunburned pate. What caused it? Well, to get the proper atmosphere for "The Clansman" he shaved his head to show his good faith in getting the men who worked in the picture to cut their locks. He wears a hat without a crown, and of course without his hair he became well burned while directing out under the sunny California skies. He puts cold cream on it every night, but no grease paint.

A clerk in the Bank of Santa Monica has asked if Mary H. O'Connor is some kind of a secret agent. She wore a hole in the step at the side door of the bank cashing five script checks last week.

H. B. Harris, who is Ford Sterling's chief camera man, had a Studebaker car, but now he has a Hupmobile, the old car having been turned over to the wife and Buddy for their use in going to and from the studio. The new car is a classy little car and will be used by the cranker of cameras every day. Buddy is working at present for Albert W. Hale at the Kalem. He appears as a dago boy and his golden locks were blacked, changing his looks wonderfully.

Poor little Mabel Normand wants to take a trip "back home" to New York, she confided to us one Saturday afternoon. "I've been out here ever since the Keystone started, and they won't let me go at all" she says, and that is two years ago. Mabel is busy directing her own company and is putting on some real good comedy. The Keystone has stopped the line of cops and is inaugurating an entirely new class of comedy which is sure to be a winner.

The Mutual Majestic players with Director Donald Crisp are at Big Bear Valley spending a two weeks' tour for mountain stuff 8,000 feet over the sea. The scenes are for "The Great God Fear," and some grand scenery is being taken.

Many people have wondered who the pretty girl is whose smiling face looks out at one from the trademark girl of Oz, and several people have approached the modest Miss Vivian Reed with handsome offers to leave that company, but she stands firm. Her face is beautiful, and the winning smile affects one as does a breath of perfumed air, or a vision of fairies. She was selected out of several hundred applicants to be one of 60 girls, and re-selected out of these 60 to have her face placed in the trade mark. The company is finished with "The Magic Cloak of Oz" and starts on "His Majesty the Scarecrow." It is said that exhibitors around here are already crying for the first release of the Oz company, and L. Frank Baum, the author and general manager of the firm is well satisfied with the first two productions of his whimsical fairy tales.

Even publicity men take a whack at scenario writing. W. E. Keefe, who is the writer for the Mutual news, has issued "Taming the Amazon," which is being put on by Sheriff Mackley. It is a suffragette story and is very good.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Something New Again.

KORFORD AND RYAN, of the Brigham and Alta theaters, Brigham City, Utah, send in the house organ they forgot to send last time they wrote. They get the paper out daily, an issue of 1,250, and have thirty boy carriers, each of whom receives one dollar a week in theater tickets, half of which are good for matinees and the rest for the night performances. They add:

> The paper has made quite a hit and if anyone fails to get a copy we hear from it. The newspaper is furnished us free with such readers as we may use, but we pay regular place for display advertising. We are also sending a copy of the other paper to show that we do not confine our advertising to our own paper.

Evidently the theater does not print the paper but permits the publisher to announce it as the organ of the house and take down such profit as he can make from the regular advertising as is done with the weekly program in many parts of the country. It is styled the Brigham Daily Bulletin and is a four page sheet ten by thirteen inches. It is the only daily paper in town and it is a paper and not a program, with wire and local news, general advertising, editorial comment, church and lodge announcements and all the other marks of the town daily. It has its war news and all that the people want to read. The house gets one or two columns of reader and takes twelve to sixteen inches of display space each day.

The headline carries the statement that it is the only theater in the world distributing a daily paper, and we think it is. It is the sort of paper that in time can outgrow the theater and become a recognized daily, but meantime it is a most valuable advertisement for the house and apparently makes a profit for its publisher as well.

Some time ago we tried to get Julian Solomon to work his weekly into a daily in Philadelphia, but his principals got cold feet.

The house takes a half page in the regular weekly paper, about evening up the patronage, not counting the advertisements of dramatic attractions at the opera house. In both cases they get plenty of readers. They ask for criticism and suggestion, but they do not seem to need it. The advertisements are well framed and well set and the readers carry their points.

It will pay others in the smaller towns to think over this newspaper stunt. It can be done as a local weekly without telegraph news, for the locality paper in the cities.

One-One.

Paramount Pickings, of Minneapolis, is the newest exchange house organ, put out by the Famous Players Film Service. It will be a weekly. It has a Fable, possibly borrowed from Real Reels, and some gossip, but as yet lacks the vigorous tone of its contemporary, but then it is young, and it looks as though it would grow. An exchange organ can be a real power for good and we would like to see more of them. Volume one, number one, is a good starter.

A Pessimist.

A correspondent who doesn't want his name used gets back at our suggestion that a man could go into a 6,000 town, open a third house and clean up IF he did things right. He says:

> With all due deference, I must "Butt in." For centuries I have sworn by you and read everything from Gorenflot to Oliver typewriters (even if this is an Underwood) and now to think that my first letter is to disagree with you.
> Honestly, Mr. Sargent, I think you steered that correspondent wrong who asked about that town of 6,000 which had two houses running and another building. Unless the Almighty is with him strong he is on the wrong track.
> The small town thing is the most dangerous in the business today and from the information on page 1231, August 29th, I would say that the man who goes into that town with a third house is going to lose money from the start until such time as he closes the other two up or closes up himself. It is almost certain that the two houses already there are losing money, and if your correspondent is anxious to get into the town I think that he should find out which one can be bought the cheapest and buy him out as soon as he can get a price which represents the value of fixtures or whatever the present owner can sell, being careful not to spend any money on good will or any of that dope.
> Your correspondence in my opinion should cinch the lease on the new house also; let it leak out that he has the lease, being apparently very reticent himself. With this plan he starts in business with the battle half won. If he can buy the house using the Mutual service, so much the better, but he should make up his mind that he is going to lose money until he has the town to himself, for towns of 6,000 do not show profits sufficient to justify a man with brains running one of two theaters in them.
> Your advice as to the running of the house and being careful not to get personal is great for the surest sign of losing ground is when the personal stuff starts. But what was that you said about "players"? My dope on the music would be "A" piano player. A real one. Remember the town is only 6,000.
> While your correspondent is fighting the opposition house with one of his two, he can ring his other house in beautifully on Saturday, holidays and such, and spoil the good ones for his opposition; but before he starts let him make up his mind that he is going into a long heart-breaking job when he starts to close up opposition; it takes time and money and the man who starts it must be ready with both.
> How about the "opry" house, have we that to contend with too?
> Durinx six years with one company in fair sized cities and several towns I have had much to do with propositions which resembled that mentioned by your correspondent, which fact I mention only as a license for writing this letter. I have followed the teachings of the Bible (MOVING PICTURE WORLD) pretty faithfully and have a fair idea of what is practical in such cases as the one in question.
>
> Guess I'd better ring off.
> House organs are the worst thing I do. First offense enclosed.

Why Not?

Now we didn't mean to suggest that all the newcomer would have to do would be to hire the house, open it and then tip back in his office chair and go fast asleep while the coin rolled in and the usher wheeled it over to the bank twice a day because one trip was not enough. What we did say that a town of 6,000 could let in a third house if it was run right, and we believe that it can. The other houses were not lined up properly and they were open to attack, and the very fact that there was opposition would put the newcomer on his mettle and make him fight and fight hard.

All through the country there are towns of the same size or even smaller where there are two or more houses run on the general proposition that the theatergoing public are ignorant fools who will crowd into a theater and fight for the privilege of spending money no matter what is offered them, and it is easier, as a rule, to get the money there with a new house than in virgin territory. We are not always in New York and we've watched a few fights in the small places as well as in the big ones. It is easier to put a poor house out of business than to put a new town on the map, and that is what we said.

Also at other times we've advised managements with supposed cinches to offer as good a show as they can afford even without opposition against the time that opposition comes. Anyone can make money in a town where the only other places to go are the post office and pie socials, but to hold business when the opposition comes needs not only nerve, but a good past record. And where the past record is not good, the newcomer has all the best of the argument, a fact that should be noted by the monarchs of all they survey, for some day opposition is sure to come and more than one manager who thinks he has a cinch does not hear his patrons express the fervent hope that some day a real show will come along.

That One Piece Again.

And this correspondent is building up on the one-piece coat and shirt hanger by announcing that it may also be used as a pants button in an emergency. It would be better to announce it as a "garment fastener" in case this sub-billing is used before the distribution.

He gets out a nice little program, a four pager that looks as clean as a kid with his face just washed. The program occupies three boxes across the two inside pages, the boxes being "staggered" down the page like a flight of steps, an arrangement that breaks the cold formality of the usual arrangement. The program for the first two days occupies the top of page two, that for Wednesday and Thursday the right hand column of page two and the left column of page three in the center of the sheet and the Friday and Saturday program the bottom of page three. Around these boxes is some mighty smart clipped stuff and original matter. Try that box stunt whether you have three or six changes a week. Anything to be different.

Getting Business.

Lately the Coroner of the Inquest Circle in Rochester had trouble finding a meeting place. Mr. Farren, of the Victoria, promptly offered the use of his reception room. Once a week they see the show and then discuss the films. It is safe to say that at other times the members instinctively turn to the Victoria when they go to see the pictures. Possibly they bring their friends with them. It is small courtesies such as these that make a theater something besides a place where you pay an admission and see pictures. Do you go out of your way to help your patrons? It pays.

A One Pager.

The Opal theater, Hollister, Cal., sends in a one-page program which they have been using for more than a year. Elmer Tompkins writes that he puts out a thousand a week and that many of them are hung up for reference. It is a new form, the type page being 7 by 10 inches, three columns. The middle column is the program proper, with the side columns taken up by the special features. The form is simple, compact, comprehensive and probably about as cheap as an effective advertising can be There is but one printing, no folding ...

stitching and for a man who wants to feel his way on a program, we can imagine nothing better as a starter. Where there is a little space to spare there is a paragraph about the house. There should be one —at least—in every issue. The house that stays there all the time is just as important as the film that is there a single day.

The advertising is intelligently worded. One starts: "You must go at least two nights this week to the Opal." There doesn't seem to be much of a punch in that, but there is. Almost unconsciously you'll try to do as you are told where a more imperative summons would be resented. Try the line yourself, but don't set it in very heavy type. They run features on Saturday and another line reads: "The night that everybody can go to the theater." There is psychological suggestion, too, in this line: "If you haven't got your seat already, you had better try for one at Weavers." You are not asked to go get a seat, but urged to get one if you can. It's a little different but a big difference. Evidently Mr. Tompkins knows human nature. Anyone can say "Don't miss this feature," but he knows that a politely expressed fear that you might will go further. There are times when you can say "must"; but say it nicely. Other times it is better to put it another way. Only experience can tell you which.

Mr. Tompkins puts his bills out Sunday morning and says the business that night covers the cost.

Some Opposition.

Perhaps to make some of you other fellows glad, Luke J. Scott, of the Amusu, Warrensburg, Mo., gives a little table of what he had to buck in June and July. He thinks he may have overlooked a few, but these are most of the "chiggers"—if you ever had them.

Tent show—one week. Ten-cent admission.
Street fair—one week.
The Coburn Players—outdoor Shakespearean performances—three nights.
Free recitals—three of them.
Band concerts, free—two each week (about 18).
Free night at opposition—politics and pictures.
Two nights of seven reel opposition.
Eight church socials.
Two rainy special feature nights.

There are 51 bumps in 61 days. Keeps a man guessing. Mr. Scott says the best stunt he can find to fight with is the benefit for an organization idea. The society gets a percentage on the tickets it sells. The idea is far from new; it kept Philadelphia theatricals alive for years, and antedates that, but people will go out for the sake of the lodge or society when they will not budge from their homes just for a show.

An Outrage.

And after we have been just as nice as we know how, comes George E. Carpenter to refer to us as "Sargent the sarcastic." Durn his Rocky Mountain hide, we're not sarcastic. He can kid our necktie and our bald head, but we refuse to admit we are sarcastic and the next time we print something from Real Reels it's got to be extra good. Trouble is most of that stuff is the extra good stuff. Just to prove no hard feeling, here is a line from the same issue.

> If you had a message to deliver to a hundred people, you would not stand upon a street corner and yell it to the four winds in the hope that they would hear you. Instead, you would address them personally. The first method is general publicity; the second, selective, direct advertising. Do you get the point?

Let's change it slightly. If you fire a shotgun into the air some persons may be hit by the spent pellets of lead, but if you go after your man, jam the muzzle of the gun between his shoulder blades and then pull the trigger, he's almighty certain you are somewhere in his vicinity. In other words go after the people who are likely to come to you in a way that will reach them. Don't just hang a poster in the lobby, run a slide and wonder why the house doesn't fill up.

It Still Lives!

We almost broke down and cried when we saw a recent copy of the Tallygram. There used to be a time when that alert Los Angeles house had us on the mailing list, but that was years and years ago. Anyhow, they are still at it and doing better than ever, though the issue to hand contains none of the clever house stuff they used to run. It is all about Miss Pickford in The Eagle's Mate, and the most noticeable feature is perhaps the fact that they avoid a formal handling of the cuts. The back page is a full size portrait cut, but the other two, instead of being centered are run off to the side, getting away from the formal effect that so often takes from the punch of the cut.

Ever give any consideration—or much of it—to the placement of a cut? Lots of men get fancy salaries just for making up cut pages in the magazines. It does not always have to be in the geometrical and geographical centre of the page. Take a proof some time and see how it works out over in a corner. There is an art in getting the page to look just right.

Now that the Tallygram is in again, we hope it stays in.

Beats Stamps.

The Mortimer Film Life Saving Station (which is a catchy title for the Mortimer Film Cleaner) is running a theater in the home town of Freeport, Maine. Taking a hint from the cigarette people they have started to give away ribbon portraits of the stars of the service they use. This is the Universal and they use the U cuts, which may be had of the Universal very reasonably. These are to be worked up into sofa pillows and the other dinky things that women like to make, and they report excellent success with the souvenirs. Of course you can get Mutual or Licensed cuts just as well, but the point is that you can get them going on the idea and once you get them going they go to your theater. F. E. Mortimer writes that they have doubled their receipts, since they took up the idea, on the nights the souvenirs are used. It might pay the different companies to print these for exhibitors and offer a few trade mark ribbons free.

A Triout Matinee.

G. W. M. Richmond, of the Royal, Geneseo, N. Y., announces himself as "The One Man to Amuse 3,188 People," a line so happy in its thought that it should be used more often than appears in the batch of programs he sends in. He is also the inventor of the "Triout" matinee, which might be used very successfully where the town is not yet ready for the formal full price matinee. This tells the story:

> Every afternoon from 4:30 to 6 P. M. we will hold what we will call a "Triout" Performance, the object of which is twofold; to try out the film, and to familiarize the musicians with the play.
> Now it occurred to us that many who were engaged in the evening would welcome this opportunity of seeing the complete show every afternoon at a 5c admission.

Every manager does, or should, run over his stuff before the night performance. The tryout matinee simply admits to the afternoon performance and anticipates any complaint as to delay for broken sprockets, bad patches or anything of that sort. The same program also announces that the Friday performance is a benefit night, a Red Cross Seal being pasted on each ticket. We are strong for the work of the Society for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, not because we write their scripts but because an exhaustive study of their literature due to that fact makes it patent what a wonderful work they are doing. Get in line with the movement, and be aligned with the men who move things.

Getting back to the program, we note that this has become a door-knob special by the simple process of changing the name, since the size was already right, a four page, five and a half by seven. For an extra special they use the common baggage tags.

Once or twice there is a departure from the straight program to allow for some house chat, but mostly it is the straight program announcement, and we think this is a mistake. The program is doing its greatest good when each issue is practically a chat from you to the reader and inspired with the touch of personality. You pay for your program. If you had to spend ten cents for every five-cent cigar you smoked, you would change tobacconists in a hurry, but if you are getting only half the good your program can do you do not make a change, and half a page of intimate chat is worth two pages of cold program. Get and keep in touch with your patrons through your chats or you are buying two for five cigars for a quarter apiece and are suffering from a mental catarrh that will not permit you to smell the difference. As far as it goes the Royal does well. It does not get all that it is entitled to do for the money.

Would you like to have people look at you on the street as the manager of the picture theater, or would you like to have them call you Bill and ask if you have a good show tonight? Then get intimate, but not too familiar, in your program. Make them feel that you are their friend and that they are your friends. Then your program will pay the most for the money you spend.

Policy and Program.

The Rose theater, Minonk, Ill., has just started in and send in an eight-page program with its "policy and program," to quote from the cover page. The program might tell more about the attractions, for sometimes a single release is featured and on one night the Selig News Series is given black type and it takes close reading to discover that they also show the first of The Man Who Disappeared series on that evening and Friday suggests G. M. Anderson in Col. Heeza Liar. It would be better to be more specific, but the same comment does not apply to the policy, which is clearly indicated. We quote some of the paragraphs:

"SAFETY FIRST."

> By safety we mean moral as well as physical. For the physical safety of our patrons we have complied with all the requirements of the state as to fire protection, installed all the latest and approved machinery, also a system of ventilation that will secure sanitary conditions.
> But we do not consider our responsibility ends here. The moral safety of your families will be as zealously guarded as the physical. These things we know will appeal to any community and if we deliver the goods we will receive your patronage. If we do not, we are not entitled to it.

Entertainment Second.

> The day is past when poor sensational photo plays will be endured. The time has come when they must be instructive and entertaining, projected properly and surrounded with appropriate settings. When these conditions are obtained, we have the only plausible entertainment that the smaller cities can maintain every night. Kindly give the "ROSE THEATER" "the once over" and let us know if we qualify.
> All pictures will be censored by the present authorities, but the management of the "Rose Theater" will not hide behind this. We have our reputation and investment at stake, and will always be the final judge as to what will be suitable to be shown. If you ever have any complaint on this score, remember your redress is right at home. "No red tape."
> During the school year, children under 14 years of age will not be admitted unless accompanied by parents, except on Friday and Saturday nights. The reason for this is apparent—any entertainment detracts interest from their work, a condition we do not wish to encourage.

For the program end it would be well to write some brother exhibitors for samples. The addresses can be obtained from back issues.

A Satin Start.

The Imperial theater, Zanesville, Ohio, opened August 11. The program for the opening week was of satin six inches wide and twenty-one inches long. It was good grade material, too, suggestive of the sort of shows to be run. It cost more than sleazy stuff, but it meant more than the difference in cost.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Be Interesting.

SUPPOSE that you picked up a morning paper and read something like this:

> War has been declared by Germany and Austria against Servia. France, England, Russia and Japan have declared war upon Germany.

Wouldn't you hustle out and get a paper that told the whole of the story and gave the details? The basis of all the stuff that has been in the paper since trouble started is right in that paragraph, but it is flat as dishwater because it does give the bare facts and nothing more.

Do you write the same sort of story?

Or do you make it interesting?

Given a halfway decent plot, the question of interesting telling or the lack of it is the whole difference between acceptance and rejection, and yet so many authors think that so long as they get all of the facts down on paper they have done all that is required.

They have not. They have not even started. They simply lay out the points of the story and let it go at that. That precise point is where the trained author really begins to get busy. It is from there on that either makes or loses a sale. Any person who is not utterly idiotic can conceive one or more plots. The trained writer alone presents them properly, and that is why so many people write that their plots are better than those on the screen and yet they do not sell. Naturally not. The facts are there but they are not properly presented.

You would not go to a first class restaurant, ask for a steak and expect to have a chunk of raw beef dumped at your place. You want the steak properly cooked and then properly served. You want a couple of sprigs of parsley to dress the dish, you want to see the brown of the cooked meat, the red of the interior portions, the rich juices flowing over the platter or perhaps the bordure of potatoes and the other fanciful trimmings that go with the planked steak. You are paying for a cooked steak and you want what you pay for. The real steak is the piece of raw meat, but the raw meat does not particularly interest you unless you are a food crank.

It is the same way with a story. The editor wants what he is willing to pay for and he is willing to pay for a story properly served. If you can't cook a steak, be a butcher and not a chef. If you cannot dress up a story, be anything rather than an author, for you are not an author.

It is not enough to demonstrate that John loves Mary. Make us interested in John and then we can get interested in the fact that John loves Mary. It is not enough that she wants to marry Tom. Make us so interested in John that we think it is nearly a crime that she should be so blind to John's virtues and Tom's defects. Get us worried for fear that she will marry Tom before John can win her. Don't just show in one scene that John loves her and in the next that she loves Tom. Put in something that will not only tell the fact but that will interest us. That, and that only, is the true technique of photoplay writing. It is not a matter of indicating properly the inserts and not calling bust scenes "on screens." That is well enough in its way, but the most perfect mechanical technique of form in the whole world is not worth a single scene written so that it grips the interest.

A lot of writers pay far too much attention to their synopsis, seeming to think that if the synopsis reads well the story is a success. This is a grave error. The synopsis should be but the reflection of the story told in action, a reflection seen in a reducing mirror, but absolutely a reflection and not anything else. A synopsis may read well and yet the action can be so bald that it is an infliction on one's patience. The trick lies in making the action interesting, for this—and not the synopsis—is what the spectator sees.

Not until you have learned to appreciate this fact can you even hope to think that some day you may become an author, and yet not one new writer in five hundred seems to realize that action must take the place of words in gaining interest. The novice seems to think that if the idea of a situation is dramatic, any action that shows that situation is also dramatic. Literally thousands of scripts are thrown out each year for no other reason than that they do not interest because the author is not able to sound the human note in action. If any God-given genius is ever able to force all writers, whether they be writers of film or fiction, to realize that the plot must be developed interestingly, he will save hundreds of heart aches, but it does not seem possible to batter down the conceited pride of the beginner, who has been assured by well meaning but unintelligent friends that the story is "great," and until that conceit is broken down, there is no possible hope for the sufferer.

And it is not always the beginner who offends. Only the other day we saw a two-reel production in which there were two scenes that might have been made interesting if the producer had not spoiled one of these scenes with an absolutely idiotic production. There were probably eighty scenes in the two reels. The first sixty were taken up with a succession of scenes telling the premise; the foundation facts of the story. Then came the two vital scenes and eighteen follow up scenes to a weak finish. So much time had been taken for explanation (about a reel and a half) and so much more was needed for the conclusions that only two scenes had a possible appeal and through poor direction but one of these, a mere flash, had the human note. There was a story there, but the author evidently had been so absorbed in his facts that he forgot to dress them up and he served his meat freshly raw from the chopping block.

Pick out what is the real appeal of your story. Decide that point clearly and positively before your work is begun. Then strive to get all of the explanation over in as few scenes as possible that you may have plenty of footage for the big stuff when it comes. We saw a script the other day. Four scenes, each with a time leader, told of a husband's absence from home. At the end of the fourth desertion the wife went home to her mother. The idea was to show that the husband was away from home each evening. The first scene told the story. The other three took footage from the real story of how the husband and wife were reunited. If any additional emphasis were needed a simple cut in "You are never at home," would have told as much as this procession of scenes, and nearly two hundred feet could have been saved.

But instead of a succession of scenes, each merely showing that the husband could not stay home nights, the single scene should have, through its business, have shown that the wife feared his going, that she sought to hold him by her side, that his home was attractive and he was utterly without excuse. Then that one scene would have left us a partisan for the wife and angry with the husband even while we hoped that she would win him back because she seemed to want to hold him. Our interest would have been engaged in that very first scene.

Suppose you saw a little child playing on the railroad tracks with the train thundering down and the engineer vainly striving to get his brakes to work. Suppose that a man in a silk hat calmly walked on the track and lifted the child off as calmly as though he were helping himself to a second lump of sugar for his coffee. It would be a rescue but it would not be half as exciting as if a brave young hero sprang in front of the oncoming train and seized the child, hurling it to safety and barely making good his own escape. He would have done no more than our phlegmatic hero except to muss the kiddie up, but there would be life and thrill and excitement to the action and it would appeal to us as being truly heroic where the calm rescue might have been almost absurd. One incident had interesting action. The other lacked life and movement.

Don't write casual action and, on the other hand, do not get thrillingly melodramatic all the way through. Learn to write tense, stirring but consistent action and hold the interest of your audiences.

The fiction author gets this effect through the adroit handling of words. You must learn to do it through the adroit handling of action, and until you can, with the factors to your hand, constantly keep your spectator interested, you cannot write a decent story. Don't be content merely to get down some action that tells your story. Tell it in the most interesting action, the most adroit development your mind can conceive or you'll leave the editor cold and unmoved, and you'll never get a script beyond him.

One of the worst sides of the editorial job is the reading, day after day, of the dead level of commonplace that misguided writers think is story.

There are dozens of writers fairly hanging over the edge of success and yet never finding it, because they fail to realize that the action and the development of the action as well as the plot itself must be interesting.

Buying Little.

Mrs. Parsons, editor for Essanay, writes that she is buying little new material at present as they find that they can do better turning fiction into photoplay, but she adds that they are not letting any really big stories float past just on that account. In a word Essanay is not buying any but the very biggest stories and it will not pay to try them with merely average stuff.

Liberty Wants.

The erstwhile "Bennie from Lubinville," now B. Ziedman, Esq., editor for the Liberty company, 20-52 East Herman street, Germantown, Philadelphia, writes that his company will take strong, original multiple reel domestic dramas and one-reel comedies. He says the payment will be regulated by the merit of the script. We have not the slightest idea what that means in money. The Liberty is a new company. It is not in any releasing affiliation that we know of.

If You Live in Rochester.

If you live in Rochester, N. Y., and want to join the Inquest Circle there, please note that it meets every Wednesday evening at the Victoria theater, Mr. Farren, the manager of the house, having very courteously placed his office and reception room at the disposal of the club on that evening. Mrs. Nettie Armstrong is the local Coroner.

Hartigan Out.

P. C. Hartigan, who started to make comedies for Pathe, seems to be out of the market again.

Mr. Dench Objects.

Earnest A. Dench, of London, rises to offer objection to a recent criticism of his book, Playwriting for the Cinema, in which we said that it seems to be colored by the Leeds-Esenwein work. He writes that practically all of the material is taken from his previous writings in The Cinema, an English publication with which he was connected for a long time, and that it was used by their permission. We are not familiar with Mr. Dench's work, save through this book and some recent issues of his own magazine, hence the suggestion that he seemed to have patterned after the Leeds-Essenwein volume. We are glad to offer his correction. As he points out, any standard work must naturally cover certain grounds.

Finis.

This letter from Errol E. Hart, of the Evening Sun, who was in charge of the Sun-Vitagraph contest, is the last word that will be published about that contest. Mr. Hart's succinct statement of fact, and his announcement of his willingness to inquire into any complaint, covers the ground perfectly. At no time has it been apparent to the disinterested observer that the Sun was not ready at any time to give full explanation, nor does it seem that in any way it has broken faith with any contestant. Mr. Hart writes:

> In view of the paragraphs that have appeared in your column concerning The Evening Sun-Vitagraph contest, might I ask the liberty of your column to invite the two persons who have written to you anonymously to communicate with me by letter, by telephone or in person, at The Evening Sun office. I should like to know what the grievances are that are hinted at.
> As I chanced to be in entire charge of The Evening Sun's side of the contest, and endeavored to make it distinctly beneficial to the photoplaywrights in general, as well as to those who participated, I am sorry to learn that some one who has not come forward with his grievance, is disgruntled. The only persons whom I knew to have even a prima facie case for a "kick," I have communicated with, and I believe they are satisfied that their difficulty was unavoidable, and not due to any bad faith. We printed in The Evening Sun a list of about 300 plays that had been selected by readers of the Vitagraph company with a view to purchase by it. Unfortunately, after the list was printed the heads of the Vitagraph in comparing the plays picked out by the readers, found that the examiner had in a few cases selected plays on themes very similar in character. The Vitagraph company could not be expected to purchase two or three scripts on identical lines, and they were forced to return a few plays on that account.
> I have written personally to these authors, and so far as I know they are entirely satisfied with their treatment. They not only had a chance at no expense for the $1,000 prize that was awarded strictly on merit, but they also received special mention in The Evening's Sun's list as having written plays of unusual quality. The plays that appeared in that list had been selected by both the judges and the Vitagraph company for commendation, and while I cannot say that the writers should not have wished to receive checks in addition to the honorable mention, I feel that they must understand that it was impossible for the Vitagraph company to purchase under the circumstances.
> Might I add that I believe the contest has been of great benefit to play writers in that it has had a strong tendency to raise the prices offered by studios for scripts. I observed incidentally that Vitagraph paid for several scripts that were in the list mentioned prices much higher than it had previously paid for the same quality of plays. I endeavored also to make the contest give a decided boost to the present tendency toward better plays. Plays that will stand the test of any critical examination.
> In the course of reviewing motion picture plays produced in New York for The Evening Sun I naturally came to realize that the success of the motion picture business must depend on its getting away from the crude, the trite, and the preposterous in scenarios. I hope that I have succeeded in a measure in this aim.
> The Motion Picture World must have been the cause of many hundreds of the competitors in the contest sending in their plays, for following on its publication of the terms of the contest, we received a great number of plays from the Far West. California, of course, being especially well represented. We know that no Nw York paper circulates in any great numbers on the Pacific slope, and I ascribe a large part of our success in reaching these playwrights to the Moving Picture World. For their benefit I might say that we have about 70 manuscripts in the office for which no names or addresses were sent, and which we have been unable to return for that reason. Some others for which stamps were not sent are being returned as fast as the stamps are received. In writing to the competing authors I thought it wise to advise them to read your column, as in my several years' experience in following it, I have found it of greater benefit to those interested in photoplay writing, than any other matter published in this country.

A Missing Fireman.

There is a vacant rubber coat and helmet in the Dumont (N. J.) Fire Department and barns can burn down with impunity so far as Giles Warren is concerned. He has gone to Chicago to the Selig studio, even if they have no volunteer department in the big city.

Some Stunt.

Lately we wrote of a pupil who thought good plots when she swept or performed household duties, but they did not seem to be so good when she got them down on paper. Here is a correspondent who beats that,

> Since reading the last number of your magazine, I have come to the conclusion that I was mistaken in the idea that I should stop writing my "ideas" for plots down, on account of having such a large amount of them on hand already. Therefore, I shall continue to jot them down, and put them carefully away in a file which I have for them. I find, too, that my plots, as I learn more and have more practice, necessarily become better.
> I have "one" on the party who thought plots out while she swept the floor. This morning, I thought out a complete plot while taking dictation of a five-page legal instrument with difficult terms, long names and big figures in it. I wrote the instrument without even one mistake, then jotted down my plot while the "Boss" read the instrument. But, contrary to the fate of the other party's plots, which lost their glamour when written on paper, mine looked even better after I had written it out. Furthermore, it was a plot for comedy, and I haven't as yet undertaken to write a "funny" script, for the reason that I started out on dramas, in accordance with advice contained in the "Technique," and wanted to learn to do one thing well before undertaking another. I haven't even read the chapter on comedy scripts, for I have my hands full trying to learn to write good dramas. Therefore, my idea of this morning will be filed away for awhile.

Perhaps some persons will think that the lady has too much imagination, but it is entirely believable that a trained law stenographer can take down the dictation of a legal document with all its involved phraseology and still develop a plot with the unoccupied portion of the brain. Some persons, indeed, think best when they are performing some more or less mechanical action, for then the brain becomes active and the creative brain is, in a sense, apart from the routine brain.

We would suggest to the correspondent that she file her ideas on catalogue cards. We have found this is the easiest and simplest method and the data used can be removed, leaving the new material clear and accessible, which is not always the way where a book is used. Perhaps the best way of all is to carry a loose-leaf book, with pages three by five inches, and use these instead of cards, transferring to the file as the ideas develop. In another letter she speaks of her three scripts, one of which was written over twenty-five times. At the start it is better to write twenty-five different ideas out and then go back and revise the first.

Too Fine.

Sundays and some other times we fool around a workbench, finding some relaxation in working with wood and metal instead of ideas. We like good tools and we can buy good ones, and so we have three steel rules. One is marked in sixteenths, thirty-seconds, sixty-fourths and hundredths. Another is in eighths and sixteenths. The third runs from eighths to thirty-seconds.

When we want to measure quarter-inches we use the rule marked off in eighths rather than one divided into hundredths of inches, because the scale is more easily read.

In the same way, when we want to write a script to the quarter-inch gauge we do not use the hundredth scale style. If we want to mark it in hundredths we change to the finely divided rule. In other words we mark out scripts to suit the action. If we write a simple scene we may perhaps write—

11 Room—Jim enters—gets paper—startled—exits.

We are writing in quarters. It is broad-gauge stuff and any director can get the idea from the half line. Perhaps, though, we have a scene that needs to be written in eighths. We say:

11—Room—Jim enters looks for Mary—surprised she is not there—gets paper—reads—startled—shows regret—exits more slowly as though overcome.

Done into sixteenths it might be:

11—Room—Jim enters—stands at door—looks about for Mary—speaks her name—no reply—goes to oposite side—calls again—still no reply—starts to retrace steps—sees paper—reads—incredulous—slowly the idea sinks in that she has gone away with Johnson—he is dumfounded—picks up Bobbie's coat she was working on when Johnson came for her—regards intently—with an agonized cry he covers his face and turns and staggers from the room.

If the possession of some comparatively unimportant paper is the service of the scene, write it in quarters. If it is one of the really big scenes write it in eighths or sixteenths or hundredths or even thousandths, if need be, to get the idea over.

He's Different Now.

There is a chap who used to be eager to sell scripts, though he did not have much success, so lately we packed up a couple of clean shirts and a typewriter and went where he was and let him see where he got ideas and what we did with them after we got them. We showed him how it was possible to take almost any thing and make it into a story if only it was worked up right. Then we came home and lately he wrote.

> Although I have three finished I don't have that old "hankering" to send them out. My great stunt now is to learn to plot from any old thing, and I realize that means a lot of hard work and practice.

In other words he realizes now that there is something more important than selling an occasional script and that a solid foundation of plotting ability, plus practice in developing and plots, is worth more than the occasional good idea haphazzardly developed. When you get so you are really and truly and honestly interested in your work and not merely in the checks that work represents, you won't be so keen about selling right off, because you'll first want to learn to do things right and then you know you can sell. There is hope for this man now.

Technique of the Photoplay

(Second Edition)

By EPES W. SARGENT

Not a line reprinted from the first edition, but an entirely new and exhaustive treatise of the Photoplay in its every aspect, together with a dictionary of technical terms and several sample scripts.

One hundred and seventy-six pages of actual text.

Special chapters on Developing the "Punch," Condensing the Script, Writing the Synopsis, Multiple Reel Stories, Talking Pictures, Copyrights, etc.

In cloth, two dollars. Full leather, three dollars.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be indorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies, on matters which cannot be replied to in the department, one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money, or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 50.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permissions to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Suppose you count the strands of your asbestos-covered lamp leads and find there are 246 of them, each measuring 10/1,000 of an inch in diameter. What would you conclude? What number wire would it be? What number wire is usually used for strands in asbestos-covered lamp leads? Give the rule for figuring size of wire necessary for three-wire circuits.

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question 44 consists of the following: C. B. Stear, South Vancouver, British Columbia; Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada, and W. T. Weiss, New Orleans, La.

This question seems to have been something of a poser. Brother Smith sent in, everything considered, the best reply. It will be noted that he considered both the carbon and the metallic filament lamps, whereas Brother Stear dismissed the carbon lamp with a line, and Brother Dobson considered carbon lamps only.

Answer to Question No. 44.

By Jos. H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas.

The question:

Suppose your theater used a total of 200 eight c. p. lamps on its front, 25 sixteen c. p. lamps in lobby, stairways, etc., which burned continuously, 50 sixteen c. p. lamps in the indirect lighting system, half of which burned continuously, and half turned off during the performance. In addition, there were two projectors, each using 40 amperes, one dissolver using 15 amperes per lamp, and one spotlight using 12 amperes. What capacity of generator (d. c.) would you recommend, and what h. p. engine? Suppose you used a. c. and all projection current was taken through an economizer, using 60 amperes at projection machine arcs, 20 per lamp at dissolver and 20 on the spot. What, if any, difference would that make in current consumption? Suppose all projection current was taken through a mercury arc rectifier, using first-named amperage on arcs, what then?

The answer:

You do not say what kinds of lamps the theater is supposed to be using, and this is one of the most important points in the whole proposition, therefore I assume you intend us to figure both the carbon and mazda (metallic filament) types. First let us consider the carbon filament; assuming it to have an efficiency of 3.5 watts per c. p. Two hundred 8 c. p. lamps equals 1,600 c. p., multiplied by 3.5 watts equals 5,600 watts; seventy-five 16 c. p. lamps equals 1,200 c. p., which, multiplied by 3.5 watts, equals 4,200 watts, making the total consumption in incandescent lighting, when all lamps are in use, 9,800 watts, or 9.8 k. w. As we would only be using one projector lamp at the time, and that at 40 amperes, and considering the dissolver and spot light consumption to equal 42 amperes, and that neither the spot light or the dissolver would be running simultaneously with either projection machine, we could consider the maximum operating room current to be 42 amperes, which, with a 70-volt machine, would equal 2,940 watts, and this added to 9,800 watts equals 12,740 watts, so that a 15 k. w. generator with a 20 h. p. engine would do the work nicely.

Suppose, however, we were using mazda lamps. We would then be confronted with a very different proposition, since a mazda lamp ought to have an efficiency of 1.5625 watts per c. p.; therefore, two hundred 8 c. p. lamps would consume 16 c. p. x 1.5625 = 2,500 watts, as against 5,600 for carbon lamps—a difference in favor of the mazda lamps of 3,100 watts. Seventy-five 16 c. p. lamps would equal 1,200 c. p. x 1.5625= 1,875 watts, or a total of 1,875+2,500=4,375 watts used in the incandescents. Adding this to the maximum operating room consumption of 2,940 watts we have a total of 7,315 watts for the whole thing, so that an 8 k. w. generator and an 11 h. p. engine would be large enough. My recommendation would, therefore, be a 10 k. w. dynamo and a 15 h. p. engine.

The foregoing is figured on d. c. supply. If we were using a. c. at 110 volts, the incandescent lamp consumption would be the same, but the projector would consume 60x110=6,600 watts (assuming 60 amperes consumption) or, in other words, 35 volts at the arc x 60 amperes = 2,100 watts, and 75x60=4,500 watts lost in the rheostat, assuming resistance to be used. Through an economizer it would be 35 volts at the arc x 60 amperes = 2,100 watts. But if you consider the efficiency of the transformer to be 95 per cent. then it would be 2,220 watts added to either carbon lamp consumption or mazda lamp consumption.

With a mercury arc rectifier it would be, say, 46 volts at the arc x 40 amperes, which would be 1,920 watts to be added to the incandescent lamp consumption. But if the rectifier has an efficiency of 70 per cent. then it would draw about 70 volts from the line and deliver 49 volts at the arc.

Unquestionably Brother Smith has a very complete understanding of the various points involved in a question of this kind. I think, however, that his rating of 42 amperes for maximum operating room consumption is low. But on the other hand he very properly recommends an excess of power both in generator and engine sufficient to take care momentarily of any two of the arcs, or of the dissolver arcs and the spot light, if used together on color effects, indefinitely.

From Boston.

I am informed that Nat Max, of Local Union 182, is entering the employment of Mr. Dadman, who issues a weekly local-event film in Boston. In what capacity Brother Max is to act deponent sayeth not, but, nevertheless, I wish to call attention to the fact that Max enjoys the reputation of being one of Boston's best operators, inasmuch as the Boston Local includes many high class men, this is saying considerable. This simply once more points the fact that when there is a chance for some one to be lifted out of the crank turning class the man who has the reputation of being the "real goods" is the one selected.

In this connection I also am reliably informed that Billy Franke, business agent of 182, has been offered a position on the road by one of the large film companies, and that the position carries with it a salary considerably in advance of what the Local is paying him. I, of course, would like to see Brother Franke better himself, but, on the other hand, I believe he is a mighty good business agent, and, at the risk of seeming officious, would respectfully suggest to Local 182 that it might be a good business proposition to see the raise, if not go it one better. Good business agents are not a very numerous tribe, and when a local gets one it is a pretty good scheme to have him stick around on the job. Also, brothers, a union ought to be the leader in the matter of good salaries—don't you think so yourselves?

Maine Wants a Law.

Foxcroft, Maine, writes:

Although a reader of the department for almost three years I have never written to it before, as I have no machine or light difficulty to set forth. I will now, however, bring up a topic which I believe should be of interest to all real operators in this state, viz.: a state license for operators. As Maine requires no examination I have no doubt but you, Brother Richardson, have a pretty good idea of the class of operators to be found in about seven out of every ten of our theaters. If you are interested, and care to give this your attention, I will set forth the conditions in general, as I have found them. Outside of the cities the man who understands projection and is in every way competent has absolutely no chance at all with the "Jimmie, the usher" type. It seems that anyone who has watched a machine in operation for a few days, and who is tall enough to reach the crank, is allowed to have full charge of an operating room. I have known of cases where a house would open with a first class operator who was, in a very short time, replaced by a mere boy, because he, the aforesaid operator, would not work for six or seven dollars a week. It appears to me that this is an injustice to the reliable men of our craft, and to the picture business in general. It is plain to see what kind of care a reel receives when placed in charge of incompetent men, or mere children. I find that new films in a short time are covered with oil, have many misframes, and patches lapped four and five sprocket holes, so that the operator who takes any pride in his work must put in from two to three hours getting his new show in shape to run. I believe that the time has now come when the better class of operators should unite in some way and make a move to overcome some of this. It seems to me that some action should be taken toward the securing of a state law compelling every operator to pass a rigid examination, thus allowing only those who really understand projection and the care of films to have charge of an operating room. There are plenty of capable men who have given up operating in this state for the simple reason they cannot afford to enter into competition with boys. The operator has a trade, or profession, just as much as has the mason, the plumber or the doctor or lawyer, and should receive salary in accordance. I should like your views on this subject, also any suggestions you have to offer. I would also like to hear from brother operators in this state with suggestions as to how we can improve conditions.

I would respectfully refer Brother Fowler to an article entitled "Apprenticeship Law" which recently appeared. Unquestionably a state law is the thing. City license laws don't, by any means, cover the situation, since they only apply in the larger cities, and leave the small towns entirely out of consideration. On the other hand, it will not do to pull down too tightly on the small town men. As I have before pointed out many times, there are hundreds of villages with 800 to 1,500 inhabitants which are supporting a sort of family affair moving picture theater. In these villages there is often not sufficient support to enable the owner of such theaters to employ a really competent operator or, for that matter, in many instances, any operator at all. If you make a stringent examination applicable to these theaters you would simply shut them up, and thus deprive, in the aggregate, many thousands of people of practically the only form of theatrical amusement available to them. This, in my opinion, would not be right or just, and I believe state licenses should be in two grades, one a full operator's license to apply in towns of say 3,000 inhabitants or more, and another one as a small town or village license to apply in towns of less than 3,000, the latter to be merely examined as to their knowledge of the handling of film, safe appliances, etc., with the provision that the small town license would not be effective in towns of more than the small town population. This is a somewhat crudely put suggestion, but it embodies the main idea. However, I believe that the age limit for all ought to be the same, the minimum to be placed at not less than 18 and preferably 21 years.

Interesting Letter.

H. J. Fischer, owner and manager, Unique Airdome, Sikeston, Missouri, writes, ordering a Handbook, and enclosing photographs of his airdome.

I am sending, under separate cover, two carbons taken from my projection lamp yesterday. The short one is the lower; the long one the upper. My present operator has only been with me two weeks. When examining things in the operating room several days ago I noticed his carbons were burning in this matter. I told him he had better look into the matter, and that, according to my judgment, there must be some loose connection. At that time I did not observe the holes along the side of the burned carbons. This I first noticed yesterday on the samples I am sending you; last night they burned the same way. The machine is a motiograph Model 1A, regular equipment; 60 cycle, 110 volt current is taken through a Fort Wayne compensarc. The operator says he notices the compensarc does not altogether cut off the juice, and when he changed carbons during the performance night before last he got a shock and had to use insulated pliers to make the change. When the lamp is cold and I take a pair of pliers and rub them along the carbon I can detect a very slight spark, though not enough to feel the current in my hand, but when the lamp is hot, one must use insulated pliers. Can you enlighten me? I am using heavy terminals, but they get too hot, I think, as I notice the solder has run out, and the wire seems to be burning off. Even though the sample carbons look horrible I am getting a splendid picture, though I believe it could be greatly improved if this trouble were eliminated.

I am running a portable roller skating rink and picture show combined; Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays being given to the former. Use four reels of general service.

My tent is 40 x 90 with an individual side wall clear around, outside the guys. Have folding canvas seat-benches, which I find to be the most comfortable and convenient portable seat.

Am playing to good business. Am running the "Kathlyn," "Man Who Disappeared" and "Octavius" series, and although I have only had the first of these they promise to pack my humble little place before long. My competitor has a small place, running Universal program six days a week, four reels per night, and "Lucille Love" on Saturday nights, but even against this my general program, consisting of a Kalem two-reel war picture on Saturday nights has drawn good crowds. We both get five and ten cents. The first thing I did when I became interested in the exhibition business was to subscribe to THE WORLD and I have not missed an issue since, although I entered the game some years ago.

Certainly, brother Fischer, you should not use solder terminals inside the lamp house. Moreover, I should recommend you to carefully study "The Lamp," pages 198 to 201 inclusive; "Carbons," pages 200 to 212, inclusive, of the Handbook, and especially the matter on the lower half of page 200. As to the carbons, I have never seen anything just like them. I am not altogether certain but think the fault is due to hard spots in the carbons. The points of both carbons present that appearance. They are burned to a long, but not very slender point, and on one side of each is a row of pit holes extending up approximately two inches from the end. I am of the opinion that at least that two inches of carbon is faulty—very hard, and that the current simply jumped to spots of less resistance. The trouble might be aggravated somewhat by overload. If I were you I think I would change my brand of carbon, also trying larger ones, say ¾ above and ⅝ below, both cored, or if you can, get them 11-16 above and 9-16 below. As regards the transformer, you should have it connected ahead of the machine, or operating switch, so that when you pull it you cut out the transformer, because when the primary of the transformer is connected to the line the secondary is very much alive, and if you touch both carbon arms at the same time you would get a jolt, but inasmuch as you get a shock from touching only one carbon, is an indication that your secondary is grounded somewhere on one side. Hunt up that ground and eliminate it.

A Correction.

M. Ruben, Detroit, Michigan, writes:

In your issue of August 1 your Detroit correspondent, Mr. Smith, states that the election of officers of Local 199 I. A. T. S. E., has been held and that S. Johnson was elected treasurer and fifth member of the executive board. It is news to me that my name is Johnson. I was under the impression that I was Maxwell Ruben of the Family theater, and I was most certainly elected treasurer and fifth member of the executive board for Local 199.

Oh very well, Brother Ruben! We will slap our Detroit correspondent on the wristlet with a nice little slaplet, and, now that you have full and complete credit, we trust that all is quiet along the banks of whatever river or lake Detroit happens to be located on.

Meniscus-Bi-Convex Lens.

Michigan contributes the following on his experience with meniscus-bi-convex condensers.

I have always been a close follower of the department and the good old World, and have felt that you and I were close friends, although we have never had the pleasure of a personal acquaintance. I have seen so much in the department concerning the meniscus-bi-convex condensers that I talked the manager into buying . . . . . ch them. I have two Powers 6-A motor driven projectors, with the latest style motors. Use 110 d. c. for light and 110 a. c. for the motors. Seating capacity of the house 650. Throw 130 feet on a mirroroide screen. In one projector I placed the maniscus combination and in the other I left my old style condensers, viz.: one 6½ and one 7½. I ran a film through the machine with the new set and then ran it through the other and could absolutely see no difference at a distance, and therefore I cannot recommend the expenditure where the conditions are similar to my own. I have given these lenses a good try out, and speak from experience. I wish to say a good word for the new motors the Power Company is putting out. I was using two of the old style 110 d. c. motors and exchanged them for two 110 a. c. which have so far proven themselves to be far superior to the old kind. They require less attention, and there is no vibration to the projectors.

I have printed this letter because both sides of every question is entitled to be heard, and we wish the experience of various operators in matters of this kind. My own opinion is, and that opinion is borne out by actual experiment here in New York, that the meniscus-biconvex combination is well worth the money. However, it should be clearly understood that these lenses will only operate at their best when spaced the proper distance apart, and possibly the failure to secure better results is due to lack of experiment on this particular point. But laying that aside, to show you what queer things there are, we here find an operator projecting 132 feet, presumably with an ordinary size picture, with one 6½ and one 7½ condensers, which is absolutely abnormal, and not good practice though, after all, the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and if Michigan is getting high class projection with that combination (which seems impossible), we have no right to criticize. This is only the second criticism we have had on the meniscus bi-convex condensers, and the sale of these lenses has been quite extensive. Under those conditions I do not feel that it is up to the editor to do any craw-fishing on his recommendation. I would like to hear from other operators who are using this combination, and I would also ask operators who are using these lenses to carefully experiment as to the result of spacing the same different distances apart.

Speed Controller and Condenser Holder.

W. G. Preddey, San Francisco, California, forwards a sample of his condenser holder and the Preddey speed controller for examination by the editor. The devices are both excellent. The condenser holder is for the back lens only. It is extremely simple, and ought to be thoroughly effective. It consists of a heavy brass ring which is bolted to the inside of the lamp house in such manner that the regular condenser mount is in no way disturbed. In the case of the Simplex machine there are two holes so that the mount can be slipped right on the rods which support the regular holder. The lenses fit into the ring and are held in place by a heavy square steel ring. This holder is, in the judgment of the editor, excellent, though I believe in the case of the Edison and Power machines it might be necessary to block the front lens back somewhat, since I think the lens in a Preddey holder would sit a little bit back of the position it would occupy in a regular holder. This, however, is a detail of no considerable importance. The Preddey speed controller is illustrated above, and its general design and construction is quite plainly shown.

The lower picture shows the method of attaching the controller to the table. The motor sits on the floor or a stand directly under the machine table. The controller is mechanically very well made, indeed, and is remarkable for its extreme simplicity. The casting is in one piece and there are but few parts, none of which shows any likelihood of getting out of order. It seems to me the Preddey controller will do the work it is designed to do, and give purchasers excellent satisfaction. The friction wheel offers almost one-half inch of friction surface to the disc. There is a three-cone pulley on the drive friction, and a two-cone on the friction disc, so that with the variation obtained through shifting the disc and wheel in relation to each other, almost any speed, both low and high, is possible. This device, as well as the condenser holder, has the unqualified endorsement and approval of the department. Brother Preddey is not only a practical operator, but a practical machinist and electrician as well. He has been identified with the business for a long time, and is a member of the San Francisco Operators' Union.

Information Wanted.

A. A. Ashley, Crosby, North Dakota, writes:

> Am building a new theatre and would like to know the size of openings for projection and operator and distance they should should be located from the floor of the operating room. Am buying a new Simplex and don't know just where openings should be to obtain best results. The theatre will be 24x70 feet, drop in floor 4 feet and ceiling 16 feet. Outside finish is cement stucco.

With regard to the openings I would recommend that you leave an opening 12 inches square, the bottom of which should be 30 inches from the floor, and the center of which should be at the line of the lens sidewise. One hole for each machine; this will be the lens hole. I would recommend that your observation port be 12 inches wide, and that its side nearest the machine be 12 inches from the center line of the lenses. I would suggest that you seat a short man in ordinary operating position, and then draw an imaginary line from his eyes to the bottom of the screen, locating the bottom of the observation port two inches below this line. Then have a tall man stand up and do the same thing for the top of the observation port. This will probably give you an opening in the front wall 12 inches wide by nearly 24 inches in height. Now we will proceed to close up almost all of the holes we have made. Place your machine in position and project the light on the screen. After you get the machine anchored and the light finally located just right in the screen, there will be no further occasion to move it. Now set a piece of heavy asbestos millboard, about ½-inch thick, in the 12 inch opening. Now project the light just as though you were projecting it to the screen, and you will have a circle of light on this asbestos board. With a pencil compass, outline the light circle, leeway. Do the same thing for the stereopticon, if you use a stereo attachment, and then cut out those circles in the asbestos board, after which set board back in the whole and cement it tightly into place with ordinary cement. This board should be placed flush with the inside wall so that the fire shutter will fit right down over it. You can, of course, cut the right size hole in the wall if you desire, but it is a big job to locate it just right. When the Simplex machine sits level it is 39 inches from the floor line to the center line of the lens where the small pedestal is used; if the large pedestal is used it is 47½ inches, and if your machines have the large pedestal, then the bottom of the 12-inch-square lens hole should be 38 inches from the floor instead of 30. The observation hole should also be fitted with a sliding shutter, as per page 74 of the Handbook, if there is sufficient room over the top of the hole in the wall to allow this. If there is not then a stationary asbestos board should be clamped over the hole with screws in such manner that it could be raised or lowered as much as is practicable. And in this board a hole 10 inches wide by 5 inches high should be cut at what seems to be the most desirable height. If you do not care to make a port thus then you can cut the hole in the wall at what seems to be the best height, but don't have it less than 10 inches wide.

Wrong Dope.

J. R. Cheney, El Centro, California, sends in reply to Question 43 and writes:

> This is the first chance I have had to get in on the questions. I may try a few more if you don't throw me down too hard the first time. Why is it that all the Famous Players features have such short sub-titles and reading matter? To such an extent is this true that the audience is seldom able to read them. Friend Alfred Fowler, Alliance, Ohio, has the wrong dope on acetone cement. Film with the emulsion on will dissolve, but not so rapidly as without the emulsion; the emulsion itself does not dissolve. I have made my own cement for three years and have never had any trouble with it.

I have had other complaints regarding the shortness of Famous Players sub-titles and letters. The Famous Players Company should remember there is an extreme in both directions. Sub-titles and letters which are too long are "padding," but even that is preferable to having them too short. As to the cement, why I have commented on that proposition before, I think. Your reply to the question was very good. Come again. Let's have your film cement formula.

An Argument.

Texas, after requesting the name of the town be withheld, propounds the following:

> I have two arguments I would like you to settle. First: A has a mirror screen and a new Simplex with a three-wing shutter. B has two 1914 three-wing outside shutter Edisons. A has a throw of 90 feet; picture is 9 feet 9 inches high by 13 feet 6 inches wide, which gives a total of 131⅝ square feet to illuminate. B has a throw of 67 feet with a picture 10 feet 3 inches high by 14 feet wide. Both pull the same amperage through a G. E. rectifier, only B has his projector motors connected on the rheostat. Both pull about 25 amperes. A says his light should be as good as B's. I say A's light ought to be better, for the following reasons: First, A has a full reflective, while B has a semi-reflective screen; second, A has a narrower angle lens, hence his picture should be sharper and better illuminated; third, A does not cover an equal amount of area with his light. Am I right or is the other fellow? Second argument: While talking with an electrician recently he asked me on which current, or voltage, does a No. 6 wire carry the most current, 110 volt or 220? I promptly told him it did not make any difference; that a number six wire was rated to carry 50 amperes, and it made no difference as to the carrying capacity of the wire in amperes whether the voltage be 110, 220 or 5,000, as one ampere was equal to 110 watts at 110 volts, or 220 watts on 220 volts, or 500 watts on 500 volts. This electrician stated I was wrong, and almost made several other fellows believe it. He says No. 6 wire will carry 50 amperes on 110 volt current, which, of course, is correct, and would carry 100 amperes on 220. Kindly omit the name of the city, as it will save A, who is a very good boy, and anxious to learn as well as I am, from any embarrassment.

With regard to your first question, you have neglected one important point, and that is what kind of surface this particular mirror screen has, viz.: satin finish or rough. But, regardless of that fact, a given amperage projected on a mirror screen of a given area, and the same amperage projected on a semi-reflecting metallic surface screen, will give the former a very considerably brighter illumination than the latter. In other words, the mirror screen has a greater reflective power than any other projection suface in use, and this is particularly true if the mirror screen in question be what is known as a "satin" finish. Most certainly, other conditions being equal, A should have the brighter screen. The shutters of the two projectors, however, cut a very decided figure in this matter. I would have to have an exact pattern of the shutter of both these machines in order to figure out precisely the amount of light cut by each shutter. This could not be done without having the actual shutter, or a pattern of it, by reason of the fact that machine shutter manufacturers frequently change their shutter pattern. To sum this whole matter up, if the shutters of both machines cut an equal amount of light, A should have far the brighter picture, because he has a better reflecting surface and less surface over which to spread his available light. I assume that each uses the same make and size carbons and that the sets are identical.

With regard to the second argument: why it is amazing that any man claiming to be an electrician would put up such a totally absurd argument as that. Either this electrician is deliberately trying to make a monkey of you, or else he lacks many jumps of being an electrician. A No. 6 rubber covered wire was rated to carry 46 amperes, and when weatherproofed 65 amperes. This rating has only recently been changed, and I do not remember just what the new rating is. However, assuming it to be 50 for r. c. it would not matter a particle what the voltage may be, the wire would be rated to carry fifty amperes. It would convey more power, yes, because watts represent power, and the capacity of a wire to convey power would depend very largely on the voltage. If it is working at its capacity of 50 amperes and the voltage is 110 the h.p. that wire could convey would be (50 × 110) ÷ 746, but if the voltage were raised to 220 then the power that wire could convey would be equal to (50 × 220) ÷ 746 and if the voltage be 5,000 the horse-power that wire could convey would be equal to (50 × 5,000) ÷ 746, but in no event could that wire convey more than 50 amperes without overstepping the rating of the underwriters. As to a No. 6 wire conveying 110 amperes of current, why it would, at a guess, take it about thirty seconds to become white hot and fuse.

Rejoice, Oh Ye Afflicted!

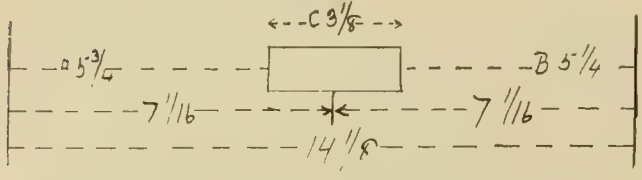
Rejoice with the operator who is cross-eyed; he can watch the screen and his lamp house at the same time.—Ex.

Yes, but the real joy would be that he could watch his picture and the poultry in the audience.

Those Slipped Cogs.

On page 835, August 8th issue, appears a letter from Roy A. Goggin, Estherville, Iowa. In my comments, I insinuated he slipped a few cogs. Brother Goggin replies to the same as follows:

As you say, I guess I slipped some cogs; therefore will attempt to make clear what I was really trying to get at, using a sketch this time.



We will suppose that the lens to be measured is 6½ e. f. We will find the b.f. of the complete lens, which in this case is 5¼ inches, and mark it down on a piece of paper, as per A in sketch. Next we will measure the length of the lens from the outside of one end to the outside of the other end, as per C, this being 3⅛ inches. Next we will turn the lens around and get the b.f. from the other end, as per B, which is 5¼ inches. We now add the whole thing together, and have, as a result, 14⅛ inches; one-half of which is 7 1/16 inches, so that if we measure, as per sketch, the point of e.f. would be located 7 1/18 inches from either end of the measurement, which would be ¼ inch nearer the back set than it is to the front set. As I before said this is my way of locating the e.f. If I am wrong you will have to show me some other way that is more nearly correct. In closing I would like to inquire why some machine manufacturer does not make a rewind specially to be run by motor. We are trying to get a heavy rewind with a pulley on the reel shaft, but all we can find is a hand rewind which, in order to use a motor you must remove the crank, and substitute a pulley, and when this is done, unless the pulley be very large, the thing will run altogether too fast.

Well, really, old man, I do not know whether you are right or wrong on the proposition of the e.f. At first thought I was inclined to say that, even allowing your argument to be correct, the finding of the b.f. at the rear end of the lens and the adding thereto of half the distance between the two combinations would be sufficiently correct for all practical purposes. However, come to think the matter over, it is often very essential that the lens be measured with a great deal of accuracy, particularly by exchanges when sending out tubes to project a picture of a certain given size at a certain given distance. I would like to have the opinion of brothers James, Griffiths and others on this particular proposition. One point I am still not quite clear on, however, and that is: would the 3⅛ inches be from the front face of either lens or from the end of the lens barrel? I assume it is the end of the lens barrel, and that the b.f. measurement is not taken from the lens but from the end of the barrel. The effect would, it seems to me, be the same, and by adopting this plan it would be considerable less bother. As to the rewind you look back through the department for a few weeks and you will find a description of exactly what you want—the Smith rewinder. It is a really excellent piece of mechanism.

Don't Do It.

C. H. Mahone, Cordell, Oklahoma, orders a Handbook and writes:

I have a big piece of canvas, and am trying to make a curtain. Have put two coats of silverine on it, and it still does not bring my picture out. On outside scenes it is fair, but on inside ones and colored films it does not come up at all. Please advise me as to some reliable preparation to which I can treat my canvas, and get a good picture.

I would by no means advise you to use silverine or any other metallic coating. Such surfaces can only be successfully made by those who have had large experience. The best thing you can do, in my opinion, is to coat your screen with muralite, alabastine, or some one of the other patent calcimines which can be obtained at any paint store. Then turn on a white light and draw pencil lines about one inch inside the light; next mix lamp-black with one-half boiled oil and one-half turpentine and coat the outer end of the screen, up to the pencil marks, with it, thus outlining the screen in dull black with the picture overlapping on the black by one inch. I readily admit that there are those who have reported having made a thoroughly satisfactory home-made metallic surface screen. I think these men are perfectly honest in their belief that their home-made curtain is an excellent article, but I also think they are in error and that a calcimine screen would deliver superior results. This must, however, be qualified by the following: in some houses the manager will only allow the operator to use very weak amperage at the arc and when a.c. is used under these conditions the light is so very dim that it is the worst feature of the wretched result. Any semi-reflective surface will, of course, improve the illumination somewhat and, the light being too weak to produce halo, the home-made screen is an improvement. But put this same screen up under normal projection conditions and if there were not heavy halo haze at least there would certainly be a harsh, metallic tone to the picture.

We have followed the department very closely for a number of years and have received much valuable information therefrom. And now we want to make a special inquiry. Have just installed two Powers 6-A hand-operated machines. We also installed a Wagner single phase converter. Our throw is 60 feet, and we are using a 3¼ lens, which gives us a 14 foot 9 inch picture at 73 feet. Do you think this is too large a picture for a house of this length? We use some General film, together with Universal and Famous Players. We do not have much trouble with the General or Famous Players, but in a number of makes of the Universal, such as Gold Seal, Victor and Powers, we are annoyed by excessive jumping of the sub-titles, the Gold Seal being the worst of the lot. Do you think this is caused by faulty sprocket holes? Or, in other words, have you ever received complaints of this kind from exhibitors using Universal service? We use d.c. through a Wagner rotary converter, and our shutter is three-wing. We seem to have a little flicker in the picture. Would a two-wing shutter help? Do you think a 4⅝ shutter would better this condition on account of the short throw and the large picture? On all our pictures we have an up and down movement, which we feel sure does not come from the machines being on poor foundations. Do you think this is caused by the intermittent sprockets not being set properly? The machines have been in use two months.

Now, here are queries which will cause city operators to elevate their noses and say that I ought not to answer such elementary questions. However, these same city operators should stop and consider that the seeker after knowledge is managing a theater in a small town, and while I do not know this to be a fact, still I presume that the patronage is not such as to allow him to employ a high class operator, or possibly any operator at all, therefore, I take the position that he is entitled to have these questions answered, and that the answering of them will enable him to put on a better picture. The answering will not only benefit the brother, but will benefit all the people in that little town, since they are undoubtedly practically all patrons of this theater. In the first place, Pennsylvania, I have had complaints with regard to the makes of films you have mentioned, and the trouble is in all human probability due to imperfect perforations, though it is possible they print their sub-titles on very light film stock which would also have a very decided tendency to produce unsteadiness. No, I don't think your picture is excessive in size; in fact but little larger than it should be if the back seats are 73 feet from the screen. Most certainly a two-wing shutter would not help to eliminate flicker; it would make it worse. Due to the rather short focal length lens you are using your main shutter blade is necessarily a little too wide to give the best possible results. Possibly you could use one a trifle narrower. I would suggest that you take your present shutter off and cut a cardboard pattern exactly like it, substituting this cardboard pattern for the shutter blade of your present shutter. Now, having done this, trim off 1/16 of an inch from either side of the main blade and watch the results. Then trim off another 1/16 of an inch and so on until a flash of white appears, either up or down, from white objects in the picture, whereupon you have passed the limit, and must make the main blade just a little bit wider. You will then have the best shutter you can get under the conditions. Be sure, however, that your shutter is set up just as close to the lens as you can get it. Are you sure that the face of your intermittent sprocket is perfectly clean? It should be washed every day, using an ordinary toothbrush and a little kerosene. A small quantity of gum or dirt on the face of the intermittent will make the picture unsteady. If the sprocket is perfectly clean and there is still a regular up and down movement, four times to every turn of the crank, then either the sprocket is not true or the sprocket shaft is sprung, the latter being exceedingly unlikely. If the up and down movement occurs only once to every turn of the crank then it is due to the swaying of the machine, but this, with the Powers 6-A is also exceedingly unlikely. I would suggest that you study the General Instructions, pages 213 to 228 inclusive, of the Handbook, and the Powers Instructions, pages 270 to 290 inclusive, particularly General Instruction No. 16, pages 219, 220, 221, 222 and 223, which deals with the shutter. If you have no copy of the Handbook you ought by all means to have one. It is a 423 page book, price $2.50, from the MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

Motor Speed Control.

Harry Grant, Placerville, California, criticises the reply to Question 36 as follows:

> With regard to methods of controlling speed on a series wound motor, other than rheostatic control (answer to Question 36, page 566, July 25th issue), there are several. In the first place rheostatic control is wasteful, especially in large motors and motors with variable loads, and where constant speed is required it would be found quite difficult to obtain the same with rheostatic resistance in series with the armature. For instance: assuming that the load is suddenly applied on a motor and the rheostat is on a certain point. The motor will slow down a trifle, thus allowing more current to enter the armature, but the disadvantage is that the drop through the rheostat increases with every increase in load on the motor. With small motors these things can sometimes be considered negligible, but they cannot be considered thus when dealing with large units.
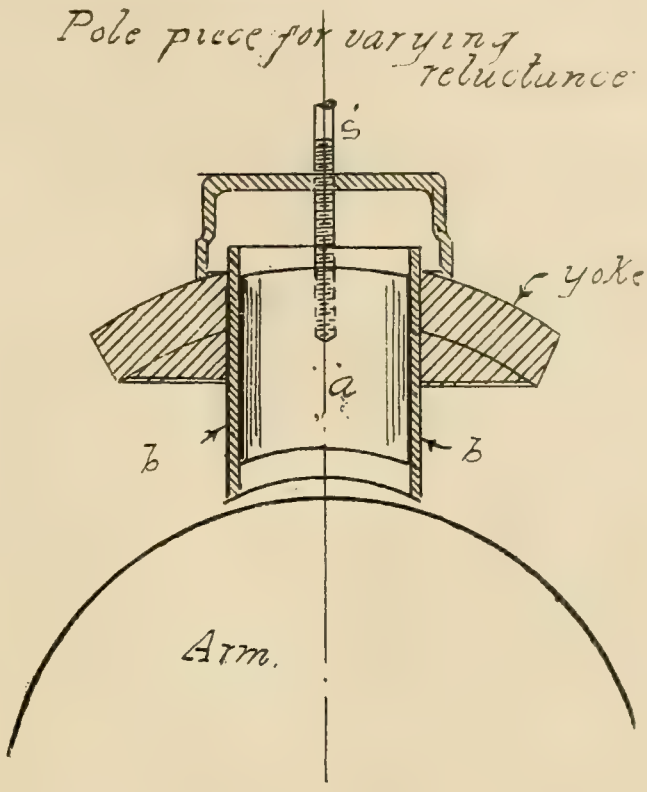
> A far more effective system is, as you doubtless know, the multivoltage system. The principle of it is a motor operating from a dynamo generating different voltages. These systems can give four or five different voltages, any of which can be switched in on the motor, or motors, by means of a controller or suitable switches. These systems eliminate rheostatic control through the armature. I believe the size of motors and the number of them in the average picture theater are limited, therefore the first cost of this system would probably be beyond the average house. There is another system by which a powerful torque can be obtained at a very low speed, and this can be changed and the motor or motors can then be run at the regular speed with the regular torque, the principle being to give the motor a large current at low voltage and thus obtain a heavy torque. (Torque means turning power. Ed.) I believe the average operator will not come in contact with the above systems, therefore it would not be worth while to send sketches. There is a grade of motor manufactured which does not require rheostatic resistance in series with the armature (again presuming, of course, a series motor). The different speeds are obtained by varying the reluctance of the magnetic circuit by means of specially constructed poles. All the poles are connected together so that by turning a hand wheel they are all moved together in or out, thus varying the reluctance of the magnetic circuit. The makers claim speed variations of from 100 to 125 per cent.



The drawing explains the matter. At the top of screw S is a hand wheel by means of which sliding member B is drawn up or lowered close to the armature. The further B is drawn back the more the flux is forced to travel through the small cross section A and thus the reluctance is very greatly increased. The flux travels through the shell B. I would like your opinion as to the desirability of a motor of this type for operating projection machines. I am employed in a town of 1,500 in which there is one theater, there being found there was only room for it and no more. However, the people have seen the cream of the photoplays, and the theater has been equipped with the latest and best appliances, including good music and up-to-date projection machinery, to say nothing of one of the best types of curtains. The manager is J. B. Travelle, a personal friend of the editor. His motto is: "Nothing is too good for the public," and he has spared no expense in living up to the same.

I could not offer you an intelligent opinion of those motors, though I am informed they are economical. I am also informed that 5 h. p. is the smallest of this type manufactured. As to the various methods of control you mention, I do not think they are of any considerable value to operators, because multivoltage and the other systems set forth would not be encountered, or be available in theaters. Yes, Travelle is an old friend of the editor, and, by the way, the editor sent him a book something like a month ago, and would not mind knowing whether or not Brother Travelle received it. You may tell him if they have no ink in that part of the country he might borrow a stub of a lead pencil; but, at that, Joe is, as our friend the Swede would say, one purty damed gude faller, and I am mighty glad to know he has succeeded.

Could Not Get Along Without It.

H. Penfold, Sudbury, Ont., Canada, orders a Handbook and contributes the following remarks:

> I got one from you some time ago, but sold it to an operator friend. I find the Handbook to be the best friend I have, though I take the World and get a lot of valuable information from the department.

So you see, although he sold his book he comes back for another, which is the best possible demonstration of its value to the operator. As I have before remarked, the sale of this book has been highly gratifying, but I would like to see one in the hands of every operator in this country and Canada, not because it is my book, but because I am firmly convinced that it is worth a great many times its price to any operator or for that matter, to any manager.

Comments on the Films

NEVER TOO OLD (Lubin), September 1.—There are some very amusing incidents in this comedy, written by E. W. Sargent and produced by J. A. Murphy. An old man who has cheated the undertaker for the last ten years still feels young enough to fall in love. He replies to an advertisement in which a young widow offers to become the bride of a wealthy old man. She turns out to be an adventuress with a husband. The old man returns home sadder but wiser. On the same reel with "The Green Alarm."

THE GREEN ALARM (Lubin), September 1.—On the same reel with "Never Too Old." Written and produced by Frank C. Griffin. A slap-stick, rough and tumble comedy, in which a parrot awakens his master in time to shoo two burglars from his chicken coop. There is a chase with burlesque policeman, which causes some laughs.

NO. 28 DIPLOMAT (Essanay), September 1.—Written by Edward T. Lowe and produced by Harry Botter. Richard C. Travers, Minor Watson, Ruth Stonehouse and Gerda Holmes make up the cast. John and Helen are sweethearts. They quarrel and John accepts an offer to go to Africa. He takes Helen's picture to be framed and Helen takes his. The Clerk No. 28 waits on them both and suspecting a lovers' quarrel tries to bring them together. She succeeds and the two are reconciled. A pleasing offering.

THE NEW YORK POLICE DEPARTMENT CARNIVAL (Edison), September 1.—This is a fine visualization and worth seeing. An exhibition of the duties of the police are shown in this film. Several interesting races take place between an automobile, motorcycle, horse, bicycle, all manned by policemen, and a runner. It is developed that such a thing as an Aero-Policeman exists.

THE HAND OF FATE (Kalem), September 1.—This pictureplay unfolds a plot which is not only illogical in many respects but it is also conventional. Its interest hangs on a mysterious shot which wounds a rival, for which an innocent man is blamed. The confession of an eight-year-old boy saves the accused man from prison. Alice Hollister and Harry Millarde have the principal roles. The photography is good.

FLEE, YOU ARE DISCOVERED (Melies), September 1.—This forcibly illustrates a bad habit; that of borrowing among neighbors. Jones borrows a lawn-mower. A lawyer, who is a practical joker, sends him a telegram which causes the deacon (the borrower) to skip town. Several complications occur which cause them to meet in the police station. Confessions straighten out matters and the deacon discovers that he is not a fugitive from justice. This is quite a good comedy.

LIFE'S CRUCIBLE (Selig), September 1.—An unprincipled young man organizes a fake company, of which a struggling young author is given the position as sacretary. Suspicions of the integrity of the company cause the authorities to investigate. The promoter skips and leaves the country and the secretary is arrested. Later, the real culprit confesses on his death bed, the secretary is vindicated and marries the other's sister. An interesting offering.

THE FABLE OF THE REGULAR BEANERY AND THE PEACHY NEWCOMER (Essanay), September 2. George Ade is the author and Richard Foster Baker the producer of this laughable pictureplay. Life in Mrs. Pruyne's boarding house was very peaceable and the boarders are all congenial, until Mrs. Fuller Speed came along and then all the males are crazy over her and the women mad with jealousy. One day her husband came along, she had been "Foxing" them; they had forgotten to ask if she had a better half. Moral: The Article you Admire is usually marked "Sold." It is eceived with continuous laughter.

A VILLAGE SCANDAL (Edison), September 2.—The advent of summer boarders from the city to Haskin's farm causes trouble between country lovers. How the differences are patched up and how the girl in the case becomes involved in a kidnapping escapade is depicted in an amusing manner. This comedy has a pathetic vein and is a very good offering in every respect.

TO BE CALLED FOR (Selig), September 2.—A country hotel keeper's daughter, in pique, because her close-fisted old father will not buy her a ball gown, helps herself to one that has been left at the hotel (to be called for). When the salesman to whom it belongs arrives he asks for the package but the father cannot find it. The salesman attends the ball and discovers it on exhibition on the form of the landlord's daughter. It makes a hit and he sells the entire lot to an old customer present. Later, the girl explains and receives the gown as a present. It becomes her bridal costume and she is married to the rube she loves.

THE LOST CORD (Vitagraph), September 2.—This is a very funny comedy in which Hughie Mack cuts a big figure, helped along by Lillian Walker. The scenes are laid at Coney Island, where they indulge in all the various mechanical freaks, finally end up by going in swimming. Hughie's rival sneaks the cord out of his bathing trunks and they are obliged to call the life guards. He steals Jones' clothes out of the bath house and Jones retaliates in like manner. How they get home causes roars of laughter.

THE CHIEF'S LOVE AFFAIR (Biograph), September 3.—On the same reel with "Love and Hash." A very funny comedy in some respects and some of the scenes were rewarded with considerable laughter. The chief certainly has a strenuous time getting in and getting out.

LOVE AND HASH (Biograph), September 3.—On the same reel with "The Chief's Love Affair." A general mix-up, when taken into consideration it is really the definition of hash.

WHEN MACBETH CAME TO SNAKEVILLE (Essanay), September 3.—A picture comedy depicting how Sophie nearly frightened a "ham actor" to death with a butcher knife. Victor Potel, Margaret Joslin and Harry Todd, the usual trio, are the dispensers of the comedy. A tank Shakespearian troupe arrives in town and puts up at Slim's boarding house. Slim discovers Sophie making sheep's eyes at the leading man. After the performance she walks in her sleep and imagines herself Lady Macbeth. She enters the room of the actor, who discovering her, hikes out of town on the tie route.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 54 (Selig), September 3.—A topical news release which is very interesting.

THE UPPER HAND (Vitagraph), Septembebr 3.—This interesting picture-drama was written by Henry Kirk and William Humphrey directed and played the lead, opposite Leah Baird, who are ably supported by a competent Vitagraph cast. Nothing more despicable can be conceived than a man who will besmirch his wife's name to shield himself. The husband did this when he found he could not gain supremacy over his wife otherwise. She suffers in silence; but a reckoning comes. The wife's fair name is freed in the ending and she finds happiness with a better man. A fine release.

THE WINKING ZULU (Kalem), September 4.—Daub, the artist, paints a picture so natural that it comes to life and he finds himself transported to Africa, the supposition being that the picture is responsible in some way or other for the transportation. His experiences are laughable in the extreme and what he bumps up against creates a lot of comedy.

THE SHELL OF LIFE (Lubin), September 4.—Knowing that the girl he loves reciprocates, an outlaw gives himself up to the sheriff, rather than return to her with the stain of crime upon his soul. Intensity is the merit of this picture combined with good photography and acting. It seemed to please the audience.

THE HOUSE THAT WENT CRAZY (Selig), September 4.—A crook enters the residence of Professor Nutt, who has installed a system of electricity, which controls everything pertaining to the domestic establishment. He gets tangled up and crosses the wires which turns everything in the place upside down, including himself and the whole family. This release is greeted with hearty laughter.

THE BARREL ORGAN (Vitagraph), September 4.—This is written by the famous author, Frank Dazey, and Edmond F. Stratton has ably directed it. The cast, Rose E. Tapley, Etienne Girrardot, Paul Scardon, Edwina Robbins and Helen Costello, is a guarantee that the comedy is of a high order. The many scenes inculcated, which as full of comedy complications, helped along by a monkey assistant of an organ grinder, are productive of spontaneous laughter. There is a fire scene in which the monkey proves himself a life saver.

FOR THE CAUSE (Biograph), September 5.—In this picture play we are given an illustration of the inside workings of the international spy system, which is very topical just at present. A young American has invented a high power explosive and a foreign power makes an attempt to secure the secret. Many interesting incidents take place and a love theme permeates through the plot. A well made and interesting picture.

HEARTS OF THE FOREST (Edison), September 5.—A picture drama written by Frances M. Wright. Featuring Margery Ellison, Augustus Phillips and Helen Coughlin. There is considerable heart interest in this story and the worth of a good woman in the time of need is beautifully demonstrated. The photography is clear and bright and the acting is all that could be desired.

BRONCHO BILLY, THE VAGAEOND (Essanay), September 5.—A heart interest drama, featuring G. M. Anderson, who is both author and producer. Broncho risks being hanged in attempt to obtain food for a starving family. He even steals the money and after giving it to the little girl he escapes on another's horse. He is captured and about to be hanged, when the little girl explains and returns the money. The posse returns it to her with a liberal collection.

THE GAMBLER'S REFORMATION (Kalem), September 5.—This is a story of the West, which includes in its characters, who work out a most strenuous plot, gamblers, miners, Indians, half-breeds, etc. As an Indian story it is not better or worse than the usual releases of this nature. The acting and photography are up to the standard and the ending is satisfactory. It will please those who like sensation.

A FOOL THERE WAS (Lubin), September 5.—This is a foolish sort of an offering that demonstrates to what measures a man will go to make an impression on a girl. He borrows the money to buy an automobile which he imagines will make the desired hit; he hopes to make her his wife but finds she has already married the chauffeur.

PAWN TICKET NO. 913 (Selig), September 5.—A girl carried away by charitable work, pawns her necklace in her enthusiasm to obtain money to continue her work. This act causes a row between her lover and a disgruntled rival. This is quite a clever comedy drama of a mild order.

LOVE, LOOT AND LIQUOR (Biograph), September 7.—On the same reel with "Bluebeard the Second." A stenographer locks a tramp in the safe and goes out for help. Her sweetheart thinks she is locked in the safe and also hikes out for assistance. Dave Morris, Madge Kirby and Reginald Morris have the leading parts. Quite a laughable number.

BLUEBEARD THE SECOND (Biograph), September 7.—On the same reel with "Love, Loot and Liquor." Seeking another favorite Bluebeard becomes enamoured of a photograph and commands his man Friday to find the original on pain of death, but boob Bluebbeard finds only trouble.

AN ABSENT-MINDED CUPID (Edison), September 7.—An Ashley Miller comedy, who also is the producer. William Wadsworth has the leading role, supported by Gladys Hulette and a good comedy cast. Through absent mindedness a millionaire (William Wadsworth) was continually getting into trouble. Gwendolyn (Miss Hulette), a clerk in a book store, was the object of the affection of two clerks. One of the clerks takes the young lady out to dinner. He carries his money in his overcoat pocket, which is taken by mistake by the millionaire. The young man is involved in an awful mess. But the incident determines the future of the young couple. Good comedy well done.

WHEN KNIGHTS WERE BOLD (Essanay), Septembebr 7.—A side-splitting comedy of "Ye Olden Days," but played with modern equipment. A young earl is disgusted because his parents insist that he marry the girl of their choice, not his. He is much interested in a book, "When Knights Were Bold," and wishes that he might have lived in the days when he could fight for his lady-love. He sleeps and dreams that his wish has come true. Many humorous scenes occur. A wholesome comedy.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 55 (Selig), September 7.—Many topical scenes are shown of the latest happenings. Of an interesting, educational value.

THE UNDERWRITTEN PLAY (Vitagraph), September 7.—A commendable story written by J. Harwood Panting, picturized by Edward Montagne and produced by Theodore Marston. With intense hatred, the old man attempts to shoot the son of the man who stole his wife's love. His daughter, with a strong love for both, prevents the deed and he consents to their marriage. An agreeable surprise ends this offering.

THE HIDDEN LETTERS (Vitagraph), September 1.—A two-part drama featuring Norma Talmadge, Julius Swayne Gordon and Antonio Moreno, supported by an excellent company. A young girl falls deeply in love with a man whom she thinks is unmarried. She finds out that the wife is carrying on a flirtation with her cousin, an artist. The woman is killed in an automobile accident, and the girl, to obtain letters written to the wife by her cousin, surreptitiously enters the residence of the man she loves. In an intense scene occurring when he surprises her in her search, he shows her the bundle of letters which he has already found. Realizing the sacrifice she is making, for his welfare, he asks her to later become his wife. This is a well acted and highly interesting picture.

BY WHOSE HAND (Lubin), September 2.—A two-reel pictureplay written and directed by George W. Terwilliger. This picture contains several inconsistent scenes, one of these being where the body of a man who is found murdered, is carried in to a house by the sheriff and posse and laid on a library table, prior to the viewing of the body by the coroner. The sheriff seems to make a strenuous effort, in a sort of third degree manner, to make all the inmates of the room, or at least some one of them, confess to the murder. The sheriff, by strategy, finally discovers the real murderer.

THE OIL WELL CONSPIRACY (Kalem), Septembebr 2.—This two-part pictureplay, which contains strong dramatic qualities, tells the story of the Universal Oil Company's plot to gain possession of an oil well and how Millie (Helen Holmes) succeeds in foiling the plotters, fills the story with action that is up to the ginger mark. It is a well photographed picture and has been well directed and acted. A very realistic scene in which an oil well is torpedoed making it a producer is the punch of the picture.

THE FACE IN THE CROWD (Lubin), Septembebr 3.—This is a two-part picture drama. Marc Edmund Jones wrote the scenario and Paul M. Powell directed it. It is a melodrama full of thrills, which probably will please the portion of the audience that enjoys this sort of action in a pictureplay. "The Face in the Crowd" proves to be the leering countenance of the vice king. A considerable amount of gunman action takes place. There is some pathos regarding a little child, whose innocent evidence, in the finale, assists the State Attorney in apprehending the ringleaders.

THE VIKING QUEEN (Edison), September 4.—A pictureplay in two parts written by Y. Spinner and directed by Walter Edwin. In the days of yore, when the viking sailed the seas of Norway, Queen Helga (Mary Fuller) of Drontheim, was loved by all but Ragnarr and his followers. One night they seize their Queen and incarcerate her on an isolated island. Ragnarr usurps the throne and inaugurates a bloodthirsty reign. Later he is assassinated and Queen Helga regains the throne and brings joy and happiness to her people. A pretentious number.

UNDER ROYAL PATRONAGE (Essanay), September 4.—This two-act pictureplay is adapted from the Munsey Magazine. Featuring Francis X. Bushman. An interesting plot is developed. A couple to avoid marrying, the Prince and Princess of two little Kingdoms, prevail on American friends to pose as themselves. It transpires that though they do not know each other's identity, they discover that they are in love with each other all the time. The American boy and girl fall in love, the result being happiness to all.

TOO MUCH UNCLE (Vitagraph), September 5.—A special feature in two parts. Produced by Ralph Ince, the plot of which resembles very strongly the old comedy of "Jane" with the babies cut out. However, it is a laugh producer. Uncle Joe (Adelbert Roccardi) insists that his nephew shall marry and settle down. He is foolish enough to inform his uncle that he is already married. The uncle arrives and, to deceive him, the nephew borrows his friend's wife. This brings about the comedy complications.

THE DEVIL'S DANSANT (Kalem), September 7.—This two-part picture has been reviewed at length in the Moving Picture World and can be found on page 1354, issue of September 5, 1914.

WHEN THE WEST WAS YOUNG (Selig), September 7.—This two-part play contains that which is of great interest. The scenes are laid in the wild west. A mother is brooding with sorrow over the loss of her little child, but her feelings of despair are somewhat mitigated when her husband brings home a baby he has saved from marauding Indians, after they have killed its parents while under the influence of fire-water. A good picture.

Independent

ANIMATED WEEKLY, No. 130, September 2.—A picture of President Wilson leads this number; then comes scenes of Canadian troops mobilizing, gatherings in Trafalgar Square and Scotland Yard, and other incidents of the war. Numerous other views of general interest are shown.

HIS WINNING WAY (Princess), September 4.—A farce with broad humor; it makes a good general offering. The high finance of its hero, a youth who will only be acceptable to Dad as son-in-law when he has $10,000, and whose name is Gottispile, gives the picture a very entertaining touch of freshness. In the end, he becomes Gottispile de facto as well as de jure; but it is a legacy and not the finance that does the trick for him. People will enjoy it.

O'FLANAGAN'S LUCK (Royal), September 5.—Farce imitating Keystone offerings. It is filled with rough and tumble stunts; but somehow the comical cops, while they may make many laugh, do not seem so comical as they do in the original Keystone atmosphere and in pictures where even the original cops are at their best. The action is set at Coney Island.

THE BROKEN DOLL (Sterling), September 7.—A child story, with Little Billy and three other children in it. One of the girls has her doll run over by an auto. The children are cute and attractive, but the plot in this offering is very thin.

THE ROUNDERS (Keystone), September 7.—Chas. Chapman and the Fat Boy appear in this as a couple of genial jags. The humor is not of an offensive sort, though few performers can avoid this in such scenes. The angry wives follow them and they take to a boat in the lake, which is swamped in an amusing manner.

SIERRA JIM'S REFORMATION (Majestic), September 8.—A typical hold-up man story in early Western days. It is not very dramatic but has unfaltering action, speedy riding, good acting and some acceptably pretty scenes. It is too slight a picture to be long remembered; but should go well on a program.

MOTHERLESS KIDS (Beauty), September 8.—Harry Pollard appears in this as a young widower with two children. The widow next door wants some "kids," and the stupid gardener takes the children to her. Of course, a marriage with the widower eventually follows. This makes a pleasing domestic comedy.

BREAK, BREAK BREAK (American), September 9.—A pretty picture telling an idyllic love story; it should go very well; for, though it depends on sentiment rather than on thrilling dramatic suspense, it holds the attention strongly and is filled with the atmosphere of the good, old-time stories and poems. The costumes are of the mid-Victorian period in rural England. Many of its scenes are as charming as good pictures. The acting is also of excellent quality. Vivian Rich is the heroine; Harry Van Meter, the hero, and Jack Richardson, the light villain. Much of the action is among the hay fields and then on the seashore.

THE SHERIFF'S CHOICE (Reliance), September 9.—An Arthur Macley picture; he is both leading player and producer. The story is obscure for a few scenes; but becomes clear and builds through commonplace incidents to a startling and highly sensational climax. The whole picture exists just for this ending which is new and will be counted worth while. It is fair in acting, stagecraft and photography.

MABEL'S LATEST PRANK (Keystone), September 10.—Mabel meets a masher in the park while en route to get a position as maid. Later she finds the man was the husband of her new mistress. There is an exciting chase scene, and the picture winds up with everyone in the lake. The photography in this is good, and it follows the lines of former nonsensical offerings.

IN DANGER'S HOUR (Thanhouser), September 11.—A simple but effective film story in which the twin girls make friends with a collie dog. Later the dog rescues one of the girls from drowning. The scenes are well taken and there is a pleasing sentiment in the story.

FOR HIS FATHER'S LIFE (Eclair), September 12.—This is an old plot, in which the young Westerner rides twenty-five miles in a given length of time to get medicine for his sick father. The chief interest in this is the ride; the jump from horseback to the train, and the subsequent ride down the high bluff, were good features, Joe Ryan playing the hero. The story itself is very ordinary.

MABEL'S BLUNDER (Keystone), September 12.—Mabel mistakes her lover's sister for a rival in her affections. She acts as their chauffeur and the principals all go to a restaurant. A slap stick finish results, but the humor of this is not very strong.

CATTLE (Frontier), September 13.—The story value in this is about of average interest, and the photography is too light in many places. Some of the scenic effects are of exceptional interest, and if portrayed a little more successfully would have carried the reel finely. The cattle roundup feature is a good one. The plot is simple and not very strongly handled.

THE SCARECROW'S SECRET (Frontier), September 13.—A Western number of about average interest. The son borrows the clothes of a scarecrow in order to rob his father. Later the money is found in the pocket of the scarecrow. There is a certain naturalness in the development of this story, but it is loosely constructed and not very convincing in places.

HER BOUNTY (Rex), September 13.—This features Pauline Bush as the daughter of a factory owner. Her humanitarian impulses take her to the plant, where she falls in love with one of the employes. Later she gives him up and sends her wedding dress to Bessie, whom he was originally to marry. A sympathetic story of sacrifice, nicely presented.

ALL AT SEA (Keystone), September 14.—A story of two sailors and their rivalry for the landlady's hand. She inherits a fortune and there is a chase in gasoline launches. There are some funny incidents in this but as a whole the production is only fair.

TRAPPED IN A CLOSET (Sterling), September 14.—This comic film reverts somewhat to the old-style eccentric. Two men are hauled away in a wagon, locked inside a wardrobe. The police follow and there is a lot of wild revolver firing. This has amusing spots in it, but not much plot.

A JOKE ON THE JOKER (Crystal), September 15.—This pictures some of Vivian's misdemeanors while visiting some old people, such as putting rat poison in the soup. The humor in this seemed off the key and it caused little amusement.

THE SCARECROW AND THE CHAPERONE (Joker), September 15.—This is only an average offering. Louise and her girl friends dress in the cowboys' clothing to deceive their chaperone. The plot is very slight.

BEAU AND HOBO (Joker), September 16.—Another offering in which the young dude poses as a hobo in order to see his girl. Then the real tramp comes along and complicates matters. The makeups are good, but the plot is too familiar to arouse much interest.

BOMBS AND BANGS (Keystone), September 17.—A number of "rube" characters appear in this. The chief feature is where the girl sleepwalker carries a lighted bomb through the town, causing great excitement. This is fairly amusing.

THE MISTRESS OF DEADWOOD BASIN (Rex), September 17.—A well-photographed story of the lumber camps, with Robert Leonard, Ella Hall and Harry Carter in the cast. The characters ring true, and the story is an entertaining one. Bob saves the girl from the drunken foreman and wins her strong regard as a result. Harry Carter handled the foreman's role very creditably. This is a good yarn of the lumber camps.

THE TROUBLESOME WINK (Nestor), September 18.—A well-known stage property is utilized again to make fun in this picture in which Victoria Ford takes the part of a woman afflicted with a queer nervous complaint that strange men who meet her on the street misunderstand. They follow a never-intended invitation, and the result is often laughable. It is a very fair offering: but there have been other pictures happier in portraying this peculiar conceit.

LOVE AND GRAFT (Joker), September 19.—In this Max Asher appears in his familiar role as chief of police. Bob Vernon and Louise Fazenda are the young couple who finally gain his consent to wed after some amusing antics. This contains a lot of eccentric nonsense, some of which is quite laughable. Successful low comedy.

Independent Specials

IN THE NICK OF TIME (Reliance), September 5.—A two-reel railroad story, abounding in action and winding up in a pleasant way. The action in the first reel was, if anything, too rapid, as the situations were jerked about without obtaining proper force in some instances. The young telegrapher wins his first promotion by saving a valuable express shipment from the yeggmen. He then takes to drink, is discharged and later retrieves himself in the West by saving a passenger train at an abandoned station. The closing reel is especially well handled. The photography is good.

FOR THOSE UNBORN (Majestic), September 6.—A two-reel picture, whose heroine, played by Blanche Sweet, is a consumptive. It is not a pleasant story and has several of those peculiar situations that are apt to offend sensitive people. The method taken by the girl, who has found that she is tubercular and fears "for those unborn," to break off her engagement is one of these. She arranges things so that her lover will find her "drinking" with a rough but vulgar man and be disgusted. He is disgusted; but the spectator who knows the inner reason for it is not pleased. Then to make her, a sick woman, fall into the hands of the two rowdies who want to lead her off to a lonely cabin is also far from pleasant. The circumstances surrounding these things make them worse. We are too much afraid that it will displease to commend it without reserve for all kinds of houses. It lacks healthy, vigorous life. The producer is William Christie Cabanne.

LOLA (American), September 7.—A pleasing two-part offering, in which an old situation is worked up with skill to make a simple and a fresh appeal. In the first reel an opera singer tells to her manager, over the wine of a fashionable cabaret, where some graceful dancing is going on, the story of how she ran away from her home eight years before. In the second reel she goes to find her folks again and learns that her departure broke the heart of her father (John Steppling). The day after she ran away, her sweetheart, a machinist, had been blinded and had called for her. Her sister had responded, and, finding that he was wholly deceived, she had married him. The producer has been remarkably happy in subtly contrasting the singer's fate that was and that might have been, and this is helped out by a piece of cleverly and freshly contrived camera work that is commendable. It is not a great offering, but a very likable one.

JEAN OF THE WILDERNESS (Thanhouser), September 8.—A two-reel story of the Northwest, abounding in good scenic effects. The story itself is entertaining, though not intense or gripping, and it has no great novelty about it. It concerns the efforts of a gambler to wed the daughter of a man falsely accused of murder. Jean is the Canadian hero. There was some confusion of names in the subtitles. Morris Foster and Mignon Anderson play the leads in this fairly strong offering.

THE MYSTERIOUS MYSTERY (Victor), September 11.—This two-reel production, featuring Florence Lawrence, is quite entertaining, but not as strong as some things we have seen her in. In the story, shown by a moving picture within a picture, she is mistaken for an insane girl and thrown into an asylum. Matt Moore, as the actor-nut, does some humorous stunts in bringing about her release. Later the real insane girl, who imagines she is Florence Lawrence, turns up and recovers her senses. The manner of presenting this, by two pictures, seemed unnecessarily complicated and added but little to the plot.

A GENTLEMAN FROM KENTUCKY (Victor), September 14.—A story of the South before the war, told in two reels. J. Warren Kerrigan adds to his laurels in his impersonation of the gentleman gambler, handling the part very effectively. At first an unwelcome suitor for the girl's hand, he afterward proves his goodness of heart by befriending a man with a sick wife, and also assumes the blame for a murder to save the girl's father. He is saved from hanging at the last moment by the confession of old Jed, an interesting impersonation by George Pierolat. The photography is good and the story entertaining and convincing, with some particularly good character work.

STALE MATE (Gold Seal), September 15.—A two-reel instalment of the "Trey o' Hearts," being Series No. 7. Certain features of this make it exceptionally strong, particularly where Law rescues the girl from an upper window by means of a revolving crane and bucket. The struggle on the steel frame of the apartment structure was also exciting. Cleo Madison's double impersonation is proving a strong one in this series. A good number.

ADVENTURES IN DIPLOMACY (Eclair), September 16.—A three-reel story of international intrigue, adapted from a novel by Jacques Futrelle. The cast is a pleasing one and includes Alec Francis and Belle Adair. The observer is plunged at once into a series of efforts on the part of the conspirators to get hold of certain plans. The girl spy plays an important part in the developments and later in rounding up the band. An air of mystery is hung over the various scenes, and at times the meaning of certain action is a trifle vague. This production contains nothing very new in plot, but it is well constructed, and the interest is maintained from start to finish. The photography is also good.

A TALE OF THE NORTHWEST MOUNTED (Broncho), September 16.—A two-reel Western offering abounding in pleasing wood scenes. Joan's lover turns out to be a whiskey smuggler. He plans to get rid of Gates, the officer on his trail, and succeeds in getting him discharged from the government service. Gates, who also loves the girl, returns and rounds up Jacques. He is later reinstated and wins the girl. The photography in this number is pleasing and the action good throughout.

A TRAGEDY OF THE NORTH WOODS (Domino), September 17.—A story of the North Woods. The young lieutenant of the mounted police is sent to investigate the murder of the factor, MacKenzie. He traces the motive to the assistant factor, Burke, and then the latter tells his story. It is a tale of vengeance and pictured in a manner that makes the observer shudder. The murdered man had run away with Burke's wife and daughter and when the latter found him they toss coins in the woods to see who gets first shot. MacKenzie fires and misses and then Burke slays him. This is convincing and well presented, but it has a rather brutal touch. It is a strong offering.

THE MAN WHO WAS MISUNDERSTOOD (Imp), September 17.—A two-reel number, written by George Edwards Hall, and featuring King Baggot. Mrs. Walker, Arline Pretty and Ben Hall are also in the cast. Mr. Baggot appears as an old violinist with a faithful dog. He stops at the home of an old woman and relates the story of his early love. The story is entertaining throughout and well pictured. It contains some live racing scenes. The close seemed a little incomplete, many observers no doubt wondering if the old lady would not turn out to be his lost love. Yet, as it stands, the production is full of interest and is sincerely acted.

"NO-ACCOUNT" SMITH'S BABY (Kay-Bee), September 18.—This pictures the trials of a drunkard's family, interspersed with pleasanter scenes when he is a sober, affectionate husband. The Christmas eve scenes were attractive, showing the father and his friends acting Santa Claus to the baby. Later the wife wraps the baby shoes in the mask her husband intends to wear in making a holdup; this works upon his conscience and he gives up the proposed robbery. This two-reel offering is not a powerful one, but it combines wholesome sentiment with pleasing Western views and will interest the average observer.

MODERN MELNOTTE (Powers), September 18.—A two-reel number, featuring Edna Maison and Ray Gallegher. The unsuccessful lover employs the hero to pose as a lord, for revenge on the girl. The hero does this and marries the girl, who later leaves him. But the girl still loves her husband and sends for him. He afterward inherits money and saves her father from financial ruin. It is a question whether his inheritance could make up for the hero's deception of the girl. Numerous things are left unexplained in this production. At the same time it is finely photographed and very attractive in many ways. It is entertaining, in spite of many crudities of construction.

THE HIGHER LAW (Bison), September 19.—This is the second of the series being produced by Charles Giblyn, picturing scenes in the life of the vagabond poet, Francois Villon. Murdock MacQuarrie has the name part and Pauline Bush and Lon Chaney are also in the cast. In this number Villon acts as the emissary of Louis XI, and by his wits succeeds in luring to destruction Sir Stephen, favorite of Edward IV. The atmosphere and costuming are good, and the final scenes dramatic and stirring. Villon appears to advantage in his more poetical aspects; in this incident he is a little too much of the villain. But the production is a commendable one, and above the average in general construction.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY, Episode No. 11 (Thanhouser), September ——This two-reel instalment is episode No. 11 in this series. Flo and Jim, just escaped from Braine, are caught in a train wreck with two of the conspirators. The scene was apparently taken at a real wreck. Later Jim is tied to a railroad track; Flo escapes from the gang and saves him by throwing the switch before the approaching train. There is good suspense throughout this number.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY, Episode No. 12 (Thanhouser), September —.—This is a lively two-reel instalment. The treasure box is raised from the ocean bed on the anchor of a vessel and later thrown overboard again. The conspirators send a man, who brings it up a second time. Norton and Jackson don masks and attend the meeting of the Black Hundred, where they make away with the box. An exciting number.

A PRICE ON HIS HEAD (Hepworth-American), September —.—A two-reel offering, giving a detective story, and with several excellent things that are in its favor as a popular picture. In the first place, the gang of thugs have captured not dead gold, but a charming little boy of the "Little Lord Fauntleroy" type, who is sure to make a strong appeal to the average spectator, and especially to the women. Then the photography is good, and the backgrounds are the doubly interesting commonplace glimpses of a small English village. The story is only fair; but it interests. The acting has nothing especially to commend it, but is acceptable. A fair offering, but nothing above the average.

WHEN WE WERE YOUNG (Warner's Features), September —.—A three-part Indian story, made on the Miller's 101 Ranch, and offering vigorous and freshly conceived scenes of settler days. The chief setting is a little village, with bar room and gambling hall and with an army post and fort nearby. The story's villain is a half-breed, who sells whiskey and amunition to the reds. This character is especially incensed against a sterling Westerner who once saved a young squaw from him. He steals the hero's quirt in order to leave it on the corpse of a victim from whom he steals a big roll of bills. Spectators will foresee that the squaw will recognize the quirt and bear witness that the half-breed stole it from the hero; but, notwithstanding this, there are well pictured incidents that hold the interest well.

TEMPTATION (Warner's Features), September —.—A three-reel offering, made by Cricks Films Studio, of London. Its heroine is tired of home drudgery and, although she is in love, runs away to the city, where she falls into all kinds of danger, is almost trapped into a white slave house. Her sweetheart is an inventor and has perfected a new torpedo; but his model is wanted by a villainous character who finds the girl in the city, recognizes her and makes a prisoner of her, and then uses a letter of hers to trap the man. He is lured to a hut near a river, bound and threatened with death by bomb explosion unless he delivers the model. He won't give in, and they are planning to bring the girl and blow the two up together; but she has heard of her lover's danger and, escaping, brings the police to the rescue. The bomb—a very mild explcder—goes off just as the prisoners escape and the villains enter the hut. The police find their bodies. It is all interesting, very melodramatic and, though it shows little original art, will make an acceptable offering.

THE ARROW'S TONGUE (Warner's Features), September —.—A two-part picture, made by the Miller 101 Ranch Company, and giving the incidents of an Indian raid with a new, strange and startling feature—the method by which the news of the danger is spread. It opens with a settler's finding a skull and an arrow while turning up his first furrow. The story unfolds while he is looking at these. A boy had been shot by Indians with the arrow, and his corpse has clung to the back of a horse which runs across the plain and is seen by settler, immigrant and soldier scout. All these take warning and hurry to the fort. The picture rejoices in many thrilling scenes of burning cabin and Indian attack and has been produced with snappy, exciting action. The director is Martin Farnum. In photography it is acceptable.

WARRIORS OF EUROPE (Feature Photoplay), September —.—This is a single reel of new film giving views of the English army and navy. Subtitles indicate that several of the views of English troops were taken in real action and under fire. There is one, for instance, showing the English infantry attacking an unseen adversary, and this infantry movement is followed by a soul-stirring picture of a troop of cavalry making a charge. It is introduced as "The first battle of the war," but there are no casualties shown. Aside from this, there is every reason to believe that it is a true picture of one side of some deadly engagement. There are several views of English battleships and a short group of scenes showing one of these firing at some unseen mark or, as subtitles indicate, at a German ship. The photography is fairly clear, and the matter is surely of great interest and instruction.

KLEINE SOON TO RELEASE "JULIUS CAESAR."

"Julius Caesar," the mighty photo-drama looked forward to as the greatest of Kleine productions, is almost ready for release. Work extending over a period of eighteen months and taxing to the uttermost the tremendous facilities of Europe's greatest studios, is nearing completion. How mammoth a spectacle "Julius Caesar" is may be understood from advance notices which state that there are 20,000 costumed people in several of the big scenes, a miniature city of Rome covering six square blocks, and a stone fortress built after the Gallic fashion of the times more than a mile in length. The story covers the early life of Caesar, his campaign in Gaul, his war against Pompeii and his final assassination. Anyone of 50 scenes in this mammoth spectacle will equal three of those in "Quo Vadis?" or "Antony and Cleopatra."

MISS EDITH KINGDON HALLER.

IT has been said that photographic likenesses frequently flatter the subject. This may be true in some instances; indeed, it is believed that the business of the photographer would go into a sharp decline if he was not able to show an improvement in some of the subjects that come to his studio. But in the case of the subject of this sketch and the acompanying engraving, Miss Edith Kingdon Haller, the tricks of the comeraman could add nothing to beauty and charm. A dainty bit of femininity, inexpressibly sweet and demure, she needs no photographer to make her one whit better looking than she actually is.

Edith Kingdon Haller.

Along with her natural grace and beauty goes a lot of good sense and cleverness that has brought her into considerable prominence as an actress and photoplayer within a short year, and now that we realize how clever and beautiful she is, it is hoped that she will have all the desired opportunities to appear in pictures to advantage.

Miss Haller is but eighteen years old, but she has been in the theatrical profession for about a year and a half, her first engagement being with the Columbia Players in Washington, D. C., where she appeared for the first time in "The Girl With the Green Eyes." This engagement was followed by a season with the Poli Players, after which she came to New York and was engaged for leading parts with the Ramo company. While with Ramo she appeared in "The Governor's Ghost," "The Criminal Path," "Thou Shalt Not" and other features of equal merit. Her last and most successful part was that of Yvonne in Ramo's "The War of Wars," a part originally played by Viola Allen.

Miss Haller is open for engagement with some permanent picture organization where her talent and ability will be appreciated.

"THE SLIM PRINCESS," BY ESSANAY.

The Essanay Company announces the production in the near future of "The Slim Princess," by George Ade. Although Miss Elsie Janis had an unusually successful run in the play, the motion picture scenario has been adapted from the story, which first appeared serially in the Saturday Evening Post. Several millions read the story and it was declared to be the success of the year. The Essanay comedy-drama will be in four acts with Miss Ruth Stonehouse in the leading role of the princess of slender proportions. Mr. Ade himself will pay particular attention to the staging of the production and one of the great Essanay successes of the year is promised.

SAWYER MAN IN TOWN.

H. A. Sherman, the hustling representative of Sawyer, Inc., for the Northwest, whose headquarters is at Minneapolis, Minn., was in New York during the week ending September 5, making his home at the Hotel Astor. Mr. Sherman's territory includes Minnesota, Wisconsin, North and South Dakota.

"The Virginian"

Five-Reel Production of Famous Western Novel Proves to Be Splendid Entertainment.

Reviewed by Robert C. McElravy.

A PECULIARLY human quality pervades this five-reel photoplay presented by Jesse L. Lasky. To get at this quality one must go back both to the play by Kirke La Shelle and the novel of Owen Wister, each of which met with great success. Through the entire drama the observer is at all times in sympathy with the various characters, knows them intimately and shares their joys and sorrows. Laughter, tears and applause greet the performance, and in its turn the screen production will undoubtedly take rank with novel and play.

Scene from "The Virginian" (Lasky).

The setting is Western and there is at all times a gratifying choice of scenes, ranging from plains to the mountains themselves. The photography is smooth and clear and much of it is of a soft sepia tint which proves restful to the eyes.

Dustin Farnum, so long successful in the stage version of "The Virginian," plays the leading role. His pleasing stature and appealing personality carry the interest of the observers from the beginning. in Western parts, adds to his laurels as the ill-fated Steve. The part of Trampas does not stand out as strongly in the photoplay as in the stage drama, but was well handled by Billy Elmer. Minor characters are not neglected and this production is almost a model in the clever manipulation of characters.

The story itself is full of good humor at one moment and stalking tragedy the next. Particularly amusing was the exchange of babies during the barbecue, the excited parents coming back after driving miles away from the ranch before the trick was discovered.

The tragic trend of this story intrudes itself gradually through numerous scenes. The Virginian first meets Trampas in the saloon and here is brought out in a subtitle the famous exclamation: "When you say that to me, smile!" Later Trampas wins Steve and other cowboys to his standard and they are rounded up as cattle thieves. The hanging of Steve and his companion was effectively suggested by the shadows in the sunlight from the suspended bodies. While this tale is brutal in places none of the scenes are allowed to become unnecessarily depressing.

Meantime progresses the wooing of Mollie by The Virginian. She learns of his connection with the hanging and is so repelled by it that she intends returning East. All of the heavier incidents of the story are given additional force by bringing out the manner in which they react upon this slip of a girl.

One material change from the stage version is in the shooting of Trampas by The Virginian on their wedding day. Instead of drawing out this unpleasant business, there is one brief scene in the barroom where the challenge is passed and then follows swiftly the shooting itself. While this robs the latter part of the production somewhat of suspense, it does not seem to detract from the strength of the story, which is in every way a superior Western production.

Frank Powell

THE work of Frank Powell, the director of Pathe Freres special features, is work that has created a world-wide interest. Not only is it a combination of unique artistry and truthfulness of historical detail, but it bespeaks the vast experience Mr. Powell has had in the motion picture industry. In years Mr. Powell is young, but in directing experience he is ripe and aged, starting as a stage director for Augustus Thomas, he later joined Kirk LaShelle and afterwards directed for several years productions in Europe for Miss Ellen Terry. He then returned to America and made his debut in the motion picture field by directing comedies for the Biograph company. With this firm he was connected for two years, then returning to Europe again, was engaged by Pathe Freres as a producer of historical and romantic drama.

Frank Powell.

Ill health, however, necessitated him resting for a while, but his art and advancement did not suffer, for though he was compelled to quit work, he toured the continent, acquainting himself minutely with foreign costumes and types. On his return to America he was engaged by the Powers Motion Picture Company and after working with them for some time, rejoined Pathe Freres as a director of their special features.

Among Mr. Powell's most recent releases of unusual interest are "The Ghost," a three-reel Colonial drama; "The Corsair," a four-reel Turkish story, necessitating much research and historical exactitude; a three-reel dramatization of the well known classic poem, "Lucille," and "The Stain," a six-reel modern American story that is said to be one of the strongest and most artistic productions ever released.

Y. M. C. A. OPENS THEATER.

The Y. M. C. A. has opened in the new building erected at a cost of $225,000 by the Pennsylvania Railroad at Tyrone, Pa., a moving picture theater with a seating capacity of 1,000. The structure is built of granite. R. W. Charles is the manager. It has a steel and concrete booth built into the theater and is equipped with all the latest and improved projection machines as well as accessories. It is offering each night late, releases and special features for the members and the towns people.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

FILM manufacturers in Chicago are in no danger of having their work interrupted by a lack of developing chemicals. The Selig, Essanay and American plants have each a supply of hydrochinon on hand sufficient to last them for a considerable time to come. Even if they were not so happily stocked, there would be little likelihood of a dearth of the substance mentioned; for an alkaloidal concern in Chicago has already begun the manufacture of hydrochinon and also of metol, the latter being essential in still-life photography.

Both these chemicals hitherto have been imported from Germany, and competition by American or British manufacturers could not be engaged in, owing to the extremely low prices quoted in Germany, German wages being much smaller than are paid in the other countries mentioned. It is almost impossible at the present time to buy metol or hydrochinon in Great Britain or America, and where they can be purchased they are quoted by the ounce instead of by the hundredweight, as formerly.

The Chicago section of the American Chemical Society has been very active ever since the war opened in trying to solve the chemical problems of Chicago's industries, with the result that great progress has been made towards the manufacture of chemicals that were formerly imported, and some of which it was thought could not be made in this country. It is given out that the firm before referred to will have ample supplies of Chicago-made hydrochinon and metol on the local market in three or four weeks. Just as great enterprise is shown by the Chicago section of the society in other industries, and the spirit prevails that Chicago can, and will, work her own way out of the web of difficulties wrought by the war that is now raging.

William N. Selig near Scene of War.

William N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company, has had an experience during his stay in Paris (on his present European trip) that will remain with him for the balance of his life. A cablegram from London, dated Sept. 6, to the Chicago Examiner, which is given below, will convey an idea of present conditions in Paris and of the difficulties encountered by those who try to get out of it:

Americans who arrived in London from Paris today are of one mind with the American refugees who have been pouring into the city for the past week.

According to them, nothing can prevent the Germans from getting into Paris. None of these refugees has a more vivid or more colorful story to tell than William N. Selig, the motion-picture magnate of Chicago, and associated with the Hearst-Selig News Pictorial enterprise.

He told the Examiner today:

"Last Tuesday I was the only person still registered at the Edward VII. Hotel. In the afternoon all the managers, porters, bell boys, waiters, cooks and chambermaids left for England.

"I wasn't staying in Paris any longer than was necessary. In fact, I had hired an automobile to Havre that day. The automobile was put out of the question later in the day by a government decree that nobody could leave Paris after Tuesday night except by train.

"After I got my tickets my party and I went immediately onto the platform and tried to get through the gate, through which we had to pass, to board the train. The mob here was as dense and as full of fight as that inside the waiting room.

"Finally I chanced to overhear a French officer tell the gateman that he was sending his sick wife and children to London and I saw him hand the gateman some money. In a minute the officer and his family were slipped through an adjoining gate. It cost me $10 to accomplish the same trick, but it resulted in my little party and myself getting through to the train.

"At Dieppe, by sheer good luck and careful use of English gold, I managed to get into the cabin of one of the ship's officers.

"The ship carried fully five times as many passengers as her capacity was rated at.

"We arrived in London at 11 o'clock Friday night, sixty hours after we started."

Mr. Selig expects to sail for home in about two weeks from the time of writing.

American Product and the British Market.

There is considerable solicitude in Great Britain just now over the policy that should control the output of American manufacturers at the present time. With the Continental product out of the field the trade depends on the British and American manufacturers to supply the demand. The Bioscope of Aug. 27 devotes a special article to present conditions in Great Britain from which the following excerpt is taken:

"A great opportunity presents itself to the American manufacturer. If he is ready to spend money now in anticipation of future returns, he is going to entrench himself so strongly against attack on the British market that when Continental activities are eventually renewed there will be but little trade to capture. This is a point which must be borne in mind. Retrenchment now on the part ofAmerican and British home manufacturers would mean the stultification of all the struggles and efforts of years. Now is the moment for the pursuance of an aggressive policy—the market is weak through the collapse of Continental trade, the virile competition of the foreigners has been killed, the theatre proprietors in their doubt are asking for definite support, the Britisher and the American should therefore seize the chance to ingratiate themselves while the doors are open and arms are extended to welcome them."

An optimistic view of the future is taken, and belief is expressed that there will be a great filip to public interest in moving pictures. Just as soon as the present craze for war pictures is over, the film business will settle down to its normal condition and the picture going public must be furnished with the right kind of programs.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The Biograph Theatre, at 2433 Lincoln Ave., this city, was opened Saturday, Sept. 5, with Vitagraph's great five-reel feature, "My Official Wife." This house seats 1,000 persons on the lower floor and is controlled by Lubliner & Trinz. On Sept. 12 the same people will open the Vitagraph Theatre, at 3133 Lincoln Ave., with the same feature attraction. This house also seats 1,000 persons on the ground floor. These houses will use all features of the General Film Co., also of the Paramount and Shubert. George Kleine's big subjects will also be included in the programs and "Quo Vadis," Antony and Cleopatra," "Spartacus," "Last Days of Pompeii," "Vendetta," etc., will all be shown. The prevailing prices at both houses will be 10 cents. "My Official Wife" is doing exceptional business at Orchestra Hall, where it is now in its third week. I had the pleasure of viewing this fine feature one evening last week. It is a remarkable production. I could not recall any other occasion on which I had seen such talented photo-dramatic acting as is shown by Clara Kimball Young in these pictures. With the proper handling this attraction should have a long run at Orchestra Hall.

The Picture Playhouse Film Co. has opened an office in Room 511 Mallers Bldg., this city, from which the company will distribute its holdings in the Middle West. S. C. Bestar, manager, states that he has just closed a contract to supply the Star Theatre, 68 West Madison street, with one feature every week.

C. H. Shook, organist and assistant manager of the Rogers Theatre, Fullerton and Maplewood avenues, this city, made a call last week. The Rogers is running Famous Players features every Saturday and Sunday, charging 10 cents straight. General Film Company's regular service is run at 5 and 10 cents. Mr. Shook stated that the "Battle of the Sexes," at an admission of 10 cents, "The Christian," at 15 cents, and "The Spoilers," at 20 cents, were run recently to capacity business. "The Spoilers" ran for two days, four times each day, with seats reserved. Mr. Shook accompanies comedies on the piano and dramas and the heavier subjects on the organ. The Rogers is owned by R. C. Wittenburg.

The erection in Chicago of the only exclusively theatrical hospital in the United States was assured Wednesday, Sept. 2, when the Chicago Theatre Managers' Association voted unanimously to endorse the work of the American Theatrical Hospital Association and to push the sale of bonds issued by the organization for the building of the hospital. The care, without charge, of ill and needy theater attaches, as well as of legitimate and photoplay artists and vaudeville performers, is the object of the hospital. A full account of the American Theatrical Hospital Association, and its work, appeared in these columns several months ago.

"The Spoilers," booked by F. O. Nielsen, was run at the Jefferson Theater, Fort Wayne, Ind., on August 24, 25 and 26. In spite of the fact that Keith's vaudeville house, Sullivan and Considine's vaudeville house and the Majestic, the legitimate local theater, also opened on Aug. 24, "The Spoilers" showed to capacity business at 25 cents admission. The Jefferson seats 1,300 people. W. C. Dodge, manager of the Jefferson, immediately re-booked the films for Sept. 21, 22 and 23. The local press gave the show a great send-off.

This week has seen the celebration in Chicago of the Golden Jubilee convention of the Knights of Pythias. Alfred Hamburger, who is now running "Cabiria" at the Ziegfield, and "Neptune's Daughter" at the Fine Arts Theater, has donated to the Golden Jubilee fund a considerable portion of every admission received from the Knights and their friends at the theaters mentioned.

Upholding President Wilson

Carl Laemmle Arranges for Two-Reel Film Entitled "Be Neutral"—Made by the West Coast Universal Forces in Los Angeles in 48 Hours.

As an example of the good that can be accomplished by moving pictures and the rapidity with which it can be brought about, nothing could be more pointed than the effort which President Laemmle, of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, is making to uphold the hands of President Wilson in his effort to preserve strict neutrality between the United States and the various warring nations, and his advice to all nationalities in our own country to refrain from discussing the war. There are so many of the nations which are now fighting which are represented in this cosmopolitan country of ours that discussion of the war is bound to lead to hard feelings and to even more—in some instances it has already brought the partisans to blows.

The film people realize better than others what wonderful moulders of sentiment the pictures are, and Mr. Laemmle resolved to do all in the resources of the Universal to support the President in keeping America peaceful within and without. In many of the releases which are now being titled, Mr. Laemmle has caused to be inserted titles which serve to remind Americans that this country and all its people are neutral. The following are two examples of these captions:

"A GENTLE REMINDER.

"The millions who enjoy Universal Moving Pictures are again reminded of President Wilson's plea for strict neutrality. Forget the horrors of war. Don't take sides. Appreciate the glories of Peace. CARL LAEMMLE, President,
"UNIVERSAL FILM MANUFACTURING COMPANY."

BE AN AMERICAN FIRST!

No matter where you were born, you're an American NOW. President Wilson asks you to be neutral. Remember his request when next you are tempted to take sides in a war discussion. CARL LAEMMLE, President,
UNIVERSAL FILM MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

But in addition to this very effective way of influencing public sentiment, Mr. Laemmle has decided that a special film showing the dangers of these discussions in a country where all should be at peace no matter who else may be at war would be better than titles in all the Universal films. By telegraph he instructed Manager Bernstein of the West Coast plant to have a suitable story written showing the folly of such discussions and the trouble and danger to innocent persons which almost always ensues upon such a discussion. The story was written, Los Angeles was asked to participate in the work of production, two thousand feet were taken, and the picture was finished within 48 hours.

Los Angeles gave itself up hook, line and sinker to the enterprise. At the request of the Chamber of Commerce of the city two thousand of the residents of the city appeared in the film besides the principals. Four companies of the Los Angeles Fire Department, a Police Captain and fourteen regular policement all engaged in a big scene in the busiest part of the business part of the city, and all the city officials gave all the assistance in their power.

When the film was shipped yesterday it was decided in the offices of the Universal to entitle it "Be Neutral," and it will go out under this caption as the contribution of the Universal to the cause which President Wilson has so near his heart. The following is a synopsis of the story.

Two old men stand talking before a cottage. In the background two younger men bid their wives good-bye and start for work. On their way they meet the two old men, the quartette joining to discuss the foreign war situation. Up the block, before a bank, a crowd stands gazing at a large map of the war zone, each discussing the situation according to his own views. The two younger men leave the two old men, pausing on their way to join the crowd before the bank.

Later, in front of a factory, the two voung men join other workers. Here an argument is going on, and the two young men take sides and enter the discussion. High words follow, which quickly lead to blows. The fight attracts the attention of a worker within the factory, who leaves his hot iron and gazes from the window at the fight below. Seeing his faction in trouble, the worker hurries to join the belligerants. The neglected hot iron seers its way into the garment beneath it, the result being a fire which soon gains headway.

The fighting men below surge from the factory alley into the street. A policeman, finding himself unable to cope with the mob, sends in a riot call. The reserves respond, and many in the mob are injured. Innocent spectators suffer, and are injured, etc. The fire department responds to an alarm sent from the burning factory, but their efforts are in vain and the factory is consumed.

The finale of the picture fades into a vision, in which the two old men, the innocent agitators, see the wives of the two young men as they stand by their husbands, the factory in ruins, the workers standing about, bemoaning the fact that a trifling argument results in a catastrophe.

LAEMMLE REPLIES TO FOX.

Taking exceptions to some of the statements made by William Fox at the preliminary meeting of the Independent Board of Trade, Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, addresses the following letter to the Moving Picture World. We publish it, as we did the speech of Mr. Fox, without comment:

Editor Moving Picture World, New York City.

Dear Sir:—It rather made my blood boil to read in your report of the meeting of certain film manufacturers held at the McAlpin Hotel on August 29th, that Mr. William Fox, in referring to the Universal's fight against the Patents Company, said: "I claim that the Universal did not defend this action as vigorously as they might have, and that they are open to the suspicion that they are all working in conjunction to hold the market—the Universal, the Mutual and the Patents Company."

Nobody on earth knows better than you do how the Universal has put up the stiffest fight it knew how; and how the various companies which were merged into the Universal put up a fight before the Universal was even dreamed of. Nobody knows better than you do that the Universal has stood the brunt of one of the hottest legal fights in the history of moving pictures. Knowing all this, I don't see how you could print Mr. Fox's wholecloth accusation without mentioning in your editorial columns that his attitude was an injustice.

The very men who attended the meeting and listened to Mr. Fox's speech owe their business success (if they have had any) to the fact that the Universal put up a fight for independence! If the Sales Co. and the Universal had not fought and if the Mutual had not fought, where would these so-called "independent" manufacturers be now? Where would Mr. Fox be?

How many of the men who style themselves "independent" manufacturers helped the Universal and the Sales Co. stand the expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars for litigation? Not a blessed one of them! How many theaters could be showing independent films now if the Universal and the Sales Co. had not put up a vigorous and costly fight? Not a single one!

Why, at one time we asked independent manufacturers and importers to contribute to a copyright fund because they were bound to benefit by our victory. How much did we get? Not a blooming red cent, not even a cheerful smile. Their attitude was "well, the Universal has to fight to save itself, and in doing so it will save us."

To fight, fight, fight, month after month, year after year; to spend days and nights working up the strongest possible case; to meet legal expenses with cash out of our treasury and out of our individual bank accounts when we hardly knew where the next dollar was coming from; to keep on making pictures all the time and supplying the needs of the thousands of exhibitors who depended on us; to do all this and then have Mr. Fox lightly dismiss the whole affair by saying that we did not defend this action as vigorously as we might—it's enough to make one's blood boil, don't you think?

I don't know what Mr. Fox is after. We received an invitation from him to attend his meeting. It struck me that he was trying to get someone to pull some chestnuts out of the fire for him. We ignored the invitation. I presume this gave Mr. Fox an excuse for his attack. It at least gave him some quick publicity in his newly assumed role of the Moses of the business.

You've printed his side of the story. I now ask you to print the Universal's. Sincerely yours, CARL LAEMMLE.

COLEMAN ATTENDS MASONIC COUNCIL.

John J. Coleman, until recently studio manager and director for the Gene Gauntier Feature Players, has left for Chicago, to attend a meeting of the Supreme Council of the Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite Masons, held on the 15th, 16th, 17th and 18th of this month. Mr. Coleman is one of the few theatrical men who have attained the high honor of the thirty-third degree in Masonry. Having resigned his position as studio manager and director for the Gene Gauntier Feature Players, Mr. Coleman will devote all of his time to looking after his chain of theatres throughout the South, pending an offer to re-enter filmland as a director.

BOGOTA, N. J., GETS NEW HOUSE.

The Preston Realty Company of Bogota, N. J., is constructing a motion picture theater in that town which will be of hollow tile and concrete construction and will be devoted entirely to pictures. The dimensions of the structure are 40 by 100 feet. The seating capacity will be 300 persons at the time the house is opened, but will ultimately seat 600 when it is finally completed. C. F. Preston and E. J. Wehrley comprise the Preston Realty Company.

Exhibiting a Fine Art

Masterly but Modest Is Walter L. Hill, a Type of the New Exhibitor.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE road to success is filled with men who want to feel that they are "accomplishing something." That feeling is the mainspring of ambition. It is more than that. It is the right motive for good and valuable work. In my travels about the country I have often been astonished by the growing number of exhibitors who are passionately in love with their calling. As every lawyer is proud of his briefs and victories, as every doctor is glad of his skilful operations, and every preacher in love with his church, in like manner every exhibitor is ardent in his affection for the motion picture. This observation holds especially true when applied to the last year or two. There is no surer indication of the sound and promising condition of the industry.

Walter L. Hill.

The man whom I now ask to step into the limelight has for five or six years worked heart and soul to make the motion picture the most attractive and the most instructive entertainment in all the long catalogue of amusements. He has worked quietly and modestly and I do not know whether he will thank me for this well deserved attention but he of all men must realize that merit cannot escape detection.

Walter L. Hill, recently the manager of the Jefferson theater at Fort Wayne, Indiana, and now about to form new and bigger connections, hails from the South and it was in the South that he won his spurs in the exhibiting profession. From the very beginning he "studied" things. He studied them thoroughly, made his deductions carefully and applied his experience practically.

When he was engaged to take charge of the Jefferson theater at Fort Wayne there was little to encourage him. Frequent changes of policy and management, coupled probably with a lack of experience, had produced such results as might naturally have been expected. The capacity of the theater, something like 1,200, was never strained and the clamoring multitudes fighting for tickets were conspicuous by their absence. In less than a year Mr. Hill had converted this barren temple of amusements into the leading motion picture house of Northern Indiana. The work of improvement began, naturally, with a radical reformation of the program. He decided to have the best obtainable.

After securing a program which he felt he might be proud of, Mr. Hill set about to attract the kind of an audience which, in his opinion, would like this kind of program. He advertised, of course, making friends of the journalistic powers of the town, but this was only one shot in his locker. He personally visited all the prominent people of the city, men who were the leaders in the business world in the work of social betterment and indeed of every phase of the sound civic life of the community. He was successful all along the line.

Mr. Hill, to be sure, has an engaging manner and shows his refinement plainly in his speech, but the one thing that more than any other circumstance accounted for his winning over the best elements of the city undoubtedly was the man's sincerity. He has the zeal of an apostle. His words coming out of the heart reach other hearts. Looking upon the motion picture as an inestimable boon conferred on mankind by a beneficent providence, he transfuses this belief into all whom he meets and infects them with his own enthusiasm.

Beside these personal calls, Mr. Hill did many things to keep the Jefferson theater filled from noon to night. His handy and tasteful "leaflets" containing the full program of a day and brief announcements of the programs of the week, were to be found in every hotel and in all the big stores of the city. After a while his leaflets and bulletins began to be sought after, because people soon discovered that every promise made in the bulletin was solemnly kept in the theater and on the screen.

This brings me to the third part of the Hill policy, which is: First get the right sort of program; second, get your audience; third, make your audience as happy and comfortable as you can.

"Much depends," said Mr. Hill, in what he believed an informal talk about motion pictures, the topic of his heart, "on the faithful observance of little things. In this way we can make sure of the right atmosphere. I had no trouble in getting good prices for good features averaging 10, 15 and 25 cents. Once the public found out that I was doing my best for them they repaid me with interest. The number of autos waiting for the return of their occupants from the show increased constantly. On the night I had "Brewster's Millions" I broke all records and the autos were very much in evidence. I tried to invent new ways for attending to the safety and comfort of my patrons.

"It would take me too much into details to recount it all but I know my patrons felt as though they were being taken care of on a 'personally conducted' tour. It was no easy task to keep the program up to its high standard of quality situated as I was in a comparatively small town and at some distance from the exchanges. I think that I made a good many of the most useful members of our community think about the value of motion pictures. It was not long before I was consulted whenever any question arose touching motion pictures and often I was invited to address the various social organizations of the city on the manifold uses of the motion picture. I discovered that educational pictures judiciously selected, and properly presented, were decidedly pleasing to my audiences and I often received calls from churches and schools to put on a special educational picture. The support that I thus gained from the schools and churches formed a material part of my success."

I had this talk with Mr. Hill while he was looking into conditions here in New York and when I asked him what had brought him to New York he said that his trip East was for the purpose of "broadening out." Wherever he may locate Walter L. Hill may safely hang up the sign of success the very moment he takes hold.

AN ERROR CORRECTED.

Several film concerns have been advertising in different magazines the Blaney pictures, "The Dancer and the King" and "Across the Pacific," for which they had no authority, as these pictures are owned and controlled by the Premier Feature Film Company, who went to a great expense in making these famous war pictures by taking a large company down to Tampa, Florida, and under the supervision of Captain Curtis Rorebeck, where they used the entire United States Coast Artillery No. 111. These pictures will be released Sept. 21 by the Premier Feature Film Company at 1465 Broadway, who are now closing contracts with the different state right buyers, and are also preparing to book them with exhibitors throughout the country.

A DENIAL FROM MIEDREICH.

Evansville, Ind., Sept. 5, 1914.

Gentlemen:—I am in receipt of a clipping from Henry Romeike, Inc., 106-110 Seventh avenue, New York City, from your magazine containing an alleged statement from ex-Senator Albert J. Beveridge, to the effect that I have or have had some connection with a bill having for its purpose the censorship of moving pictures.

This is the second clipping that I have received that has connected my name with a bill of this kind and, being false, calls for a denial.

You can quote me as stating that ex-Senator Albert J. Beveridge is in error when he charges me with contemplating the introduction or support of any such measure, and you can charge him with a like error when he states that I am connected with the brewery interests.

I disclaim having any intention now and will say that I never had any intention of introducing a bill of this kind. My name was connected with such a bill without authority, and I am in no way responsible for this, neither am I making plans for the introduction of any bill into the Indiana Legislature, for the very good reason that I have not been elected and have no absolute assurance of being elected.

My present time is taken up by the practice of law, and I feel that I ought to do things at hand rather than to speculate on an uncertain future.

Assuming that you are interested in the truth, you will correct the articles that appeared in your magazine at your earliest convenience. Very respectfully yours,

WILLIAM P. MIEDREICH.

Peerless Feature Company

Announces Clara Kimball Young to Appear in a Picture Written by Owen Davis—World Film Corporation Will Handle Product.

THE announcement was made last week that the Peerless Feature Producing Company had secured the services of Clara Kimball Young, a former Vitagraph player, and her husband, James Young, as leading members of its producing forces.

The first release that Clara Kimball Young will be seen in under the Peerless Company is to be "Lola," which is from a story written by Owen Davis. It will be released in the middle of October through the World Film Corporation. "Lola" is described by its author as a psychological problem play.

The credit for securing Clara Kimball Young is largely due to Lewis J. Selznick, general manager of the World Film Corporation, who has followed Mrs. Young's career as a movie star with interest, and who will see that she is given every opportunity to become one of the brightest stars in the world of the screen.

Other directors engaged by the Peerless company are O. A. C. Lund and M. Tournour.

The Peerless Company officers are Lee Shubert, president; Joseph Rhinock, vice president, and Biton A. Busch, treasurer. It has a complete studio in Fort Lee, N. J., where the Shubert and W. A. Brady releases will be made.

Exclusive control of the Peerless Company's features has been secured by the World Film Corporation.

Through Harry C. Drum, Western representative of the World Film, contracts have been signed for exclusive first runs on all the Shubert and Brady releases with the Turner & Dahnken circuit of theaters in California.

A LESLIE CARTER FILM COMPANY.

Articles of incorporation of the Leslie Carter Feature Film Company have been filed at Albany, New York. The incorporators are M. E. Greenwald, A. S. Werblin and C. L. D. Payne. The address of the company is given as the Claridge Hotel and the capitalization is $5,000.

SETTLING EDISON PATENT SUITS.

During the past week the Gaumont Company entered into a stipulation with the Motion Picture Patents Company, agreeing to pay $6,000 damages for using cameras similar in construction to those manufactured by the latter company without obtaining a license, and a decree was drawn by Dyer & Taylor, counsel for the Motion Picture Patents Company, embodying the terms of settlement, which was formally approved by Judge Mayer. Similar decrees were drafted and approved in the actions against the Crystal Film Company and the Gaumont Company. The former company has adjusted the question of damages by paying $3,000, while the terms of the adjustment were not made public in the other case.

As the life of the patents in question have practically expired, the decrees do not provide for injunctive relief and the defendant film companies will be permitted to dispose of the stock of cameras which are on hand.

It is not often that a film manufacturing company secures the services of a scenario writer so conscientious that to obtain better results he will make a 3,000 mile trip at his own expense to acquaint himself with conditions in the section in which his stories are being produced. That, however, is the sort of man the Universal company secured when they engaged Louis Joseph Vance, author of "The Brass Bowl," "The Black Bag" and other well known books, to write "The Trey o' Hearts."

After having completed the first seven installments of the series, Mr. Vance, whose home is in Washington, D. C., decided that to better adapt his story to local conditions, he would go West and learn under just what conditions the actors are working.

"Never," said Mr. Vance, "have I met with so royal a welcome as was accorded me in your City of the Angels. In the first few hours of my stay, I think I met everyone in the world while events piled themselves so rapidly on top of one another that I am just now beginning to get straightened out."

A Three-part Melodramatic Pictureplay Produced by the Albuquerque Film Co. and Released by Warner's Features, Inc.

Reviewed by Harry W. DeLong.

ALTHOUGH the plot is more than ordinarily melodramatic in this picturized production, there are many heart interest scenes concerning a lovely old mother, whose heart is wrung by the waywardness of a dissolute son, and a true wife's devotion is wasted upon the same individual. There is much of human nature existing through the first part, which takes place in the East, and the vacillating of the son makes stronger the affection existing between the wife and mother for each other. In the later reels there are some stunts pulled off that are the limit as regards sensational horsemanship.

Dorothea Vale found it hard to choose between two suitors—Jack Conway and Jack Livingston. She finally accepts Conway, and after marriage they live with his sweet old mother. For a time they live happily. Conway, a trusted bank cashier, grows prosperous. Then he began to go the pace, neglecting his wife for other women.

Scene from "The Price of Crime" (Albuquerque).

Dorothea learns of her husband's escapades and tries to win him from his ruinous course, without avail. The inevitable happens. Conway is found short by the bank examiner and decides to flee. Detectives, who have followed him to his house, place him under arrest; his trial follows and he is sentenced to a term in prison. Dorothea keeps the mother in ignorance of the true fate of her son, telling her that he is abroad in the interests of the bank. The bank seizes everything of value which Conway had possessed and left his wife and mother in straightened circumstances; but the wife, on the verge of poverty, labors with smiling face and breaking heart to keep the roof over the head of herself and mother-in-law.

Conway manages to escape from prison and, eluding his pursuers, jumps on a fast moving train headed westward. He leaps off the train and is picked up by a band of outlaws. They take him to their rendezvous and when satisfied that he is not a spy they make him one of their number.

His mother is afflicted with a paralytic shock and as a result loses her eyesight. The train in which they are traveling contains a large shipment of gold aboard. The outlaws determine to hold up the train and a female member, spurring her horse forward at full speed, leaps from her saddle and catches the ladder of a box car next to the engine. She compels the engineer to stop the train where her band is hiding. The strong box is dynamited and the outlaws flee with the booty. A posse and sheriff chase them and Conway's horse stumbles and falls. A dozen other horses fall over him, and he is pinned under a pile of struggling horses and men and mortally injured. Incidentally he is taken where the mother overhears and recognizes his voice. He dies in her arms, the mother passing away a moment later.

The acting, photography and backgrounds are all up to the standard mark.

RAYBURG SUCCEEDS RAYNOR.

Trouble of various sorts is reported among members of the Dayton, Ohio, branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, originating, it is understood, in the fight made by the organization against long five-cent programs and general rate-cutting. The worst effect of the difficulty, however, is not so much the fact that there is bad feeling as that the organization itself has decided that the best policy for the time being is to remain quiet, and is now practically inert. No meetings are being held, and the league's rooms in the Raub building have been given up, the object being to save the rental of $30 a month, it was stated. Dick Rayner recently resigned as president, Val Rayburg being elected to succeed him. Members are hoping for a revival in interest before long, however, and for an increase in the united spirit which formerly pervaded the organization.

VITAGRAPH WEEK AT DYCKMAN STREET.

John Mooney, manager of the Dyckman theater, 810 Fordham Road, New York, reports a great Vitagraph Week at his house, ending Saturday evening, September 5. Among the Vitagraphers present Saturday night were Mrs. Mary Maurice, Harry Morey, Edith Storey, Dorothy Kelly, Wallie Van, Norma Talmadge, George Cooper, Darwin Karr, Kate Price and Hughie Mack. Sam Spedon, publicity man of the Vitagraph company, introduced the players. The Vitagraph feature, "A Million Bid," was shown and a reception was given the visiting players at the theater, after which a supper was served at the Arras Inn at 207th street and Broadway, which was enlivened by dancing and speechmaking. Everybody had a good time.

"LORD CECIL INTERVENES" (Lubin).

This is the first story of the series that the Lubin Co. are releasing under the caption of "The Beloved Adventurer" in which Arthur Johnson will play the role of Lord Cecil, assisted by Lottie Briscoe in many of the playlettes as a girl of the Golden West. The first incident of the series tells of the admirable way in which "The Beloved Adventurer" saves a young and beautiful girl from the clutches of an adventuress and her accomplice who plan to ruin the heiress and secure her fortune. In the rescue Cecil displays much clever detective ability and achieves the most excellent results, thereby winning the eternal gratitude of the girl who will for the balance of her life regard him as a guardian or second father. Mr. Johnson makes a wonderful and forceful character of "The Beloved Adventurer" and the series following will doubtless be anxiously looked for to see the further exploits of this excellent and typical Englishman.

ANNETTE KELLERMAN LOSES PARIS HOUSE.

In a special dispatch relayed from Ostend to the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, it was stated that the home of Annette Kellerman (Mrs. James R. Sullivan), who created an unprecedented success in the picture entitled "Neptune's Daughter," has been razed in order to make way for the fortresses located in the environs of Paris. Miss Kellerman's house is located at 14 Avenue De Chemin de Fer, Rueil, Siene et Oise, France. This is a suburb of Paris located about twenty miles outside of the city proper and is directly in line of Fort No. 40. As instructions have been given to remove all obstacles in the range of the big guns of these forts, Miss Kellerman was forced to abandon her residence.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"A SPLENDID DISHONOR" (Essanay).

Francis X. Bushman again exhibits unusual histrionic ability in "A Splendid Dishonor," Essanay's two-act drama which is released Friday, September 25. Ruth Stonehouse also shines in this play together with Bryant Washburn and Lester Cuneo. Mr. Cuneo is a new member of the Essanay stock company and his character acting bids fair to top the list of photoplay artists.

"A Splendid Dishonor" is all about Frank Sergeant, a wealthy young man who is told by his phyisician that he has only a short time to live. He straightens out his affairs and is on the point of self-destruction when he is saved by Julia Annersley. Julia's brother, Hugh, is falsely accused of murder and is condemned to be hanged. She pleads with Frank to change places with the brother. Sergeant, admitting that his days are numbered, fakes up evidence against himself in such a way that when he gives himself up to the police his confession is believed.

Scene from "A Splendid Dishonor" (Essanay).

So Hugh is released, believing that the actual murderer has been found. One day he discovers his sister in Sergeant's cell. He bitterly denounces her and Sergeant. But, in the meantime, Julia has learned to love the confessed murderer and is heartbroken to think that he is to die for a crime of which he is guiltless.

A few days before the day set for the execution of Sergeant it is learned that the physician who told him he was dying of heart trouble is insane. Sergeant calls in another doctor who informs him that he is perfectly healthy.

Then it is that Sergeant is placed in a most peculiar position. For Julia's sake he dares not refute his confession of murder. Everything appears hopeless when a detective gets on the case, questions the insane doctor and finds that he is the real murderer. Sergeant is then released. He finds Julia waiting for him when he leaves the prison gate.

WILLIAM HADDOCK WITH THE HOLLAND FILM COMPANY.

William Haddock whose work as a director of motion pictures is too well known to need our expatiating on it here—one of his latest big productions was "Paid in Full"—has accepted the chief direction of the output of a new picture maker, The Holland Film Company, which is to make photoplays in that hub of the Universe—Boston. He is to have full charge of the studio and production. The plans at present call for one-reel dramas and comedies with an occasional feature. We judge that comedy dramas with healthy slap-stick will be welcome from script makers. The company's studio is at 105 Lawrence Avenue, Dorchester, Boston, Mass. Mr. Haddock hopes to turn out some historical pictures with fresh ideas and natural, human action and scripts calling for famous, historical backgrounds in and about Boston should also be acceptable from writers.

DARE DEVIL STUNTS IN "TREY O' HEARTS."

Fear, real fear, of a superstitious nature is beginning to be felt on the Universal studio stages, ranch, and in the city of Los Angeles and beach ports where George Larkin and Cleo Madison are working under the direction of Wilfred Lucas in the "Trey o' Hearts" series, being written by Louis Joseph Vance. The Gold Seal company is at its wits end to know whether the series will be completed in time without some loss of life. Good luck seems to have thus far followed this famous company in the production of the installments completed, but they are wondering whether it will hold out to the end, for in each of the succeeding chapters the escapes seem to be narrower than in those preceding.

Scene Enacted for the "Trey O' Hearts."

In the eighth installment George Larkin, to rescue Miss Madison from a burning building, swings on a rope from the top of one building to the third story window of another opposite which is in flames. To make the scene more realistic, a building was erected at Universal City to be burned. Miss Madison as Rose, was stationed at the window, the building was fired and the action started. Then the ropes by which Mr. Larkin was to ascend became entangled and in the delay that followed the flames ran up the sides of the building like so much tinder. Before Mr. Larkin could reach the window, the shell was a roaring furnace, Miss Madison was cut off from all means of escape and the play rescue became a rescue in reality. As he swung across the intervening space, the smoke and flame belching forth from the windows made it impossible for him to see where to clutch and hold on. Luck was with him, however, and his hand struck the edge of the window. Inside, Miss Madison, by this time nearly overcome, was coughing and trying desperately to keep from fainting. At Larkin's call she staggered to the window and in a half-unconscious condition was lowered with him to the ground.

As they emerged from the smoke a cheer broke from the crowd below for what they thought was a superb bit of acting. When they reached the ground, however, it was evident that there was something wrong. Restoratives were brought and the actors brought to consciousness. In the condition they were in, however, no further work was possible that afternoon.

PHYTHYON BUILDING PICTURE THEATER.

Frank Phythyon of Clymer, Pa., is building a motion picture theater in that town. The theater will be 40 by 90 feet in size, will be two stories high and will contain lodge rooms on the second floor. It will be a modern structure and will be fitted with a stage big enough to accommodate road attractions. Mr. Phythyon would like to hear from all equipment houses.

"THE TWIN BROTHER VAN ZANDT" (Lubin).

Malcolm Douglas has evolved a very powerful melodrama which will fit the appetite of the lovers of sensation. The story is well written and thrilling, but withal void of the impossibilities that are too often introduced into heavy fiction. John E. Ince has given a forceful performance of the twin brothers and is aided by a cast especially selected for melodrama.

The production has exacted very beautiful scenery and impressive atmosphere which Mr. Ince has successfully scened. As Vera Verona, Miss Mildred Gregory has given one of the most powerful performances of her experience.

"BURNING DAYLIGHT" (Bosworth).

The story of "Burning Daylight" and his Klondike experiences, released by Bosworth in a 5-reel version of Jack London's story of that title, is developed with all of that author's charm and skill.

In the grim fastnesses of the Klondike before the bonanza discoveries were a group of strong, rugged, high-spirited men, who never ceased their efforts to wrest gold from that forbidding country. Chief among those "sourdoughs" moved a brilliant, sparkling figure, Elam Harnish, known as "Burning Daylight" from his favorite exhortation. His cheery cry, "Hi, you Siwashes, daylight's burning," was a byword in Circle City, the little camp where all gathered for the long winters. This character as played by Hobart Bosworth is one of the most picturesque and vivid ever seen on the screen. Nothing ever daunted Burning Daylight. He sat in a poker game for stakes of $127,000 with the same abandon and enthusiasm with which he made the round trip between Dyea and Circle City, in mid-winter, in sixty days, on a bet. He was the idol of the women in Circle City and the leader of the men, and his commands and "hunches" were equally followed. One "hunch," however, even his best friends laughed at, and that was that the big strike was coming soon, and that it would bring "the gosh dangdest stampede that ever was." In spite of their laughter, he went blithely ahead, and when Carmack, a squaw-man, struck gold "from the grass roots down," and the stampede began, Burning Daylight embarked on the spectacular career that made him the most conspicuous figure in the Klondike. He rode his "hunch" to the tune of eleven millions, then pulled out for metropolitan life. "Burning Daylight" will be released next Sunday, September 13, at the Strand Theatre, New York.

Scene from "Burning Daylight" (Bosworth).

"REDEMPTION" (Imp).

The gentle innocence of a babe in death grapple with the crime-hardened instincts of an outlaw, produces a struggle unbelievable. The criminal, reaching out to annihilate his victim, his actions carried along in a seething torrent of blood lust, meets in mortal combat the steady growing influx of a child's simplicity of soul. Physical supremacy stands for naught against this seemingly simple, yet overwhelming power which radiates from the heart of the child, causing strange new emotions to take root within the breast of the brute. True, there were times when the animal passions of the man nearly overcame their patient adversary, but bit by bit the love for the baby choked down the ferocity of the outlaw's nature.

"Redemption" brings out this wonderful situation in a strange, dramatic light. Returning to his lair—thoughts of a murder just committed fresh in his heart—Big Bill, a product of mountain savagery, heard the feeble cry of a baby. Although he failed to realize it, this was the first link forged in the chain of his soul's redemption. Big Bill hesitated a moment—what was a baby to him? Why should he pause because of the cry of a child? Then something unexplainable caused the outlaw to go to the little tot's rescue. As he hurried to his hut, the babe clutched close to his heaving breast, something in his inner man stirred, and he felt a sudden revolt against his life of crime. He tried to laugh it aside, telling himself, again and again, that he was a fool to be led by a mere infant, but the force persisted. From then on began the undoing of his past, until the outlaw found it an impossibility to assert his erstwhile ugly being.

The story is put on in such a way that the strong points of the silent, but powerful, combat between good and evil are brought out in a gripping, dramatic light. The efficiency of the directing, the superiority of the photography and the unquestioned understandings of character shown by the author and actors, go to make this a picture of throbbing interest, which will long be remembered.

Herbert Brenon is the director of the piece. Wm. Shay, Wm. Welsh, Violet Mersereau and Hobart Henley play the lead roles.

"THE MASTER FORCE" (Kleine).

When a young woman learns that her lover, from whom she has heard nothing for several months, is about to marry another girl, what should she do about it? The question might be answered in many ways, and a striking answer, or at least a startling instance of what one woman did under these circumstances, is given in George Kleine's two-part subject, "The Master Force."

Woven about this nuclear theme is a story replete with sensationally exciting incidents and splendidly acted scenes, a number of which are laid in the mining camps that abound in the gold fields of Brazil. The rescue of the heroine from a burning building offers the spectators one of the most thrilling fire scenes ever seen in moving pictures.

"The Master Force" was produced with all the careful attention to detail and lavishness of local color which has come to be regarded as characteristic of Kleine subjects. The natural beauty of the settings which form a background of the story would of themselves make the subject distinctly worth while. The photography, too, is as clear as the mountain streams on whose banks much of the action takes place. "The Master Force" will be released through the General Film Company, Tuesday, September 22.

"THE REDEMPTION OF A PAL" (American).

An echo from the underworld is given in this splendid sociological drama by the American Film Mfg. Co. It well exemplifies the old maxim that there is a spark of good in the most depraved of mankind which can be fanned into a flame of usefulness. Winnifred Greenwood plays the lead opposite Ed Coxen. George Field and Charlotte Burton also carry very important parts. It is in two parts and will be released Sept. 21, 1914.

Scene from "The Redemption of a Pal" (American).

Notes of the Trade

MARGUERITE CLAYTON, the Essanay star who plays opposite G. M. Anderson in most of the latter's famous "Broncho Billy" dramas, received a real fright recently when portraying a difficult part in a play called "Broncho Billy, a Friend in Need." In one scene Miss Clayton supposes "Broncho Billy" to be a thief. She points a revolver at his head and declares she will shoot if he does not hold up his hands. Mr. Anderson took the revolver from Miss Clayton and removed six cartridges from its cylinder. The actress nearly fainted when she saw how close she had come to shooting the Essanay leading man.

Exhibitors and exchange men of Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky are watching with interest the movements of O. W. Moore, manager of the Indianapolis Blache Exchange, who is preparing to book Blache and Solax features direct to the theaters of Ohio from his Indianapolis offices. Manager Moore, who is well known throughout the middle west as a practical film man of long experience, states that his exchange has started to book certain subjects, including "A Fight for Freedom," "The Woman of Mystery," "The Million Dollar Robbery," "The Yellow Traffic" and "The War Extra" in Ohio, and that he expects to be in a position to make a definite statement regarding the distributing of Solax and Blache features in Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky at an early date, which may include the notice of a new Blache Exchange being opened in Cleveland.

Frank Lloyd, who has taken over the direction of the Turner Special Feature Company, during the absence of Mr. Turner, is busy at work on a two-reel psychological drama entitled "As the Wind Blows" that promises to eclipse the efforts of many an older director. The story is one of a triangle, but it is not one of the old, time-worn triangle, for no one is trying to make love to another man's wife.

Ruth Stonehouse, who plays opposite Francis X. Bushman in "Sparks of Fate," a new Essanay drama, has a new ambition since the scenes for this photoplay were taken. A hydro-aeroplane is one of the big features of the drama. In fact, Mr. Bushman, as the hero, is rescued from the sea by an air-boat. Miss Stonehouse was a witness of this thrilling "rescue" and, after it was over, was invited by "Jack" Vilas, the aviator, to take a sky spin. She liked it so much that she declares she will not rest until she owns and operates a hydro-aeroplane of her own.

The titles of Kleine two-reel releases through the General Film Company contain a strong smack of the military. "When War Threatens," released August 4, has had a heavy run throughout the country. A similar experience is predicted for "A Shot from Ambush," released September 29, and "On the Battle Line," October 13.

Alfred Hollingsworth, one of the directors at the Eclair western studio, was sadly disappointed in a location a short time ago. Upon crossing the Santa Cruz river one day he picked out a location for the next day's work. Upon his return to make the scene he was quite surprised to find only a large bed of sand, the river having disappeared over night. An investigation proved that the large volume of water Mr. Hollingsworth had seen on the previous day was the result of a cloudburst and that the Santa Cruz is merely a river in name only except on occasions like the above mentioned.

Crane Wilbur, popular Pathe star and hero of "The Perils of Pauline" series, has just concluded a most successful week's engagement at Dales 116th Street theater, New York City, a United Booking Office vaudeville theater. Mr. Wilbur signed for a three weeks' engagement through the U. B. O. offices; one week at the aforementioned theater and one each at the Halsey and Fifth Avenue theaters in Brooklyn. Crane Wilbur served an apprenticeship of ten years on the legitimate stage, and he comes to vaudeville well equipped with experience and ability.

NEW PROGRAM AT THE VITAGRAPH.

The new program at the Vitagraph Theater, New York City, Monday evening, Sept. 7, attracted quite a crowd of critical picture "fans" who have learned to expect something well worth while at these openings. "413," the three-part mystery drama, written by Donald I. Buchanan and produced by Ralph W. Ince, excited most enthusiasm, although it was shown on the same bill with the more pretentious Cissy Fitzgerald feature in six parts, entitled "The Win(k)some Widow." The train wreck in "413" is easily one of the biggest thrills which has ever been shown.

"The Win(k)some Widow," "413" and the regular Vitagraph daily release make up the current program. Miss Fitzgerald and a number of the other principals in the six-reel feature formed a party occupying one of the stage boxes at the theater on the opening night and seemed as interesting to many members of the audience as were the pictures thrown upon the screen.

GERTRUDE McCOY MEETS WITH ACCIDENT.

While rehearsing a scene directed by John H. Collins, Gertrude McCoy, leading lady of the Edison Company, received a very painful injury to her left hand. In making her exit from a room, Miss McCoy had reached for the half-opened door, when suddenly it slammed, crushing two of her fingers between the edge of the door and the woodwork. Her agonizing scream brought many to the scene of the accident and the door was gently opened in order to release her hand from the vise. Although suffering intense pain, Miss McCoy never lost consciousness, but displayed that indomitable nerve which has gained for her a host of admirers among the fans. Upon examination by the studio doctor, it was found that the two fingers were badly crushed and the nail on one completely torn off.

LINN WITH UNIVERSAL.

K. W. Linn, who has been associated with Pathe Freres and the Eclectic Company for several years past, is now with the Universal Film Company. Several months ago Mr. Linn went to London to represent the Eclectic in England and the Continent, but the breaking out of the present conflict compelled the closing of that office and Mr. Linn made his way back to America with some difficulty.

OZ COMPANY WILL RELEASE THROUGH PARAMOUNT.

The Oz Film Company of Los Angeles, Cal., whose first release is "The Patchwork Girl of Oz," has signed contracts with the Paramount Pictures Corporation for this and future subjects. The Patchwork Girl is quite unique and quite different from anything that has been produced in motion pictures. It is in five parts and will be released September 25. Frank J. Baum, publicity man for the Oz Company, was in New York last week looking after the interests of his company.

REDECORATING THEATER.

R. B. Wilby, manager of the Academy of Music, Selma, Ala., is re-seating and redecorating that amusement dispenser at an expenditure of $6,000. The color scheme followed is that of ivory and green. The new seats are upholstered in cane, which is a particularly good covering for summertime. The academy is a "legitimate" theater which has made advantageous use of motion pictures during "open time." The house has a seating capacity of 956 on three floors, and uses service from the General Film Company.

EDGAR LEWIS RECUPERATING.

Exhausted by the work of producing three such great photoplays as "The Littlest Rebel," "Northern Lights" and "Captain Swift," all in a very short period, Edgar Lewis suffered a nervous breakdown despite his rugged physique and is now recuperating rapidly after a thorough rest in the Berkshire Hills. He will return to New York next week. An enthusiastic welcome awaits him at the Screen Club.

TO CONTINUE WITH MUTUAL.

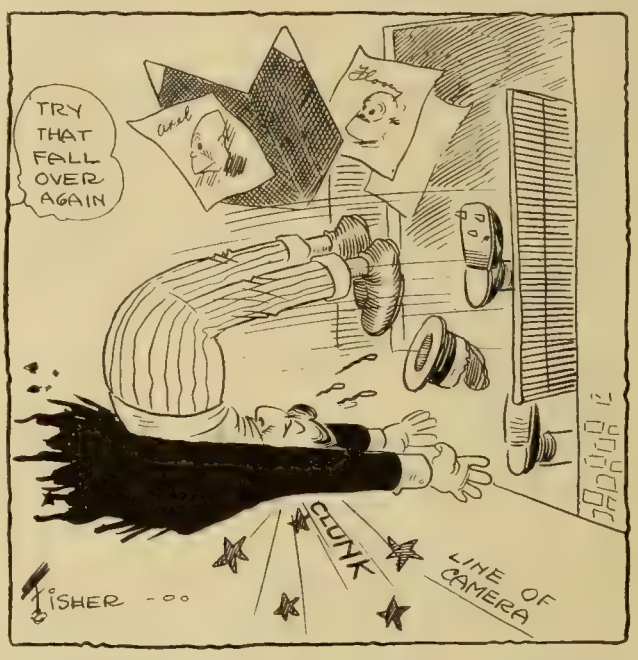
The Mutual Film Corporation at its offices, 71 West 23d street, on September 5, announced: "The existing arrangements of the Mutual Film Corporation and The New York Motion Picture Corporation for the marketing of Keystone, Broncho, Kay-Bee and Domino films, are to continue in the future as in the past. The renewal of the contract, which expired in August, has been the subject of much discussion ever since Messrs. Ince and Sennett came to New York six weeks ago. A renewal has been arranged on terms highly acceptable to all concerned." Keystone will release one multiple reel feature each month.

VIC FORSYTHE.

Newspaper Artist and Movie Actor.

By Thornton Fisher.

VIC FORSYTHE, the well-known creator of "Axel and Flooey," the New York World's comic characters, is the latest newspaper artist to enter the movie realms. Wearing a soft hat with the fresh imprints of masculine heels, and a countenance not unlike a pickled herring, this genius calmly informed me that he had been kicked out of a saloon half a dozen times by a bunch of what he called "rough-necks." Each time he was ejected he massaged the sidewalk with his face. Let me explain that this was during a rehearsal of the movie comedy, entitled "Arty, the Artist," featuring Mr. Forsythe, popularly known as "Vic" to the Evening World readers.



The film opens with Vic asleep at his desk in a newspaper office, and the editor comes in and fires him. The artist told me that that was the easiest scene of all. He only had to act natural. In another scene Mr. Forsythe is a drawing instructor in a girls' school and makes a caricature of Fanny Bourke who plays the school marm—she sees it and strikes him over the head with his big portfolio. There is a touch of romance in it too. Arty the Artist wins the girl by drawing two cupids, one with each hand at the same time, and it makes such a hit with her father, who he has just caricatured, that he readily gives his consent.

One of the directors who saw the film said that he could see Vic had had stage experience. Mr. Forsythe says, however, "He is wrong," that he was never hit by a soft egg. The pictures were made at the Thanhouser studio recently, and the antics of this really clever cartoonist are screamingly funny.

DETROIT.

ONE course of diversion which proved pleasing to the visiting delegates to the 48th annual encampment of the G. A. R. and their ladies from August 31 to Sept. 5 in Detroit was the wartime pictures displayed during the week in the motion picture houses. Almost every one of the Woodward and Monroe avenue theaters offered films dealing with the more important battles of the civil ward. Each film was greeted with rounds of applause. The big event of the G. A. R. encampment was the parade the morning of Sept. 2, which was viewed by 400,000 people and which took over three hours to pass. Woodward avenue, which was the scene of activities, never held such a crowd. Most every mercantile concern closed down for the day to permit employes to see the parade. Motion picture men were busy in all parts of the city on the day in question. Several stationed themselves at police headquarters and photographed police handling the enormous crowds. Up and down Woodward avenue motorcars with camera batteries mounted in the tonneaus and having a clear sweep of the decorated thoroughfare were constantly kept moving while operators turned the cranks. H. A. Nelson, who recently engaged in the moving picture business, made some excellent views of the parade, which were shown the following day at the Empress theater and on Friday at the New Empire.

John H. Kunsky feels well pleased with the business done the first week at the Washington theater, where "The Call of the North," a Jesse L. Lasky production, was the attraction. He says that every day has shown an increase in pahronage. He believes that as soon as the house becomes better known as playing Paramount attractions and the weather gets cooler, the Washington will be doing capacity three times daily.

The World Film Corporation is now located in handsome new quarters on the fourth floor of the building at 99 Woodward avenue. Douglas Dickerson reports a brisk business and anticipates an excellent fall and winter season.

Complaint has been made to the police department by several of film companies that thieves have been frequent visitors to the offices and have stolen a number of films as well as large quantities of supplies. Among the latest victims is The Progressive Film Company at 99 Woodward avenue, who, on Sept. 3, missed a three-reel picture, "Saved by the Boys in Blue." W. D. Ward, of the Progressive Film Company, is very much encouraged in his new enterprise. He says, "There is little trouble in booking pictures which have merit that will prove a box-office attraction. The managers and proprietors of picture houses are getting to know what their patrons like and they buy accordingly."

Graham Hoffman, assistant manager of the Palace theater, is on the sick list with typhoid fever. It will probably be the latter part of September before he will be able to take up his work at the theater. C. A. Hoffman, general manager of the Palace, has returned from a two weeks' trip in Maine.

The Holy Redeemer church, on Dix avenue, will again show pictures in the Parish Hall during the coming season on Sundays only. The auditorium seats 1,100 persons, and is well adapted for showing pictures. The opening took place Sunday, Sept. 6, the attraction being "Joan of Arc." Two shows on Sundays are given, one in the afternoon, catering to the children, and one in the evening. Prices are 5 and 10 for matinees and 10 cents at night. J. W. Reynolds has charge of the work. He says that pictures are shown for the purpose of keeping the members of the church closer together and in the neighborhood. "We realize that our people like pictures, so by giving them in our own hall we are able to take the money, over and above our expenses, and set it aside for the upkeep and improvement of the building. We average about $100 each Sunday, dependent upon the weather." A different feature is shown each week.

The theatre in course of construction at Woodward and Philadelphia avenues for the King Amusement Company, David King, president, will seat 1,200 persons and will be completed sometime in November. It will play high-class pictures.

David King, of the National theater and the King Amusement Company, has purchased the Wayne County rights, including Detroit, on the feature film, "The Spoilers," which played a two weeks' engagement at the Broadway. Mr. King plans to retain the film until next summer when he will use it to open the picture season at the National. Meanwhile it will not be shown in the county. Mr. King, by the way, states that the season of pictures which came to a close at the National on Sept. 6 was very successful despite the warm weather and that the same policy will be followed next year. He believes pictures are more preferable to National patrons during July and August. Mr. King also announces that he and his associates have purchased the Jefferson theater in Fairview, a subuarb of Detroit. The entire house, both inside and out, is being renovated and redecorated in addition to being remodeled, at an expense of $10,000. A pipe organ is being installed. The Jefferson will reopen as a first-class picture house about Sept. 15. George Cusick, formerly assistant manager at the National theater, will be house manager.

The Garden theate, at 729 Woodward avenue, continues to enjoy an excellent business. Arthur C. Hoganson is the house manager. The theater is a chain of the Casino Amusement Company. Matinees are given daily at 2:30, except Sundays and holidays, when the policy is continuous from 1:30 until 10:30. Week days performances, aside from the matinees, are continuous from 6:45 until 10:30. Prices are 10 cents for the first ten rows, 15 for the last 20 rows and 20 cents for the boxes. At the matinees all seats are 10 cents, excepting Sundays and holidays, when evening prices prevail. Every Monday, Tuesday and Thursday are special feature days; Wednesdays and Saturdays show Mary Pickford in her latest plays; on Wednesday and Friday the Pathe War News is given an added attraction, while every Saturday afternoon and evening for the benefit of the large children patronage the theater presents a selected Pathe natural color educational picture.

Herman F. Zink, proprietor of the Victoria theater, at 1009 Michigan avenue, was nominated for alderman in his ward on Aug. 25. He was a candidate on the Republican ticket and came out victor by an overwhelming majority of votes. His election in November is pretty well assured.

Schmied-Sisman Co. has been awarded the contract for building the Grand Boulevard theater on East Grand Boulevard.

Miss M. Wills is having erected a small theater on Woodward avenue, near Pasadena avenue, which will be completed by November 1.

Frank Farrington Co. has the general contract for the Alhambra theater, at Woodward and Kenilworth avenues.

SMITH.

CINCINNATI.

THE EMPRESS theater, for some years the Cincinnati representative of the Sullivan & Considine vaudeville syndicate, was opened last week under the auspices of the Marcus Loew organization, showing a vaudeville bill and six reels of pictures, which will be its regular program. The house has been thoroughly overhauled, and, under the management of George A. Boyer, seems destined for a high degree of success. The vaudeville runs for a week, but the pictures are to be changed daily.

The Grand is the only one of the "regular" Cincinnati houses which is still running motion pictures regularly, as its exclusive daily program, Manager I. Lipson keeping the house going on this plan under arrangements made with the management by which he will use it until the theatrical season opens. While this is true, however, it happens that two of the other houses, the Lyric and Keith's, also showed motion pictures all last week, although the former house closed its summer season of pictures a week or so ago. At Keith's Universal's "Neptune's Daughter," featuring Annette Kellermann, ran its second week, the big houses which it drew the first week of its engagement here resulting in this arrangement.

The Lubin theater is the first of the motion picture houses in Cincinnati to adopt the use of changeable block electric signs, for the purpose of displaying the name of the attraction playing there. This has been done in other large cities, by a few of the leading houses, but the Lubin is the pioneer in Cincinnati, having had the sign installed recently by the Federal Sign System, Electric. The sign now keeps the public informed of the photoplay which may be seen there, just as do those at the large theaters. The policy of the house, which is to show big features only, and to change twice a week instead of daily, enables it to do this while, of course, it would be difficult to use such a sign if there were daily change of program, consisting of a number of different attractions.

The Lasky production of "The Call of the North" at the Lubin during the latter half of last week was one of the best drawing cards which the house has shown recently. The popularity of Robert Edeson, the star of the production, was one of the principal reasons for the success of the play in Cincinnati. The management is finding the weekly "Lubin news," issued as a local house organ, an excellent means of keeping its audiences interested. It is distributed free, and contains advance notices of coming attractions, enabling people to make arrangements to attend those which sound interesting, and keeping the attendance up to a high mark. It is interesting for this reason, and also contains enough other matter to make the four pages well worth reading, warranting its being taken away and read, thus serving the purpose for which it is intended.

Manager W. E. Brown, of the Nordland Plaza, reports that things have been going splendidly with that handsome suburban house during August, and, in fact, for the entire summer. The weather during August, however, has been especially favorable to exhibitors, having been cool and pleasant, with not too much rain at night, and the Nordland as well as others has done well in consequence. Mr. Brown is now showing the Shubert attractions, the "Million-Dollar Mystery," and other high-class stuff, and is one of the several Cincinnati houses which will handle "Paramount Pictures." He has found it necessary to change his programs daily, as do most of the suburban houses, large and small, as his audiences do not change to as great an extent as those downtown, and naturally demand new pictures each night.

"Cabiria," the much-talked-of imported photospectacle, will be the opening attraction of the season at the Grand Opera House, in Cincinnati, although it may be considered also as the close of the season of motion pictures at that theater. This production has not yet been seen in the Queen City, and, as it has had plenty of newspaper comment in advance, it should draw well.

CASEY.

TENNESSEE.

THE moving picture spirit is growing stronger in the larger cities of Tennessee steadily and new houses are going up in Nashville, Chattanooga, Knoxville and Memphis. Even a number of the second rate cities are building handsome houses, and some new exchanges have been organized recently. Straight colored shows have done very well in a number of the cities, as the percentage of blacks increases considerably after passing the Mason-Dixon line.

Many and varied will be the features of the story of Tennessee now being put into motion pictures for exhibition at the San Francisco Exposition next year. S. I. Connor, of the Bon Ray Film Co., is working out the various details and has decided to include in the pictures a view of the destruction of intoxicants in Nashville by the agents of the attorneys in the "Nuisance Law" cases. This will probably be done the next time a quantity of liquor is destroyed. A picture showing the Hermitage, the home of President Andrew Jackson, will also be made. About 20,000 feet of film will be made in all, and these films will be shown in a special building at San Francisco, which will be a replica of the Hermitage. Otto Gilmore is handling the camera end of the business.

John M. Biggs, of Nashville, is interested in an organization which contemplates incorporating a company to establish a plant to manufacture motion picture films. The company has not been thoroughly organized, but a location is being figured upon.

The Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, is having plans prepared by C. K. Colley to remodel a building at 217 Fifth avenue, formerly occupied by Skalowski's restaurant, for a motion picture house. The new theater will have all modern fixtures and appliances, and will be remodeled at a cost of $20,000. A recent item appearing in the Nashville papers to the effect that the Crescent Amusement Company had paid $12,000 to J. H. Bradford as a bonus for the lease on the building was untrue, according to Mr. Bradford. Mr. Bradford further stated that his reason for selling the lease on the building was due to a recent fire in his furniture factory, and that his other business was now claiming so much of his attention that he was unable to build the motion picture house, as he had contemplated. He therefore sold the lease to the Crescent Company for exact cost plus a few preliminary expenses, but that the idea of Tony Sudekum, president of the Crescent Amusement Company, having paid him $12,000 for the lease, was ridiculous, he said.

The Bijou theater, of Nashville, is being remodeled and redecorated for musical comedy, and a large force of workmen have been busy for some time getting the theater into shape. George H. Hickman recently stated that he expected to run nothing but light musical comedy shows this winter.

The new building of the Majestic Amusement Company, on Main street, in Memphis, and which is now underway, is coming along rapidly. This theater, which will cost about $75,000, is one of the most expensive buildings to be built this fall in the city, and when completed will be one of the handsomest picture houses in the South.

The Old Lyric theater, of Chattanooga, which has been used for practically every sort of attraction known to the modern world, has been christened the "Grand theater," since being leased by Charles Gramlich, head of the Southern Burlesque Circuit, who will use it as a burlesque house. The house at one time was known as the James Hall, later Opera House, the New Opera House and in recent years the Lyric and the "Billy Long."

The Queen theater, the newest picture house in Knoxville, and which has only been open for a few weeks, is handling a good amount of business and the 800 seats are hardly adequate for the big crowds attending the performances. There are forty-one rows of twelve seats each in the auditorium, 160 seats in the gallery and 200 seats on the mezzanine. Two large centrifugal fans keep the building well ventilated and as the air comes through a refrigerator the house is cool in summer. The auditorium is lined with columns and the walls are decorated with paintings and handsome mirrors. Five performances are held each day, one at 2 p. m., at 3.30, at 5 and at 7 o'clock, the last starts at 8.30 p. m. George W. Shorey is owner and manager of the new picture house. "The Only Son," a romance in five parts, recently made a tremendous hit. GEORGE.

KENTUCKY.

FRED SHELDON, manager of the S. & P. Supply House, Louisville, will leave this week for New York and other Eastern cities to purchase a lot of films for the Louisville house. Business has increased so rapidly with the new firm that the present supply of films is inadequate to supply demands. An option has been secured on a lot of Keystone comedies which will probably be purchased. Bob Strong, the head film man, will accompany Mr. Sheldon on the trip.

The management of the Palace theater, at Shelby and Rupp streets, Louisville, has decided to put off building the new addition to the theater until next season, and the theater is again running. Good crowds are in evidence every evening and the house is doing well with its present capacity.

The Preston-Street theater, Louisville, is indeed fortunate in having the closed house directly adjoining its airdome. During the past week or ten days the weather has been so rainy that the shows all had to be held in the closed house and fairly good crowds were in evidence. Without the closed house the theater would have had to shut down. On several occasions this summer heavy rains have blown up while a performance was on. In these cases the piano has been quickly rolled over to the winter house, the film taken off and rerun and no serious handicap was felt.

The Parkland theater, Louisville, has only been handling a fair amount of business so far this season. Picture shows in the better class sections of the city fail to draw the crowds that the shows in the working men's neighborhoods do. This condition is accounted for by the fact that the people of better means would rather make the trip uptown to see the first run productions, while the poorer people are figuring on saving car fare. Several houses recently started in the select sections of the city have barely made expenses, while a number of the houses located in the working men's home districts have been making good money.

The airdomes in Louisville had a good run of business during the early summer, but for the past three or four weeks business has not been overly good, due to the changeable weather conditions. It is probable that most of the open-air houses will close about September 15, but if the weather improves and stays warm they may run for some time longer. The opening of the theatrical season, however, generally puts a crimp in their business and it hardly pays to run later.

The Big Universal production of "Neptune's Daughter," which was run at the Mary Anderson theater, Louisville, last week, attracted large crowds in spite of the fact that the admission price was fixed at fifty cents for the ground floor seats at night. This is the stiffest price ever asked by exhibitors but it failed to discourage the people who wanted to see good pictures. The house was literally packed at every performance. The pictures were so fine, however, that everyone felt satisfied that they had received their money's worth.

The Mutual Film Corporation, of Louisville, which has been looking for a location for a film exchange in Louisville for several weeks, has finally located on the twentieth floor of the Inter-Southern building, the largest building in the city. A suite of three rooms has been engaged and Frank Hammer, formerly a Warner representative, is in charge of the new office.

The Majestic theater, Louisville, operated by the Majestic Amusement Company, has announced that it will show the "Famous Player" productions from now on. Two big features will be shown weekly, one to run three days and the other four. The first production will be "The Lost Paradise," in which H. B. Warner takes the leading part.

J. J. Hebbert, manager of the Warner Feature Film Company, Louisville, was dubbed "Zingo" a few months ago, while he was handling special bookings on the big feature, and the name has stuck. Half of the men in the motion picture business of Louisville now speak of him as "Zingo." Mr. Hebbert has announced that the local office will probably take in more territory in Tennessee and the South as a result of the recent announcement of the head office which expects to enlarge its facilities considerably, by adding to its program. A number of new fireproof cabinets are to be installed in the office.

Julius G. Reader, head of the Ohio Motion Picture Company, is spending a few days in Louisville on a vacation. He reports that business has not been overly good with him in the Queen City for the past few weeks as a result of bad weather conditions.

S. B. Kramer, of the Indianapolis office of the Warner Feature Film Company, was in Louisville this week on his tour of inspection among the various exchanges under his jurisdiction. The Warner Company now has a total of thirty-four exchanges in the principal cities of the country. "Across the Border" is a film with which the local office has been making a strong bid.

Tobacco manufacturers, who have begun a campaign against the proposed raise in the revenue tax on tobacco, are calling attention to the taxable possibilities which have been overlooked by the tax artists generally. The tobacco men point out that among the things not necessities and in general use but not taxed, are cosmetics, perfumes and moving picture shows, as well as other places of amusement where an admission is charged. It is pointed out that these are luxuries in every sense of the word, but escape the tax collectors entirely. The idea is considered a joke by the motion picture men, however, who have not paid the slightest attention to it. It is not stated whether the tobacco men were considering the probable stamping of reels, admission tickets, or whether they wished to put an internal revenue stamp on every person buying an admittance ticket to a theatrical performance.

Clyde Gaines, of Irvine, Ky., who operates a motion picture house and makes his own power, has been urging the town trustees to offer a lighting franchise for a municipal lighting plant, and proposes that if it can be purchased at a reasonable figure, to install a plant in the city to light the whole town. At present he is furnishing light for several buildings from his private power plant. The trustees are in favor of the movement and will probably offer the franchise shortly.

SAN FRANCISCO.

J. SHARLIN, president of the Hawaii Motion Picture Company, is spending a few weeks in San Francisco and vicinity.

Herbert Payne, president of the California Motion Picture Corporation, has cabled that he and his wife are safe in Carlsbad, Germany.

Mlle. La Jolie Lucile, world-renowned as a poser, is to be one of the feature attractions at the vaudeville show at the Auditorium that is to precede the ball of the moving picture operators. The proceeds of the ball and entertainment will go to the sick and death benefit fund of the organization.

C. W. Goddard, president of the State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League; J. Ray Williams, president of the Sacramento Valley Exhibitors' League No. 3; L. H. Marks, secretary of that organization, and J. W. Di Stasio, treasurer, were in San Francisco this week conferring with local officials of the State organization in regard to the State Convention that is to be held in Sacramento on October 6, 7, 8 and 9. Arrangements are being made for a large attendance, as matters of unusual importance will be discussed. The meeting place is a very central one and the date for the convention has been arranged so that exhibitors may attend without missing their Saturday or Sunday shows. Low railroad rates have been secured from all sections of the State and it is the plan of the San Francisco Bay exhibitors to make the trip by boat.

The great Selig production, "The Spoilers," is back at the Portola theater for another week's run and seems to be attracting almost as much attention as when it was first shown. It is estimated that during the previous engagement fully one hundred thousand persons paid admission to see this attraction.

Local military authorities recently objected to the views of the Panama Canal fortifications shown this week at the Gaiety theater in connection with the canal pictures, but following a hearing before United States Attorney John W. Preston no further action was taken and the exhibition was continued without interruption.

George Schlesinger of Susanville, Cal., was here recently and stated that he had disposed of the Orpheum theater at that place.

Sol Lesser, president of the Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc., and manager of the All Star Features Co., is enjoying a well-earned vacation in the country, accompanied by his wife.

Herbert Green is now in charge of the Valencia theater on Valencia street, now being conducted as a photoplay house.

G. d'Imbleval, of the office force of the Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc., has left for France to enlist in the service of his country.

Mr. Bailey of the Wonderland theater, Turlock, Cal., was a recent visitor in San Francisco, making the trip here to arrange for service. He is now conducting a 15-cent show once a week, the regular admission price being 10 cents.

The Forestic theater, opened in the Richmond district early in the year, has been sold by W. R. Hall to J. C. Dorren.

The Larkin theater, on Larkin street, near O'Farrell, has been closed but it is expected that arrangements will be made to reopen it at an early date.

The Griffith production, "The Escape," has scored such a success at Grauman's Imperial theater that it is to be shown for another week. So great has been the demand for seats that the doors have been opened at 11 o'clock in the morning, instead of at 1.30 p. m., as has been the rule. Manager Partington states that so many big attractions are booked for the near future that the early opening may be made a regular policy. The opening of the Savoy theater by D. J. Grauman has been marked with immediate success. "The Call of the North" has been succeeded by "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and the announcement that this production was to be shown has brought many inquiries from regular patrons of the Imperial.

Frank L. Hudson, manager of the San Francisco branch of the Eclectic Film Company, is making a business trip to Denver, Colo., and will be absent from local headquarters for almost two weeks.

The Vitaslide Company is having such a call for its novel slides that no orders for special work are now being accepted for immediate delivery. The working force at the factory is being enlarged but it takes considerable time to train workers to make these articles.

Harry Hunter, who has charge of the Independent Film Exchange at Los Angeles, was in San Francisco recently conferring with George Chamberlain of the home office.

The Excelsior theater on Mission road has been leased by Sidney Bramley, formerly of the Pastime theater on Haight street.

The offices of George Kleine's Attractions have been removed from the Monadnock Building to the Pacific Building, in the center of the amusement district.

Mrs. May Pettengill, a prominent exhibitor of Eureka, Cal., has opened another house at that place. The new theater is on the site of the old Marguerita, which has been remodeled, and has a seating capacity of 2,000. Two Motiograph machines have been installed and music is furnished by a seven-piece orchestra. An all-feature service is being shown, with changes three times a week, the prices being 10 cents and 20 cents, with 30 cents for the box seats. The opening attraction was "Tess of the Storm Country," and a big business was done.

The United Keanograph Company is planning improvements at its studio at Fairfax, Cal., to cost about $20,000. A glass roof is to be erected and Cooper-Hewitt lights installed.

The Auburn theater, Auburn, Cal., is now being conducted daily. When it was opened a few weeks ago but one show a week was given, but the business has developed so rapidly that it was found advisable to make a change. The house has a seating capacity of 800.

Al. Watton, who conducts the Colonial theater at Stockton, Cal., recently had his leg amputated to save his life, gangrene having set in a wounded foot.

E. E. Smith, formerly of Marysville, Cal., has taken over the Colonial theater at Pacific Grove.

Rapp & Engheart, who conduct the Lyric theater at Watsonville, Cal., are having a new house erected there, the seating capacity of which will be about 500.

Mrs. Ella Borman, who, at one time, owned the Pioneer theater, Oakland, Cal., but who disposed of it some time ago, has again purchased the house.

Armory Hall, Visalia, Cal., is being remodeled and transformed into a moving picture house. Additional work decided upon since construction commenced will bring the cost to $18,000, instead of $15,000, the contract price.

Work has been commenced on a moving picture theater on Durant avenue, east of Telegraph avenue, Berkeley, Cal., for J. A. Elston, 2334 Bowditch street, and George Clark of San Francisco.

The Crown City Film Company has been incorporated at Pasadena, Cal., with a capital stock of $200,000 by M. E. Spero, N. Smith, H. Dewall, D. E. Bard, A. Bard, H. Silverman and F. Jocelyn.

The Florence theater has been opened at Oakland, Cal., by Fred Frisk.

The Franklin theater on Franklin street, Oakland, Cal., was opened this week, the initial offering being "Spartacus."

The Home theater at Anderson, Cal., has been opened again, after having been dark during the hot spell. CHURCH.

THE two reels of pictures of life at the South Dakota State Soldiers' Home, taken for the purpose of raising a veterans' monument fund were shown at the Deadwood theater in Deadwood, S. D.

Heimann & Galvin threw open their redecorated moving picture theater at Wheaton, Minn., with a free show.

"The Man on the Box" broke all matinee records for attendance at the Orpheum theater in Helena, Mont.

No vaudeville will be shown at the new Star theater in Montevideo, Minn., until an addition 26 feet long has been built. The new house will confine itself to pictures. C. S. Starbeck and A. M. Anderson, the owners, expended $6,000 in fitting up the house to accommodate 300 patrons. A box holding ten persons, for private parties, is located on both sides of the operating room. A seven-piece orchestra will furnish the music.

The Regent Theater Company of Billings, Mont., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $10,000 by E. C. and Charlotte O'Keefe and V. D. Caldwell.

The Lake Amusement Company, which now operates the New Lake theater on Lake street, between Nicollet and Blaisdell avenues, in Minneapolis, Minn., has purchased a site adjoining that house and will erect a new theater, seating $2,000, to play vaudeville and pictures.

La Moyne Livingston with moving pictures and a lecture on "Better Babies" was an added attraction to the regular bill at the Globe theater in Salem, Ore.

After playing a return engagement of the local moving pictures, Manager Zuercher, of the Lyric theater at Melrose, Minn., cut up the films and gave the parts to the persons who were pictured thereon.

Automobile tourists through Colorado Springs, Col., are so numerous that the Chamber of Commerce of that city prepared, for the use of all motorists, a sanitary and convenient camp. The Chamber has just had this filmed for exploitation purposes.

A moving picture show has been opened in the opera house at Highmore, S. D., and will give exhibitions Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday nights. The sensible admission of fifteen and ten cents will be charged.

The fairy tale matinees for children at moving picture theaters in St. Paul, Minn., have been resumed under the direction of the mothers' clubs of the city and the clubs of the Fourth District. Miss Marian Gertrude Haines, a kindergarten teacher of Chicago, conducted matinees at the Starland and Park theaters.

Hiller Hoffman is having a new theater constructed at Rice and Manitoba in St. Paul, Minn.

Blanding Brothers may not rebuild the opera house at Detroit, Minn., it is reported, because the moving picture show makes the maintenance of a public auditorium in a city of that size not a profitable one.

William J. Pierce has been made manager of the new theater being erected at Rochester, Minn., by J. E. Reid and thus becomes manager of all the theatrical and moving picture houses in Rochester. The new house, which will seat 1,000, will play vaudeville and pictures.

Key Brothers have opened a moving picture theater at Willow City, S. D.

A. Wallman has opened a moving picture show at Crandon, S. D.

The Antler's theater, which is now under the management of C. E. Oliphant at Roseburg, Ore., will give its patrons many features. "The Lion and the Mouse," the opening night, was a sample.

Patrons of the Lyric theater at Bozeman, Mont., are noting the policy of constant improvement inaugurated by the new manager, Mrs. von Presky. The Pathe news service has been added and a new illumination scheme installed in the front.

The Allen Catlin business block at Truman, Minn., is being remodeled for use by the Cozy theater. It will be ready about October 1.

The Berg Building at International Falls, Minn., is being remodeled and will be occupied by the Unique theater.

Fantle Brothers of Yankton, S. D., are contemplating the erection of a two-story business and theater building at Third and Cedar streets in that city, it is reported.

Saxe Brothers planned to open their new moving picture house, the Saxe theater, on Seventh street, between Hennepin and Nicollet avenues, in Minneapolis, Minn., September 7. Thomas Saxe, of Milwaukee, has been in Minneapolis looking after the new theater. It was erected at a cost of $150,000, and is a worthy home for a Saxe photoshow.

Eugene Levy has sold his interest in the Melbourne theater in Seattle, Wash., to J. S. Shortley, who has operated moving picture houses in Portland, Ore., and in the east. Levy will devote his entire time to the Grand Opera House in Seattle and his other holdings, including his latest acquisition in North Yakima, Wash. A new policy has been put into effect at the Grand. Moving pictures will be shown daily from 12 to 2 and 5 to 7 with vaudeville and pictures from 2 to 5 and 7 to 11. Each Wednesday some feature will begin a four-day run. "The Jungle" was the first of these offerings. Manager Levy has announced that bookings of features will be conspicuous in the combination vaudeville and photoplay houses under his control. Shortley closed the Melbourne for a week for remodeling, refitting and redecorating. It will run regular releases and features.

Mrs. K. E. Hanson of Kokota, Minn., was recently at Mount Vernon, S. D., where, it is said, she made arrangements for opening a moving picture theater.

Citizens of Mitchell, S. D., held a mass meeting and discussed a proposition to raise a fund of $55,000 and erect a municipal theater to replace the Gale burned last March.

The Grand tehater at Bemidji, Minn., had a Mary Pickford week.

George F. Leonard, an Arctic explorer who will be a lecturer at the Eskimo village at the Panama Pacific Exposition at San Francisco, is playing northwestern moving picture houses with a moving picture show and lecture describing his travels. He did satisfactory business at the Bijou theater in Missoula, Mont.

There will be no stock company shows in the American theater at Spokane, Wash.; it has gone back to a photoplay policy. Recently it was rumored that Klaw & Erlanger were negotiating for the house, but following the run of the "Creation" pictures it is again in the hands of James McConahey, proprietor of the Best theater, who resumed the regular picture shows.

Six reels of "Scenes of Norway" drew a crowded house to the Brinkman theater at Bemidji, Minn. Any Scandinavian scenic of merit is always sure of a heavy business in the Minnesota settlements of foreign-born.

Rev. T. E. Cullen, pastor of St. Mary's procathedral at St. Paul, Minn., is contemplating the installation of a moving picture machine at the pro-cathedral school following the announcement of the formation of the Catholic Film Association at New York City.

The dedication of a new orchestral piano and the opening of "The Trey o' Hearts" were simultaneous at the Pastime theater, Earl Wheat, manager, in Dillon, Mont.

The Majestic theater at Roseburg, Ore., has installed a new Fotoplayer.

Raths & Seavolt of St. Paul, Minn., who have been doing an extensive business in commercial motion pictures are said to contemplate increasing their capital stock to $250,000 for the purpose of producing dramas and comedies. The papers for the new corporation will be filed shortly. Otto N. Raths will be president and Mr. Seavolt vice-president. Negotiations are said to have been made for sites for a studio and laboratory in St. Paul.

"Safety First—The Fireproof Idol of Duluth" was the line used by the new Grand theater in connection with its opening. Inspection of the twenty-two moving picture houses has been made by the city officials of Duluth, who reported that the managers co-operated in every way possible.

HOWE'S TRAVEL PICTURES had a first rate two weeks in Kansas City despite the hot weather. They showed at the Grand Opera House the first attraction of the fall season—though the theater announced that its "regular" season opened August 29 with drama. Wm. H. Seibel, manager of the Howe attraction, said the company had come from Chautauqua work in the north, and had suffered keenly from the heat in Kansas City the first few days. They went to New Orleans for a short engagement of three weeks at the Tulane.

"The Paul J. Rainey African Hunt" pictures began their second week in Kansas City August 31. Dr. Louis Fierce accompanies the pictures, lectures and manages the performances. Dr. Fierce is a well-known lecturer and naturalist and the fact that he explains the pictures makes the exhibition doubly interesting.

The Royal theater, the newest and one of the finest theaters in Kansas City, has, since September 1, been using the Paramount service exclusively. The contract price for this service has been reported to be $26,000 per year.

Joe Gilday, manager of a number of the largest picture houses in Kansas City, states that business has been very poor in the downtown districts, while on the other hand it has been extraordinarily good in the residential districts.

J. C. Lane is erecting a new theater in Kansas City at the cost of $36,000. It is to be known as the Warwick theater. It will have a frontage of 60 feet and a depth of 170 feet. The seating capacity will be 1,500, and the house will be equipped with a modern ventilating system. Mr. W. A. Andlauer, who has been operating the Bonaventure theater, will be manager.

"Movies" were used recently in Kansas City by the Maxwell Motor Car Company to show its salesmen and representatives the process of manufacture. There were 4,000 feet of film, and it cost over $50,000 and took several months to produce.

The Mutual Film Company has moved to its new location, Ozark building, and at present probably has the most up-to-date film exchange in the west. The building in which it is located is the newest one in Kansas City and is absolutely fireproof.

A three-reel motion picture of army life taken at the order of the government will be shown to the Signal Corps Field Company A, N. G. M., on September 5, 6, 7.

Theater owners are co-operating with city officials in Joplin in the preparation of a plan to censor pictures. At present the prospect is that the Chief of Police will have charge of the censorship, the theater managers having the privilege of appealing from his decision to the Mayor. The city officials also discussed with the theater men other questions connected with the operating of their houses, such as the damage to the eyes of spectators sitting in the first row and the effect of too rapid turning of the films. The Mayor suggested that films seemed to be run more rapidly on Saturday than on other days and raised the question as to whether the program should be shortened, or other means adopted to handle the crowd in case investigation should show that too much speed was detrimental. The preliminary inspection of theaters by city officials resulted in orders that all exits must remain open during exhibition, that only numbers that could be seated may be admitted and that all rooms of operators must be fireproof.

While in New York recently Mrs. Maria Valary Rothermel, who has charge of the Willis Wood theater of Kansas City, was the guest of S. A. Rothapel, manager of the Strand theater, at a luncheon given in her honor. After the luncheon the host took the party around to the theater where they were entertained by a rendition of "Faust" given by the Strand orchestra of twenty pieces. BROWN.

SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST.

FOLLOWING the holding up of the permit for the construction of the moving picture theater on the Alamo Plaza at San Antonio, Tex., because said exits were not provided, a conference was held for an inspection to be made of every moving picture theater in the city. The permit for the Alamo house was refused on technical grounds. It will front on two streets, and the plans are said to comply with the demands for safety. As a result, the fire chief, building inspector, and city electrician decided to make all the other vaudeville and photoplay houses comply with the law. Considerable feeling surrounds the whole affair. The Council by a vote of 6 to 5 passed the ordinance allowing the house to be constructed with three entrances and roomy aisles. The mayor vetoed it and an attempt was made to pass it over his veto but the attempt failed, the vote being 6 to 6. The new theater, which is projected by a Fort Worth stock company will have an Egyptian atmosphere, the interior decorations making it a veritable Egyptian palace. Rest rooms for men and women, the mushroom style of ventilation and the screen in front will be features. Evans Dazey, J. J. Parker and M. L. McCarb of Fort Worth are interested in the project.

Because the evidence was insufficient to warrant conviction the dozen or more cases against the proprietors of moving picture shows in San Antonio, Tex., charged with violation of the Sunday law, have been dismissed upon the recommendation of the county attorney. There was no effort to bring them to trial during the three months that the cases were pending on the docket of a local justice of the peace.

The City Council of Columbia, S. C., has been investigating the statute books to find if it is legal for the municipality to make an appropriation of $3,000 for the purpose of having moving pictures of the city made to be shown at the San Francisco exposition.

The management of the public playgrounds at Fort Smith, Ark., have been giving moving picture programs to the public. In addition an educational set of slides, "The Call of the Outdoor," was projected.

The Airdome at Austin, Tex., has secured a franchise from the Interstate Amusement Company of Chicago and, commencing August 31, began a show with two acts of vaudeville and three reels of moving pictures. Admission of 20 and 10 cents will be charged.

Sigel Bumann of Tahlequah, Okla., will be the manager of the Lyric theater at Mina, Ark., which has been purchased by his father, A. M. Bumann, a teacher in the State Normal School at Tahlequah, from O. Richbourg.

Officers and members of the Tabernacle Baptist Church at New Bern, N. C., petitioned the managers of Ghent Park to cease their Sunday evening picture shows, declaring that it is sacrilegious to give open air picture shows on Sunday evenings. The shows which had been given after church services throughout the city ended.

Patrons of the Best Theater at Hillsboro, Tex., were so enthusiastic about "Sealed Orders" that the theater played it again to large business. The Best is now advertising itself as "The Theater with a Purpose."

The Royal Amusement Company of San Antonio, Tex., has increased its capital stock from $20,000 to $30,000.

The Saenger Theater at Shreveport, La., has taken up the poster stamp plan of advertising and the ladies and children having been given free albums are now eagerly collecting pictures of their favorites. A seven-piece orchestra has been engaged to give tri-weekly concerts at the Saenger.

Coupons were issued to all delegates to the convention of the Alabama Merchants' Association entitling them to admission to the moving picture shows during the two days that they were entertained in Birmingham.

Mothers with twins were admitted free and the first ten women laying down their money for tickets after 1 o'clock were given free tickets. Part of the pictures were taken in North Fort Worth and the films were shown for two days at the Healy No. 2 in North Fort Worth.

The Vitagraph "Captain Alvarez" made such a hit at the Princess Theater in Charleston, S. C., that the management held it over a day and switched the regular program to the Majestic.

Moving pictures of the ceremonies at the opening of the state capitol building in Oklahoma City, Okla., made a good local feature at Dreamland Theater in that city.

The Home Amusement Company, composed of Forth Worth and Dallas, Tex., business men, will take charge of the new $15,000 motion picture theater which is being erected on North Main Street, between Fourteenth Street and Central Avenue, in North Fort Worth (Marine neighborhood) by M. Cohn of North Fort Worth. The house will seat 500 without a balcony. Leslie McCall, who has been in the photoplay business in Dallas for a number of years, will be manager. It is expected to open the house about the middle of October.

C. C. Rawls has transferred the Grand Theater, a moving picture house at Lake City, Fla., to his son, B. D. Rawls.

"Just a Thin Dime" makes the price look cheap when the Yale Theater at Bartlesville, Okla., contrasts it with one of its programs.

The Florida Panama-Pacific Exposition Commission has its moving pictures of the dedication of the site of the Florida building on tour of the state. They have been shown at Jacksonville, Tampa and Orlando. A lecturer will accompany the reels a part of the time.

The Isis Theater at Houston, Tex., is the only theater in that city taking part in the label contest being conducted by the Houston Chronicle.

The Empress Theater of Fort Smith, Ark., has been re-opened under the direction of L. W. Brophy, president of the Yale Theater Company, and will be operated in connection with the Yale circuit of theaters, including the houses at Muskogee, Vinita, McAlester, Bartlesville, and Tulsa, Okla.

The Woman's Day at the Cotton Palace Exposition in Waco, Tex., received a big impetus when Manager Coke Horne of the Queen Theater of that city gave twenty-five per cent of his receipts for several Tuesdays to the celebration fund. As a special attraction the film showing the Woman's Day parade in 1913 was run.

Art Kunz has sold his interest in the Princess Theater at Waukonis, Okla., to William Williams, who is now the sole owner.

The Lyric Theater at Carmen, Okla., has been remodeled.

John Atchison, formerly connected with the Lyric Theater at Tulsa, Okla., has refitted the Kreager Building at Skatook, Okla., for use as a motion picture theater.

All the motion picture theaters in Hot Springs, Ark., were secured for one Friday afternoon and the proceeds were divided equally between the Orange Street Presbyterian Church and the Interstate Orphans' Home. The photoplay programs were supplemented by musical numbers by prominent local talent.

The Dixie Theater at Kissimmee, Fla., was closed for a number of alterations preparatory to making it the home of feature photoplays. The regular releases will not be entirely ignored.

The Jubilee committee at Enid, Okla., awarded the contract for making films of the celebration to the Paragon Film Company, of Omaha, Neb. All the school children in the county will be included in a picture.

Some of the insides of moving picture taking from the viewpoint of a novice were described to the patrons of the Overholser Theater, at Oklahoma City, Okla., when Al J. Jennings talked in connection with the exhibition of "Beating Back."

Under the management of H. H. Elliott, the new Amusu motion picture theater erected by L. G. Collins at a cost of $25,000, has been opened at Corpus Christi, Tex.

A five-piece orchestra is a new feature at the re-opened Empress Theater in Sapulpa, Okla.

The Lyric Theater at Sapulpa, Okla., got fifteen and ten cents for the local pictures of the laying of the corner stone of the Creek County Court House and the Masonic parade in that city.

The open-air moving picture theater at 17th and Hamilton streets, Allentown, Pa., owned by Charles Orville Alben, of Easton Pa., will be sold by Constable Henry Hartzell on Tuesday, August 27, to satisfy claims of labor, made by Alderman Slough.

The Princess theater proeprty, of Doylestown, Pa., was sold at a sheriff's sale on last Friday morning at the sheriff's office in the court house for $3,325, to the Second Girard Avenue Building Association, the plaintiff in the writ. It was sold as the property of John L. DuBois.

After two months of alterations the William Penn theater, 41st and Lancaster avenue, Philadelphia, opened on August 17. The house was filled with all its former patrons.

The Grand theater, Reading, Pa., has been leased by Samuel N. Potteigher, to Goettler & Addison, of New York, N. Y.

The St. Regis Company, of Philadelphia, has purchased the Shreve property, at 142 State street, Trenton, N. J. The building when completed will be worth upwards of $110,000. James T. Manix, who managed the Broad street theater during the presentation of pictures there this summer, will be local representative. The purchase was not made public.

One of the more recent additions to the roster of the moving picture exchanges in this city is the Crescent Feature Film Exchange, 219 North Thirteenth street. The company, which will handle feature films only, will be managed by Joseph Singer, who for many years was in the moving picture business in this city.

The Fairmount theater, 26th and Girard avenue, Philadelphia, opened on August 24. The place has been completely renovated.

Samuel Elick, assistant superintendent of the Family theater, 13th and Market streets, Philadelphia, has just returned from a two weeks' vacation in Atlantic City, N. J. Most of his time was spent in fishing and motorboating and automobiling.

CONGDON.

WISCONSIN.

THE title selected for the moving pictures taken for the purpose of advertising Fond-du-lac bears a strong resemblance to a recent successful release. The film made there and shown at the Orpheum theater September 8-13, under the auspices of the Fond-du-lac Business Men's Association, is known as "One Wonderful Day." The story-scenic will be shown at the county fair the week of September 17.

Herbest & Hufschmidt, architects at Milwaukee, have drawn plans for a steel and concrete, 50x120, moving picture theater, seating 900 persons, to be erected on North avenue, near Thirty-fifth street, in that city, at a cost of $20,000.

George Stumpf, who has been assistant manager of the Bijou theater at Rhinelander, will be manager of the Pearl theater at De Pere, which Paul Philleo, proprietor of the Bijou, has purchased. Philleo will remain in charge at the Bijou.

M. E. Cahill has sold the Colonial theater at Waukesha to Mr. and Mrs. Harry Jones and John S. Hurley, the latter of the Milwaukee firm of Hurley & Riley. The house will be remodeled at a cost of $5,000.

The Board of Management of the Auditorium at Milwaukee instructed Manager J. C. Grieb to purchase moving picture equipment which will be added to the entertainment facilities of the building.

When "The $500 Kiss" was shown at the Mer-Mac theater at Appleton, Wis., the management gave away 10,000 candy kisses. The bulk of this was distributed for advertising purposes at a matinee for the children.

The management of the People's theater at Superior has been taken over by the newly-incorporated People's Amusement Company, a corporation of Superior business men, headed by A. Dauplaise, a prominent contractor of that city.

Dunne Briggs, who has been manager of the Majestic theater at Bangor has been transferred to Elroy.

Charles M. Spray, of Indiana, and E. J. Van Patten, of Rockford, Ill., have purchased the Dixie theater at Beloit from Frank McCarthy and have assumed charge. McCarthy probably will engage in the photoplay business in some other city.

H. H. Hile of Madison has purchased the Grand theater at Evansville from Thomas Moran and is now operating the house.

The opening of the U-Need-A theater at West Salem on August 23 was encouraging. Admission of fifteen cents for adults and ten cents for children was secured for a four-reel show.

The Gem theater at Beloit has been giving prizes to the persons holding the most profit-sharing coupons.

H. C. Zander, proprietor of the Majestic theater at Rhinelander, has purchased the Eagle Lodge building on South Brown street in that city and next spring will remodel it for use as an opera house.

Manager Harry Jones of the New theater at Waukesha has installed a new $2,500 Wurlitzer orchestra.

The Orpheum photoplay theater, on South Main street, in Fond-du-lac, recently celebrated its seventh anniversary. One reason for the many years of success is given as the careful selection of pictures. For the anniversary week celebration a number of Famous Players and Griffith and other Mutual leaders were shown.

J. W. Quigley, of the Zenith Motion Picture Company of Chicago, was at Oshkosh with a project to make a local film for the Orpheum theater. Interest in the picture was increased many fold by conducting a scenario contest, in which local residents submitted stories they thought especially designed to boost the city.

Manager Charles Pacini, of the New Majestic theater, at Kenosha, ransacked the exchanges for a suitable kiddies' program and gave a free matinee for a hundred and fifty youngsters from the summer home of the Sisters of St. Mary.

The surviving pioneers of Chippewa county were grouped for a film made for the Lyric theater at Chippewa Falls and the pictures will be valuable records there. J. J. Doyle, who did the camera work, also has been busy at Menomonie.

Butternut people were given their introduction to "Lucille Love" with the opening of the remodeled Empire, and the serial will be run every Wednesday night, the show operating on Sunday and Wednesday nights. The interior has been re-arranged and the seating capacity increased to 300.

PENNSYLVANIA.

AN application for a Pennsylvania State charter of incorporation will be made by S. E. Baker, B. F. Miller and James S. Garrett for an intended corporation to be called the Urban Feature Film and Service Company of Johnstown, Pa. The new concern will manufacture, buy, sell, lease and rent motion picture films, apparatus, equipment and contrivances necessary to the motion picture business.

J. D. Simpson, of Canonsburg, has sold the Lyric theater at 175 Pike street to F. C. Seist for $2,700.

Mayer Silverman, proprietor of the Library Film Renting Company, gave a demonstration banquet on Tuesday, September 8, in the Cyclorama auditorium, Northside.

Messrs. J. C. Phillips and Andrew M. McQuitty have just completed their new $25,000 building on South Lake street at North East. This beautiful building of concrete, brick and tile construction, will house a moving picture theater, two large and two small store rooms and three apartments. Built in accord with the latest and very stringent specifications of the state bureau of inspection as to safety, exits, lighting, heating with ventilation, this beautiful theater, "The Chickquitty," with a seating capacity of 600, presents a spectacle seldom equaled in places of amusement in the larger cities. Indirect lights in clusters reflected against the ceiling, color scheme, cream and white, wide side bracket lights against a wall background of ceil brown, flood the auditorium with a soft restful light, without shadows. Six large electric fans keep the air pure and of a uniform temperature. The incline floors, the approach of concrete and the main floor of hard wood, furnish a comfortable mode of entrance and exit unbroken by steps. Wide open aisles of five exits add to safety.

Max W. Herring, manager of the Pittsburg branch of Warner's Features, resigned that position September 1. It is not known who his successor will be, but it is surmised that one of the Wearner boys, whose home is in Pittsburg, may take charge of the exchange. Mr. Herring is at present undecided as to his future activities, but that he will stay in the film business seems a foregone conclusion, as he understands the business from A to Z.

The New Empire theater of Connellsville was opened Saturday, August 22, under the management of Messrs. Hurley, Robinson and Croughanan. The projection room has two Powers 6A machines and other up-to-date equipment.

Two new motion picture houses being erected by Clark & Rowland in the East End, Pittsburg, are rapidly nearing completion, the "Regent" in East Liberty, being scheduled to open October 1, and the new house in Homewood, not yet named, being so far advanced that it is expected the opening date will be advanced to about September 15. The Regent is located in Penn avenue, just west of Highland, in the business section of Pittsburg's most aristocratic residential district with a population of 150,000, and it can be seen that the possibilities of the picture business are practically unlimited. The The auditorium of the Regent will be 60x120 feet, with a seating capacity of 1,000, absolutely fireproof, with sixteen exits, making it the safest house in the city. A $10,000 pipe organ, in addition to a regular orchestra, will furnish music. A new idea in ventilation will be installed, costing $4,000. Three projecting machines will be used. A sign 24 feet high with an electric fountain on top and costing $3,000 will be a feature of the house. The total cost of the building and equipment will be close to $65,000. The Homewood house is being built on a lot 48x120 feet on the corner of Homewood avenue and Bennett street. The house will be modern in every particular and a model in its way. It will cost $35,000.

Henry Gauding, who has been conducting the Lyric theater, Boggs avenue, Mt. Washington, Pittsburg, for the past year, opened the new house called the Lincoln, in the same neighborhood, Wednesday, August 6. It is of fireproof construction and equipped in a thoroughly up-to-date manner, with a capacity of 450, costing $15,000. The owner, Mrs. Arnold, is now conducting the Lyric. MANLEY.

KANSAS.

MANAGER M. CALLISTER, of the Star theater in Wichita, is spending several thousand dollars in remodeling and decorating, but the result justifies the expenditure. The reopening will take place in September.

Jack Wilson, treasurer last season of the Willis Wood theater of Kansas City, has been appointed manager of the Hip in Topeka. The Hip was formerly the Majestic, but this season will be operated as a feature motion picture house. Mr. Wilson is well known and popular in Topeka, where he had his introduction to the show business as a vaudeville actor.

H. L. Massey, known among theater people as "Buck," has arrived in Topeka from Los Angeles and has taken charge of the Grand theater. Mr. Massey is widely known as a press agent and theatrical manager. Four years ago he had charge of the Shubert theater at New Orleans, later he managed a skating rink in London, England, and recently has been associated with the publicity department of the Barnum & Bailey Circus. The Hip, the new moving picture house at Topeka, offers a novelty in the Bartola which provides the music.

The Best theater at Topeka put on the war film, "A Born Warrior," at the usual price of admission, 5 cents. To take care of the crowds a special morning performance was started at 10 o'clock. The film was shown two days.

Manager Blubaugh of the Vaudette theater, at Fort Scott, has leased the Pictureland theater and will manage both of them from now on. The Pictureland, which had been closed for several weeks, was opened with "Stolen Pie."

No. 6638 won the diamond ring given by the Airdome at Atchison recently. It is a ladies' ring and Leon Forbriger, the present possessor, is a bachelor.

The Iris theater at Topeka, which has taken the Paramount franchise for that city, has issued a rather striking policy for the operation of the house. No advertising slides are used, there is a continuous program, despite the heavy cost of the program, and the admission continues at 5 and 10 cents. In keeping with the high tone of the establishment—its catch phrase is "The Aristocracy of the Movies"—it has announced that autos and carriages may call at 8.45, 10.15 and 11.45. The theater probably will get a good deal of aristocratic patronage. BROWN.

IOWA.

THE Phillips Opera House at Oelwein has been leased by O. L. March, of Chicago, who has renamed it the Colonial theater. He will operate it as a moving picture house, booking other attractions frequently. A number of improvements have been made in the physical condition of the house.

H. G. Dlugosch has sold the Princess theater at Storm Lake to G. E. Yeager and Fred Carns of Spencer.

Charles Berkell has not been too busy with his "World at Home" carnival enterprise to watch the moving picture business in Davenport. On a recent visit home he took a lease on the Elite theater, on West Second street, and planned to re-open it September 6 as a motion picture theater. One of the features of the new house will be the issuing of a Davenport Weekly, which will depict local events. H. D. Fairall, of the Western Motion Picture Company, has joined the staff of the Elite and will be the cameraman. Berkell will return to Davenport at the close of the carnival season in November and assume active management of the Elite.

The new Rex theater has been opened at Manly.

Ideas obtained by F. J. Smid on a trip to Bohemia two years ago are used in the re-decoration of his Ideal moving picture theater on Fourteenth avenue in Cedar Rapids. Although the house is a comparatively new one he has just had scenic artists reproduce on the walls a number of oil paintings which he brought over from Bohemia.

The Pastime theater has been opened for business at Rake.

L. O. Brewer of Dumont has purchased a moving picture theater at Hamberg.

The deal for the sale of the Grand Opera House at Fort Madison to Covert & Lancaster of Quincy, Ill., has been consummated by M. E. Ackles of Keokuk. The house will continue operation under the lease of the Baker-Dodge Amusement Company of Keokuk with road shows, vaudeville and pictures.

C. A. Pemble and J. A. Bradshaw are erecting a building at Paton to be used as a moving picture theater.

Contrary to the usual custom there will be no Sunday shows at the Princess theater in the West End of Fort Madison under the new management of E. F. Hoffman of Dallas, Tex., who purchased the house from Mrs. Louis Otten. The new owner has added to the seating capacity and redecorated the house.

W. L. Harper will operate the moving picture show in the new building erected at Rhodes by W. D. Hix.

Church people of Rock Rapids object to the operation of C. E. Eckliff's moving picture show on Sunday. Search of the municipal records is said to have failed to reveal an ordinance which would prevent the show from operating.

Prior to the showing of the first episode of "The Million Dollar Mystery" in Marshalltown there was so much interest that the Isis theater threw open the doors at 8 a. m. and ran until midnight in order to accommodate the crowds.

Albert Hahn has been remodeling a room in the Fesler Building at Riverside to be used as a moving picture show.

The Jewel theater, under the management of H. A. Fritche and W. G. Niemann, of Burlington, has been opened on North Main street in Burlington. The first attraction was the alluring and already famous "One Wonderful Night," featuring Francis X. Bushman. The new house seats 500. It is equipped with a Wurlitzer orchestrion.

Manager Greenbaum of the Casino theater at Davenport is gradually developing as a champion of the all-feature policy. He has been giving features Thursdays and Fridays and now finds it profitable to give over to the big subjects every Monday and Tuesday.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

MONTREAL.

MONTREAL exhibitors are by no means discouraged at the outbreak of hostilities, and the consequent increase in the cost of living. The general opinion entertained by local managers is that no matter how reduced in circumstances the people are they will always find the necessary small amount which can obtain for them a few hours entertainment. A gentleman, who is connected with a prominent theater in this city and who is well known in local circles, in discussing the situation with the writer stated that he was at one time managing a theater in an Ontario manufacturing town, where the factories closed down every year for one month. Although there was a scarcity of money and the townspeople were compelled to run up bills at their butchers and grocers, the theater did more business during the period of commercial inactivity than at any other time during the year. However, the writer does not infer that everything will be plain sailing for Montreal exhibitors during this crisis.

A pleasing thing to see in Montreal at this time is the unselfishness and patriotism of the exhibitors. Some are holding benefit performances for the relief of the families of Canadian volunteers, while others are doing other acts of kindness which will surely be appreciated by all. There is also a marked absence of fake "special feature stuff" which was so much in evidence at the time of the Empress of Ireland disaster. We have in mind one house which, by means of gigantic posters, announced that views of the wreck were to be seen with them. Through curiosity we entered and saw pen and ink sketches, by cartoonists on the local papers, shown on the screen.

Two Verdun moving picture theater proprietors have petitioned the Verdun town council for permission to operate their shows on Sundays during the war, in return for which they will donate half of the profits made on Sundays to the families of those resident in Verdun who have gone to the war. At the present writing, the town council has decided to leave the matter over until their next meeting. Under the existing by-laws it would be necessary to give a month's notice of a motion to allow the proprietors to keep open on Sundays. The notice of motion was not made.

The Sunday concerts are scoring a big success at the Francais theater. Mr. Hooley is always on the job and the genial manager's labors are rewarded by large and appreciative audiences. Kinemacolor is the lion of the moment at these concerts. On week days there are two performances at this theater, which consists of seven high-class vaudeville acts and several good reels of photoplays. Mr. Hooley recently booked a very timely subject—the only moving picture in which the late Pope Pius X. ever appeared. It was very much appreciated.

Mr. Cross, manager of the Colonial theater, has been offering some very fine programs of late. He has special war features and at great expense is having the lobby of the theater remodeled.

Manager Driscoll, of the Orpheum theater, a local Keith vaudeville house, has special concerts every Sunday afternoon and evening. High class photoplays and several vaudeville acts which are held over Sunday make up the offering.

The Rex theater, St. Denis boulevard, is being greatly enlarged and renovated and will be ready for business in a short while.

The Alexandria theater is closed pending alterations and will be reopened shortly.

Abbie Wright, manager of the Princess theater, the local Shuberts' house, has arrived back in Montreal from a long summer vacation spent in the Orient. "Cabiria," a film version of Gabriel d'Annunzio's work, was shown at the Princess during two weeks, commencing August 24. Music was furnished by a large symphony orchestra and a male chorus of some forty voices. Large houses were the rule at both evening and afternoon exhibitions.

The offering of their services to the Motherland by Canadian soldiers necessitated the storage of the volunteers' personal effects while they were at the front. Mr. Herring, manager of the Mount Royal theater, announced that the cellar of the theater building was at their service; five hundred trunks can be stored in it. Mr. Herring is very pleased with business, and his plan of having a little intermission between pictures is working out fine.

The Family theater has been completely redecorated and new scenery and projecting machines have been installed. In connection with "The Million Dollar Mystery" Mr. West has engaged a lecturer who explains in French all sub-titles and other things which cannot be grasped easily by French-Canadian audiences. Mr. West is making arrangements for the showing of Kinemacolor pictures.

The Montreal Herald and Daily Telegraph, the local newspaper which is running the Universal serial, "The Trey o' Hearts," is distributing photo albums of moving picture actors and actresses.

Mr. Byerle, formerly in the exchange business in El Paso, Texas, and now managing the Montreal office of the Canadian Universal, when interviewed by the writer as to present business, stated that it could not be any better and that he had not felt any effects as yet from the European war. Mr. Byerle stated that "The Trey o' Hearts" was doing record-breaking business in his territory; over thirty Montreal houses have booked this serial.

Tom Cross, proprietor and former manager of the Colonial theater, has left the affairs of that house in the capable hands of Mr. Teal, and is now managing the Consolidated Film Company. Mr. Cross is a native of the "old country" and has had much experience in the film industry. He was at one time secretary of Hibbert's Pictures, Ltd., of London, Eng. Mr. Cross spent a few days in Toronto this week on business.

"America," a seven-reel film reproduction of last year's success at the New York Hippodrome, was seen at the London theater recently.

The second and last week of "Cabiria," at the Princess, closed with the evening show on Saturday, September 5. These pictures will live long in the memory of Montrealers. Throughout the two weeks of its Montreal presentation, it evoked praise from all—press, clergy and audience. Business was better during the second week.

The Pathescope of Canada, Ltd., has been granted a Dominion charter. The company has a capitalization of $250,000, divided into 2,500 shares of one hundred dollars each. Its charter allows it to manufacture, import, export, purchase, sell, deal in, exchange, both as principal and agent, cinematographs, film and other similar products; to operate moving picture shows; to act as agents for the purchase, sale, leasing of all moving picture apparatus and accessories; to purchase, acquire, hold, convey, sell the shares, debentures or securities of any other companies having the same objects, in whole or in part, as those of the company, to accept payment of property and works, shares, debentures and bonds of any other companies. The purpose of the company is from time to time to do one or several of the acts, transactions and other things enumerated in the present charter, either alone or in conjunction with others, as principals or agents.

The Conness Till Film Company, Ltd., 1 Adelaide street east, Toronto, Ont., is conducting an extensive advertising campaign in the leading Canadian periodicals. It is "a Canadian firm established in Canada for the purpose of producing Canadian plays with distinctive Canadian settings and written by Canadians." This company is offering $350 in prizes for photoplays in its photoplay contest. The closing date is September 25. Every photoplay theater in Canada has been advised of this contest, and the theater, of which the winner is a patron, will be given one week's free service of the prize photoplay. GALLAGHER.

NEW ENGLAND.

THERE have been many interesting changes at the various New England exchanges through the summer. Sam Bernfield, of the Eclectic, has gone to Salt Lake City to take charge of the Eclectic Film Exchange there. Frank L. Vine of the same company has been transferred to the Boston Exchange from Pittsburgh. Mr. Vine says he is glad to be in New England again, where he is so well known, although the West is a great place!

M. L. Machat, formerly of the Standard Feature Film Company, took charge of the World Film Corporation's Boston office about August 10.

C. E. Webster is connected with the World Film Corporation as special representative. Mr. Webster is a well known film man, formerly with the Mutual Corporation, and should be a valuable addition to the World Corporation. W. T. Nelson and Geo. A. Hickey are road representatives for this firm.

Messrs. Cloutier & Denault opened their new Plaza theater, Fall River, Mass., on September 4. Seating capacity, 1,100.

J. A. Eslow, manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, has just returned from a trip to Maine. Mr. Eslow visited the Bangor branch of the company and spent a week end with W. P. Gray of Mystic Hall, Lewiston.

Mr. James Walsh opens the Music Hall, Taunton, this season. Mr. Walsh was formerly with the Keith interests in Providence.

The New Royal Theater, Olneyville, R. I., will be opened in September, with J. Fred Lovett, formerly of the Academy Theater, Haverhill, as manager. This theater is owned by E. C. Sheldon, a prominent Rhode Island grain merchant.

The Academy Theater, Haverhill, which formerly ran vaudeville and motion pictures, will go stock company this season.

The new theater which Messrs. Gray and McDonough will build in Portsmouth, N. H., promises to be one of the finest. Work will be started at once, and it is expected to be finished about the first of the year. W. Robinson, formerly with Mr. Green's theater at Onset, will open the Lyric Theater at Fitchburg, Mass. under a new policy. Motion pictures will furnish the program from 7 till 8.30. Beginning 8.30 a high class stock company playing high class programs will finish the bill. Another theater working under this policy is the Scenic Theater, Waltham, Mass. This theater will play stock and motion pictures, using the Universal program. Montie Thompson is the manager of this house.

Boston will have another "regular" theater join the moving picture van this season. The old Park Theater on Washington street is being renovated at a cost of $30,000.

Felix Alland expects to reopen the Pastime Theater early in the season, after Washington street has been renovated. Mr. Ashland will continue using Mutual service and vaudeville.

The new Modern theater, Boston, has been giving its patrons a treat through the summer in the big feature line. Sam Penanski and J. Laurie are devoting a great deal of time to the selection of pictures for this house. Mr. Laurie has just returned from a trip to New York in the interests of the various theaters he is connected with.

The first theater to be erected in the fashionable Brookline, Mass., district is almost completed. This is a modern steel and concrete building costing $185,000. It is situated in Alston at Harvard and Boylston streets, and will be called the Alston. Motion pictures and vaudeville will be the policy.

Charles Williams of the Casino theater, Providence, R. I., has again taken over the management of the Victoria theater, Laurence, Mass. With the new Providence theater buildings Mr. Williams will have to hustle some to get around.

The Gem theater, Lewiston, Me., is now showing Paramount pictures. The Mystic hall, Lewiston, has opened the season with a combined program of Universal and Mutual. Business is always good there. Jones & Barrabre expect to open their new theater in Lewiston in December. The first story is already up. This will make five motion picture theaters, with a sixth promised, in this busy town.

The Court theater, Worcester, Mass., Mr. Ball, manager, opened Labor Day. This is a cozy new theater seating 550, and will use general service.

H. E. Dodge, of the Y. M. C. A., Fall River, Mass., has arranged to present a once-a-week show the coming season to his people at Fall River. He will also co-operate with Mr. Bigelow of the local theaters there, when the Bosworth film "John Barleycorn" will be shown.

The Universal special feature "Neptune's Daughter" is meeting with remarkable success throughout New England. Manager Eslow reports four prints of the beautiful picture busy all the time. Jim Donovan, genial representative for the Universal, is combining business and pleasure this week at Savin Rock, Conn., where the Kellerman film is playing a return engagement at the Strand theater for eight days.

The General film masterpiece "The House Next Door" is booked to play at the Modern theater, Boston, at an early date. Mr. E. J. Farrell, local manager for the General Film Company has just returned from a visit through Maine and reports everything "fine."

St. John's hall of East Cambridge has been taken over by the Cambridge Theater Company and was opened Monday September 7. The name has been changed to the Comique thater, and it will be operated under the personal supervision of R. W. Down.

The American Feature Film Company, L. B. Mayer, president and general manager, has secured the New England rights to the production of "The $5,000,000 Counterfeiting Plot," featuring Detective Wm. J. Burns, and already announces that bookings are coming in even faster than had been anticipated; in fact, present indications point to the necessity of securing a number of extra prints.

Manager Eslow of the Universal has announced that the next special feature manufactured by his company will be released through the regular program. This is a step which all exhibitors will view as a welcome departure from present feature policy.

The Colonial theater, Haverhill, after several weeks of remodeling and repairs was opened for the season of 1914-15 on Labor Day with a policy of vaudeville and feature pictures. Legitimate attractions will be offered once a week, the first of these coming Thursday, September 24, with Stella Mayhew in "High Jinks."

The New England Motion Picture Company has secured a lease of twenty acres of beautiful scenic spots in Massachusetts. The company expects to be producing pictures by October first. With executive offices at Medford, Mass., the list of officers and directors stamp this company as one of the soundest commercial enterprises in New England, with a capital of $150,000 incorporated in Massachusetts. The officers of the new company are as follows: F. Eugene Farnsworth, of Boston, a lecturer, traveler and motion picture expert, is president; Col. August H. Goelting, of Springfield, a capitalist and candidate for Lieutenant Governor, is vice-president; Edward L. Knight, manager of the Bijou theater, Springfield, is treasurer; and Moses H. Libby, an attorney, will not only perform the secretarial duties of the company, but will also be the counsel for the new corporation. In addition to the above list of officers who also act as directors, Thomas L. Hisgen, president of Four Brothers Independent Oil Company, Springfield, and William W. Benson, manager of Hotel Northy, Springfield, are directors.

CARROLL.

WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON now has as fine a motion picture theater as there is to be found in the country, for "Tom" Moore has opened the Strand theater, and in this house is to be shown only the greater productions. For two weeks "Cabiria" was shown twice daily to large audiences, for its fame has been spread broadcast, and everywhere are to be heard words of praise of the beauty of the photography. A novelty feature of this theater, which was formerly the New Academy, situated at Ninth and D streets, Northwest, is the changing of stage settings and other scenery to correspond with the pictures shown, and the dressing of the ticket takers and ushers in conformity thereto. Thus, during the showing of "Cabiria," the doormen were dressed after the Roman fashion, while the young lady ushers wore attractive dresses peculiar to that period. Fred B. Winters, for the past ten or twelve years treasurer of the New Academy, makes his debut into the moving picture field as manager of the Strand. He is well known to the theatergoers of Washington and his popularity will increase in his new position. For the past two months this theater has been undergoing alterations and decorators have been actively at work, with the result that this is one of the handsomest places in town. There are two intermissions during each exhibition in imitation of "between the acts," and an orchestra of more than twenty pieces dispenses classics and popular airs afternoons and evenings. The admission to the afternoon show is twenty-five cents, while in the evening it is twenty-five and fifty cents. This is the sort of theater that has been advocated for quite some time by the daily press, and the manner in which it was patronized during the first two weeks presages success. A more detailed account of the equipment and furnishing of the house, as well as of its policies, will appear in an early issue of the Moving Picture World.

With the increasing interest being taken in the moving picture industry by the public at large, we hear more or less criticism or favorable comment, as the case may be, on the projection at the different theaters. The daily newspapers and the motion picture magazines have brought the people to a point where they demand not only the showing of high grade photoplays but the correct projection of them. It is remarked that the theater-goers of Washington are the hardest people in the world to please, for legitimate productions and photoplays which make a great hit in other cities are liable to get a very undemonstrative reception here. A study into the question of projection has brought about many revelations. At Crandall's theater, for instance, the pictures are wonderfully clear. This condition was brought about partly by delving into the art of optics, for the machines at this theater are equipped with specially made lenses. In other words, the distance from the machines to the screen was measured and lenses ground with a focal strength sufficient to bring the rays of light to a focus directly on the screen. Then again, care was given in the selection of the type of screen to be used. This care and additional expense has more than paid for itself, because it is appreciated by the patrons. If one would care to do so, he could sit in any part of the house during the giving of an exhibition and read his newspaper as comfortably and as well as in any well lighted room, and there is no stumbling about in the dark going to and from the seats. Crandall's is following out a new policy of using the backs of their programs to tell the patrons "Why our pictures are universally considered the best in the city." These remarks are changed weekly, and the last one issued bore the following reasons: "First: We will not allow any but a perfect picture shown in our theater. Second: We employ the best and most careful operators and pay them well. Third: We use the latest improved machines with the best imported lenses especially made for our theater. Fourth: We have the radium gold screen which assures perfect projection; which gives depth and brilliancy to the picture and is positively uninjurious to the eyes, no matter how close you sit. Fifth: We show new pictures only of the very best quality; no scratched-up films will be shown in this theater, no matter how important they may be, and we pay the very best prices for the same, knowing our patrons demand the best and will not be deceived. Sixth: Our pictures are on a direct line with the eye, thus eliminating the necessity of looking upward and relieving the eye of the consequent strain. We invite comparison with any other theater in the city."

The Florida theater, at Fifteenth and H streets, Northeast, was opened for the season Saturday, September 5, under the management of Andrew J. Benton. From the outside this is not the showiest house in the city, but the interior is as well equipped as any. With a floor space of forty-four by ninety feet, this house can seat 410 persons. The screen is a mirroroid one and slants so that the top is one foot behind the perpendicular of the bottom edge. This overcomes the out-of-focus keystone effect which would perhaps otherwise be given by the machine, which is about fifteen feet above the floor. This screen is giving the greatest degree of satisfaction to the management, and on it sixty-day pictures look as well as many newer ones would on a poorer screen. An innovation of this house is the placing of the ticket booth four feet from the building wall. This is directly in the center of the lobby space and behind it is the entrance to the theater. On each side of the building is a double-doored exit, and this arrangement does away with the confusion brought about by audiences coming and going at the same time. There are five other exits at different parts of the theater. Directly over the front, and running the entire width, are three rooms. The center of these is the projection room, containing two machines. The room at the right contains one of the twenty-four inch intake fans and is used for the storage and for rewinding of films, while the room at the left contains a washroom for the benefit of the operators, and in this room is also done all the repair work. It also contains a twenty-four inch intake fan. This house is equipped with a stage ten by eighteen feet, and beneath this at each side are toilet rooms for the lady patrons. In the center is located the engine room, entrance to which is gained from the rear of the building. Behind the screen is a thirty-six inch suction fan. The screen measures twelve feet six inches by seventeen feet eight inches. There has also been provided two toilet rooms for the men patrons. The floor is of cement overlaid with wood. The walls are buff colored and along the two side walls are eight side lights in ornamental colored shades. The ceiling is light blue green in color. The lobby is paved with mottled stone to the cement sidewalk. At either end is a pillar bearing a one-sheet poster frame. Above these are two flasher lights. In the use of these latter, the usual intricate motor arrangement has been displaced by what is termed a skadoodle, costing sixty or seventy cents each. This is an arrangement of mercury within a short tube. The turning on of the current allows of the passing of about two candlepower into the lamp and through the mercury, which becomes partially heated. This causes the lighting of the lamp to its full candlepower. In its turn the lamp becomes heated, causing the mercury to again contract and the circuit is broken. The expanding and contracting of the mercury occurs intermittently every fifteen seconds. The ticket box is of wooden construction and finished in imitation of weather copper. The base is of marble. This house will run four reels daily at an admission price of five cents, while on Sundays there will be seven or more reels in the afternoon and six in the evening at a charge of ten cents for adults and five cents for children under ten years of age. On Sundays a four-piece orchestra will play during each performance.

J. Leo Yates, formerly connected with the local office of the General Film Company, is now in charge of the Baltimore office of that company. This office comes within the local territory.

INDIANA.

DR. J. M. RHODES, president of the Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, and A. C. Zaring, secretary, have joined hands in buying the Garrick theater, Indianapolis. The Garrick has not enjoyed the success that its location and equipment deserve, but is figured to be due for a new lease on life under the management of the new owners, who are experienced and resourceful.

Business still is good with the airdomes, though the cool weather of the last week has helped mightily in filling the roofed-in houses. The exchanges report business taking on new life. The serial films are in big demand.

The Lyric theater, Remington, has put on a bigger program and will return to the winter schedule of prices. It has been running all summer as a five-cent house.

The government Bureau of Mines and Mining is filming the stone mills and quarries in and about Bloomington.

The Gem theater, Albion, is putting up a new entrance. The stage is being moved back, and the additional room filled with chairs. Manager Walters likes to see them standing up in his house, but is going to provide as many seats as possible. The house has always enjoyed good patronage.

The merchants of Odon, who have been giving free moving picture shows on the public square every Wednesday night, are convinced that the idea has been a money maker. The program will be continued as long as the weather will pheum."

Manager Frank O. Heller, Anderson, entertained the young women in the Community Home at his theater, the Meridian. The Community Home is for working girls away from home.

The arrangement between the New Era theater and the Columbus Herald whereby the Herald runs a half page daily, including a marked coupon, six of which entitle the holder to an admission to the theater, is working with great success both for the paper and the theater. Effort is now being made to get the coupon users to visit the theater in the afternoon.

The Orpheum, Lafayette, is using "reason why" advertising copy, saying "the reason why our pictures are bright and clear and free from flicker is because they are first run films, not more than five days old from studio to Orpheum.

The Lafayette Journal, Lafayette, comments on the George Ade comedies now being shown in moving pictures as being exceptionally good and clean, and a credit to the Purdue University author-director.

Ross Schromeyer, better known as "Bailey," has taken over the management of the Sourwine theater, Brazil, for the Eggleston-Cunningham Company, lessees of the house. Schromeyer runs a cafe, but is an old timer in the theatrical profession, having worked in blackface with several minstrel companies.

National Canners Association has filmed the F. J. Mattice Canning Company factory at Rochester as a model factory. The films are being taken for the Panama-Pacific fair.

The Memorial theater, Valparaiso, has reopened after a thorough overhauling that has greatly improved the appearance of the house inside and out, and added some seating capacity. E. H. Butler has been named assistant manager.

C. T. Geary, Montpelier, after a six weeks' vacation in the northwest, returned and will resume management of the Star theater soon. During his absence Mr. Geary leased the house to F. M. Beaty. Mr. Beaty will be in charge until September 12.

The Universal theater, Newcastle, is moving from the Jennings block to the Union. It will adopt the name the Theatorium in the new location.

A large part of the free entertainment "Prosperity Week" at Kokomo, was furnished by industrial films on various kinds, among them being the film "The Growth of a Shoe," by the United Shoe Machinery Company.

Her two admirers get into a brawl as to who shall skate with her, and it is about to be settled when the police force, headed by Sweedie's employer, enters. The "would-be" society lady is frantic over the loss of her jewels and orders Sweedie arrested. A stubborn resistance is then put up by the husky cook, and everybody gets his share of the knocking about that follows.

LOVE'S MAGNET (Sept. 22).—Betty receives a letter from her cousin in the city, asking her to come and pay a visit. Betty's aunt objects to her going, so she steals away one night. While in a cafe one evening, her eye is caught by an actor who hypnotizes her before she can leave the place. He leads her away and for ten years keeps her under his control. Meanwhile her sweetheart, Bryarly, is heartbroken and has used every means to locate her, but without avail. He finally goes to the city where he may find new interests. One night he goes into the kitchen, and much to his surprise finds Betty there. She has crossed an areaway to escape the actor, and in trying to follow her he has fallen to his death. Betty and Bryarly then return to their home town where Betty is told she has been left a fortune by her aunt.

THE FABLE OF ONE SAMARITAN WHO GOT PARALYSIS OF THE HELPING HAND (Sept. 23).—Once there was an old man called Jonah Crabb, who believed in doing Good. Every morning the Bunco Artists would lay for him on the street corners, and after they had told their hard luck stories, he would Dish Out Coin to them. When he arrived at his office he was almost swamped with Panhandlers and Bums. Finally he tried his hand at fixing up a Lovers Quarrel, and put his foot in it. Billy Speedwell, the man in the case, got hold of the Old Boy and simply knocked the Spots out of him for Butting In on his affairs. From that time on Mr. Crabb changed his mind about doing good, and the next morning made a Cleaning of the Hoboes collected in his office. Moral: Cast your bread upon the Waters and it will come back to you as Sponge Cake.

SLIPPERY SLIM AND THE GREEN EYED MONSTER (Sept. 24).—Sophie's father seriously objects to her having gentlemen callers, so one night she induces him to retire early, then writes a note to Mustang Pete, telling him it is now safe for him to come over. Slippery Slim is "green eyed" with jealousy at the partiality shown his rival. Mustank and Sophie are no more than settled when Slim knocks at the door, waking up the "old man." Mustang hides and when father come down stairs he finds nobody but Slim, so he kicks him out and then goes back to bed. Slim then climbs up to his window and tells him Mustank is downstairs. Hiram goes down and chases Mustang, thereby leaving a clear field for Slim.

THE STRATEGY OF BRONCHO BILLY'S SWEETHEART (Sept. 26).—Broncho Billy shoots an outlaw for making a disrespectful remark about his sweetheart. After the shooting he hastens to her home and tells her he has shot a man, but does not know who he is. Shortly after the remainder of the gang of outlaws arrive and, to learn the direction Broncho went, tell her it was her father who was shot. She then tells the direction of her sweetheart's flight. A few minutes later her father comes home and she realizes her mistake. She dashes after the gang and by a short cut heads them off, and tells them that Broncho is hiding in her home. They return, giving Broncho plenty of time to escape.

A SPLENDID DISHONOR (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 25).—Frank Sergeant, a wealthy young clubman, is told by his physician that he has only a short time to live. He straightens out his affairs and is on the point of self-destruction when he is saved by Julia Annersley, a beautiful girl, who pleads with him to change places with her brother, Hugh, who has been falsely accused of murder. Sergeant agrees to the proposition, fakes up evidence against himself, and gives himself up to the police. Hugh is released, believing the actual murderer has been found. One day he discovers his sister in Sergeant's cell, and bitterly denounces her, being ignorant of Sergeant's sacrifice. Julia has learned to love the confessed murderer and is heartbroken to think he is to die for a crime of which he was guiltless. Sergeant now learns that his physician had been committed to an insane asylum, and that he is but one of the many patients which the physician had insanely condemned to die. A thorough examination proves that Sergeant's health is perfectly normal. He dare not refute his confession for Julia's sake, and just when life looks dearest to him he is facing the electric chair. The tragic problem is solved when the real murderer, conscience stricken, confesses his guilt, and Sergeant is allowed to go free.

MELIES.

THE TRAMP'S REVENGE (Sept. 15).—A tramp, having had a joke played on him by the section boss, plans revenge. With some blasting powder he leaves a trail from the dynamite shanty to a nearby coal pile. There he substitutes coal dust for the blasting powder and gives it to the boss's children. The boss, discovering the trail, follows it and almost drops in his tracks when he sees his children playing with the mock gunpowder. After rescuing them he finds out his mistake but appreciates what a scare he had.

THE SCAB WAITER (Sept. 17).—The waiters in Mr. Schmalz' restaurant go on a strike and the latter is forced to send to an agency for help. He gets it in the shape of a remodelled tramp. As a waiter, however, the tramp turns out to be a joke and after breaking dishes and ruining the place, he is thrown out. He is last seen, sitting with a couple of his kind and enjoying some of the delicacies that he had stolen from the restaurant.

THE $1,000 PANTS (Sept. 22).—Mr. Brown has $1,000, which he hides in an old pair of pants. His wife sells the pants and when Brown finds it out, he runs out to look for them. He locates them on a tramp and tries in various ways to get them back. He finally succeeds, by pushing the tramp over and yanking the pants off. In the security of his home he looks for the money but fails to find it. The tramp is last seen, seated on a barrel, slowly counting the big roll and chuckling over his good fortune.

HOW CLARENCE GOT HIS (Sept. 24).—Clarence is a lady-killer and persists in making love to more than one at the same time. Unfortunately he gets his wires crossed and two of his fair victims learn of his game. They therefore proceed to teach him a lesson and when they get through with him, he jumps out of the window. He drops into the arms of an old maid, who realizes her good fortune and takes advantage of it.

VITAGRAPH

FINE FEATHERS MAKE FINE BIRDS (Sept. 21).—During the first year of married life, Lillian Norton and Harry, her husband, are very happy, but when the children come along, she is so wrapt up in them she neglects her husband and becomes slovenly in appearance. He soon notices this and gradually drifts back into club life. At one of the entertainments, he meets and becomes infatuated with Carmela, a dancer. His wife learns of this, goes to Carmela and begs her to refuse Harry's attention. The dancer is at first scornful, then, on thinking it over, decides to open Lillian's eyes as to the real cause of her husband's infatuation and help her win him back. She sends for Lillian, lends her some of her own finery, and reminds her of the old saying, "Fine feathers make fine birds." According to pre-arranged plan, Lillian, heavily veiled and beautifully gowned, goes to the restaurant where her husband is impatiently awaiting Carmela's arrival. Lillian comes in, and Harry mistakes her for the dancer. She lifts her veil and to his amazement, Harry finds himself looking into the beautiful face of his wife. Both return home, and after Harry contritely begs her forgiveness, Lillian grants it and confesses that she also, has learned a lesson. From that time on, her husband always finds his wife and children looking neat, while their love for each other grows stronger every day and happiness reigns supreme, where a short time before discord held sway.

THE BLOOD RUBY (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 22).—Sent out West to the ranch of wealthy James Warner, to make a man of himself, Hugh Barton, a reckless young fellow, sinks back into his old habits and schemes with Grotz, a crooked jeweler, to secure an almost priceless blood ruby, set in a ring, belonging to Warner. The crook makes a clever imitation of the stone, they get Warner intoxicated and Hugh steals the ring. He then places the imitation jewel in the coat of Bob Carr, Warner's foreman. When the imitation ring is found on Carr, he is accused of the robbery, convicted and sent to prison. Doctor Van Rutten, a philantropist and connoissuer, becomes interested in Carr's case, refuses to believe him guilty and takes charge of Carr's motherless child. Meanwhile, Hugh and Grotz sell the genuine ruby to Heinrich Von Rutten, a collector of precious stones, not knowing the latter is a nephew of the doctor. Grotz and Hugh then set up a fake mining promoting business in New York. Warner visits New York, meets the Doctor, who tells him the ring he is now wearing and which was found in Carr's pocket, is a fake one. The case is investigated further and Carr's sentence reduced for good behavior. Heinrich, meantime, comes to visit the Doctor, and there meets Carr, who has been released. Both recognize the genuine ruby on Heinrich's finger, Warner is sent for, and through Heinrich, the two rascals, Hugh and Grotz, are located and arrested. Grotz "squeals" on Hugh, signs a confession and the pair are allowed to go on condition they leave American at once. Carr is left happy in the love of his child and the steadfast friendship of those who helped him in time of trouble.

A DOUBLE ERROR (Sept. 23).—Because her sweetheart proves unfaithful, Jane, a popular debutante, has her faith in men shattered. She decides to spend her summer among strangers, with her brother Bob, and forget. At a summer hotel, they are mistaken for a newly-married couple, and both agree to keep up the deception for a joke. The "newly-weds" become acquainted with Earle Hewlett and his sister, Betty. Bob falls in love with Betty and Jane is obliged to remind him several times he is supposed to be a married man and must first ask his "wife" if she wishes to dance. Brother and sister soon find their joke is not as much fun as they anticipated, but Jane refuses to allow Bob to explain. Jane and Earle then fall deeply in love, and he, being an honorable man, rather than confess his love to a married woman, decides to go away. Womanlike, she decides to test him. She tells Earle of her love for him and he seizes her in a passionate embrace. Betty and Bob see them and she says, "Look at my brother and your wife." Bob is tickled to death for a moment, then remembers his "part" and pretends anger. He denounces Earle and hugely enjoys Jane's poorly-concealed anger and vexation. Jane then confesses to Earle and Betty, and to get even with Bob, Betty confesses love for him, and he seizes her in his arms. Then Earle appears and gives Bob, a married man, a good "raking over," for hugging his sister. After an awful minute, all burst into laughter, and soon the two happy couples, Jane and Earle and Bob and Betty, are looking forward to a double wedding.

A CLOSE CALL (Sept. 24).—Rendered desperate by lack of funds, Red Mills, an outlaw, overpowers the Express Agent at a small Western Railroad station, and flees with a bag of gold into the woods. He enters the cabin of Tom Morton while the latter is away, frightens Mrs. Morton into submission and buries the money under the floor. Hearing the sheriff and posse coming, Mills hides in the attic, taking Morton's young child with him, after telling Mrs. Morton he will strangle her child if she reveals his whereabouts. The Sheriff arrives and Mrs. Morton is in a terrible state of mind to evade the officers' inquiries. The Sheriff becomes suspicious, searches the house and finds the bag of gold. Mrs. Morton dare make no explanation, knowing it would mean death to her child. At this juncture, Tom Morton enters, and is arrested for the crime. After the departure of the posse, Red Mills orders Mrs. Morton to prepare him a meal. In pouring the coffee, she manages to slip a rope noose about his head and arms and gains the mastery of the situation for a time. She dispatches Betty to a neighbor, who rides after the Sheriff and his men. They arrive just as Red Mills succeeds in getting loose from his bonds. The desperado is overpowered and frightened into a confession of the robbery. The "boys" lead him away while the Sheriff makes proper apologies to Tom and his wife. After their departure, Tom tenderly embraces his wife and child, saying with a prayer of thankfulness, "That sure was a 'close enough call.'"

A HORSESHOE—FOR LUCK (Sept. 25).—Strolling along a suburban road, Sidney Edwards picks up a horseshoe—for luck. His luck begins immediately but it is hardly good luck. He is run over by an automobile, upsets a baby perambulator and gets into an awful row with the bystanders. At home, he and his wife stand arguing so long, the cooking burns and the cat runs off with the roast chicken. Finding his son starting a sliding pond on the hardwood parlor floor, Edwards leans on the mantlepiece and severely reprimands him. The rug slips from under father's feet and, his weight proving too much for the shelf, its contents, with Edwards, crash to the floor. Later, he angrily throws the iron shoe outdoors, it lands on a policeman's neck, and Edwards comes near being arrested for assaulting an officer. His son quietly borrows the horseshoe and then persuades Edwards, Senior, to attend his school Athletic Contest. Pa gets into more trouble and almost precipitates a riot. Then the star bout is announced, "Young Edwards" against "Toughey James," a youth of about twice Edwards' size. Every one except Pa cheers wildly for "Toughey," the favorite, and the bout is on. Young Edwards is getting very much the worst of it until just before time is called, then he manages to land one stiff jolt on his opponent's jaw. The result is amazing. The big fellow is actually knocked out, even while still on his feet, then flops over on the floor, where he is counted out. In telling his family afterwards of the boy's conquest, Edwards, Senior, becomes suspicious of the shape of one of the gloves, investigates, and from inside the glove pulls out —the horseshoe.

HEARTS AND DIAMONDS (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 26).— By passing himself off as an old "bach," Bunny, a widower, makes a favorable impression on Flora, a wealthy spinster, but she is still coy. Discovering Flora is an enthusiastic baseball fan, Bunny gets up a baseball nine and challenges the Cornfeds, taking care, however, to first "frame up" the game with "Misty" Catheson, the pitcher, and his teammates. Bunny's daughters, Alice and Edna, learn of the scheme and tell their respective suitors, both of whom Bunny dislikes. By threats of exposure the boys compel Bunny to give them positions on his team, and accept them as favorable suitors for his daughters. The day of the big game Flora roots valiantly for Bunny and his team. With the score 1 to 0 in favor of the Cornfeds, "Toper" Staggs works "Misty" for a base on balls, and Bunny drives out a homer, bringing in two runs and winning the game. Bunny goes to Flora's box and just then Alice and Edna rush up saying, "Father, you are a wonder!" Flora is surprised and angry on learning Bunny is a widower and refuses to speak to him. Meanwhile, Alice and Edna and boys execute a "double steal" to the minister's, where they are married. Bunny later on has the good fortune to rescue Flora from an escaped lunatic and then to his ardent proposal of marriage Flora softly whispers, "Yes." His daughters and their husbands return, resulting in a gladsome reunion all around.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE HASTY ELOPEMENT (ninth story of "Octavius—Amateur Detective")—(Sept. 12).—When Octavius read in the newspaper that auto-thieves had been making havoc in the vicinity of the Rosedale Country Club, his soul was stirred to extraordinary effort He had just bought a car himself, and naturally felt a keen interest in anything affecting even remotely his new and cherished possession. Then again, there was, of course, his Duty to the Public. In his capacity as an amateur detective Octavius was above all else a relentless bloodhound in the public interest.

So he took his machine and went out to Rosedale. Adventure met him on the way, for at the railway station a pretty girl begged him for a ride, and Octavius gladly complied with her request. After a short ride, the girl, apparently by accident, dropped her parasol from the automobile. Octavius gallantly stopped the machine, and ran back to get it. A moment later, the astonished Octavius was standing with the parasol in his hands watching his car speeding down the road under the guidance of the perfidious female.

As there was not a moment to be lost, Octavius cranked up a car which was standing idle nearby and started in pursuit. After a long chase, the girl stopped Octavius' car in front of a house and darted in. Octavius followed. When he got inside he discovered that the house was a rectory. When Octavius arrived, the girl had just been married to the man she loved. Immediately afterward the infuriated parents reached the house. While Octavius was attempting to make the radiant young bride understand that she was a thief, a motorcycle policeman arrived and arrested him for speeding. When things were finally straightened out, the chastened Octavius started back for town, anxiously wondering if he would be met by the owner of the car he commandeered with a warrant for his arrest.

Instead, he discovered that the car belonged to the auto-thieves who had terrorized the locality, and by one of his absurd pieces of luck was able to turn the criminals over to the police.

THE BLUE COYOTE CRERRY CROP (Sept. 22).—When old man Baker died, leaving his daughter, Cherry, in an eastern boarding school, the boys about Copperas City promised to look out for the girl. Because they knew that Dave Baker's girl would not permit herself to be supported by charity, they accordingly informed her that her father's death had left her in the possession of a certain amount of stock in the Blue Coyote Mine, the dividends of which would be sent to her in the regular order of affairs. Then a collection was taken up under the auspices of Jack Somers, and the resulting sum was sent to Cherry Baker in the guise of a dividend. This was all very well at the time, because it had been a prosperous year, and the miners were in a "flush" condition, but a year or so later affairs were not in such good condition. When he attempted to raise the money for the "dividend," Jack discovered that the boys were utterly unable to raise anywhere near the customary amount. So, after he had stripped himself of a considerable portion of his possessions, Jack was obliged to write and tell Cherry that the Blue Coyote had been obliged to reduce its dividend. At the same time she received Jack's letter. Cherry was very much attached to a young man named Choate. When she told Choate about the Blue Coyote that estimable young man became immediately suspicious, and suggested that they go West and investigate matters. When they arrived in the West, Choate's deepest suspicions seemed realized by the curious fact that Jack Somers seemed to be the only man who knew anything about the Blue Coyote Mine. When Choate discovered that Jack had been selling his own personal property, it seemed to him certain proof that the man was preparing for an immediate getaway. So he ordered his arrest. When Cherry learned exactly how much the miners and Jack, in particular, had done for her, she decided that Jack was nearer her ideal man than Mr. Choate.

POST NO BILLS (Sept. 23).—The love affair of Will Stark, a handsome billposter, and dainty Nellie Primm, the village belle, was considerably involved, owing to Aunt Susan's opposition. She had very decided views upon worldly matters and did all in her power to break up the plans of the young couple. Now, bill posters and paste are, of course, very closely associated, in fact, they form a very necessary combination if bills and other things are expected to remain when they are placed.

Will, and his friend and associate, Bill Spivens, succeeded in mixing a particular brand of paste, the adhesive qualities of which were unrivaled. Once applied it never loosened its grip and strange as it may seem, this very "stick-toittiveness" was largely responsible in bringing to a successful conclusion the plans of the young lovers. Arrangements were made for an elopement while Aunt Susan was in town, and as fate would have it, who should she meet but Bill Spivens in the very act of posting up a glaring poster of a ballet dancer, while the Kodak Fiend proceeded to take a snap-shot of the operation. The old lady was horrified and immediately proceeded to express her self.

They decided to decorate her barn in the most approved bill poster style. In the meantime the elopement plans were progressing, and Stark and his sweetheart succeeded in leaving the house while Aunt Susan was busy in the barn. Hearing a noise outside she opened the window and looked out. The Kodak Fiend was just taking another snap-shot of Spivens and his work, when Aunt Susan's head appeared at the window so placed that it completed the poster. The newly wedded pair returned from the town and were met with a pretty hot reception until the Kodak Fiend appeared on the scene and threatened to give his snapshot to the papers unless Aunt Susan pardoned the young couple. After considerable urging she consented.

count of Will Green, the choir leader's marked favoritism for Eldora Perkins. When the Rubeville Sentinel publishes a glowing tribute to the young soloist, Eldora immediately proceeds to spread the news by mailing copies of the paper to her relatives and friends.

A copy reaches her Aunt Martha's boarding house in Boston. Alphonse, one of Aunt Martha's boarders, reads it, sees possibilities of exercising his somewhat doubtful talents as a teacher of music jumps his board bill and sets out for Rubeville. His arrival in the little town causes great excitement among the "talent," and it looks as if Green would lose his artistic hold upon the community.

In order to offset the popularity of the new arrival, Green opens a Singing School, hoping to win back Eldora, who has become interested in Alphonse. A climax is reached when Alphonse announces his intention of giving the opera of "The Bohemian Girl." There is a great scramble for the parts. Through the influence of her rich father, Minetta is awarded a prominent role. Her father proposes a trip to the city in order that a presentation of the opera by professionals may serve to fire the local talent to heights undreamed of. They leave for the city followed by Green, and after viewing the performance return to the village, where rehearsals are undertaken with great enthusiasm.

Green's Singing School fails to attract further interest. Disappointed, he sets out for Boston to seek a new job. Calling on Aunt Martha he discovers the picture of Alphonse in the album. Learning something of that young gentleman's past, he decides to return to Rubeville.

In the meantime the rehearsals are in full blast and further complications are introduced by a second love affair between Alphonse and Minetta, the village heiress. The eventful night arrives and all Rubeville assembles to witness the performance. Jealousy runs rife, stage fright is in considerable evidence, and the climax is reached when Aunt Martha and Green appear on the scene. Alphonse is denounced and leaves town. Green and Eldora become reconciled and harmony once more reigns.

TWINS AND TROUBLE (Sept. 26).—The twins constituted the chief treasure of Betty's and Bob's household. An intense rivalry, however, existed between the grandparents, and a climax was reached when the Major and his wife visited the young couple and found the Colonel and his wife in full possession of the two children. An altercation between the grandparents quickly developed into an open quarrel, ending in an enstrangement between the young couple, and Betty and her parents left the house with one of the twins, while Bob and his parents remained in possession of the other one.

After the first flash of anger, both Bob and Betty regretted their actions, and the quarrel would have been smoothed over had it not been for the two old soldiers, who each declared war and started off with the avowed intention of capturing the other baby. In the meantime, the twins were taken out for an airing by Maggie and Bridget, and extra complications were added when Maggie discovered Bridget and Terry spooning together on a park bench. Comparing notes, the girls discovered that Terry had been making love to both of them. Enraged, they left their charges upon the bench and proceeded to chase the fleeing Terry. The children were found by a passing washerwoman.

The nurse girls returned from their chase and punishment of Terry, only to find their charges gone. Frantic, they ran home with the news.

While all of this was happening, the Colonel and the Major had managed to land themselves in the Police Station and were in the midst of an explanation to the Sergeant when the washerwoman entered with the twins. The humor of the situation striking both of the old soldiers, they started off home, each carrying one of the children. Bob and Betty, reunited by the horror of their supposed loss, were at the latter's home, and great was the rejoicing when the two grandfathers arrived with their charges.

KALEM

THE POTTER AND THE CLAY (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 21).—About to wed a society girl, Bertram Trent attempts to repay through his wealth, the injury he has done Rose Masters. Although she nurses the memory of the wrong she has suffered, Rose accepts the annuity which Trent settles upon her. The woman places her infant daughter Lillian under the kindly care of the Sisters of Mercy.

Mrs. Trent dies shortly after the birth of her daughter, Dorothy. All of the father's great affection is centered upon the child. Dorothy grows up surrounded by every luxury.

Years later, Rose Masters meets Trent's daughter socially. She sets about to punish the father through his child. The woman secures the aid of Gates, a gambler. As the result of their machinations, Dorothy, too young to realize what she is doing, falls victim to the lure of the gaming table.

As a consequence of this plot, Dorothy is arrested in a raid upon a gambling hall. Trent is horror stricken when the morning papers apprise him of what has occurred. While Trent is bitterly upbraiding his daughter, Rose hastens to conduct Lillian to the scene. As the father turns from Dorothy, Rose enters with Lillian, who is the embodiment of innocence. To Rose's amazement, her daughter champions Dorothy. In vain Rose relates the story of the past. Lillian, brought up in an atmosphere apart from the world, firmly declares she will right the wrong done to Dorothy.

THE GREEN ROSE (Sept. 22).—Coveting Kathlyn's fortune, Livingston, her guardian, plans to get her out of the way. The scientist decides to poison her in a manner which would divert suspicion from himself. He doctors a rose with anacide, the deadliest of drugs, causing the flower to turn green.

Attracted by the color of the flower, his housekeeper picks it up. A prick from one of its thorns causes the woman's death. Gordon, the scientist's assistant, and Beatrice, a writer of scientific articles, reach Mrs. Bunt's side just as she dies. Gordon analyzes the green rose and discovers the presence of the deadly drug.

Livingston later doctors a second rose, placing it in Kathlyn's room. Gordon and Beatrice enter the room just as the girl is about to examine the flower. Their suspicions directed towards the scientist, Beatrice and Gordon charge him with attempting to murder Kathlyn. Livingston attacks Gordon and in the fight, the scientist's hand is scratched by one of the poisoned thorns. A minute later he meets the fate he had planned for Kathlyn.

THE VANISHING TRIBE (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 23).—Refused permission to wed Big Moon, a warrior of another tribe, Prairie Flower, daughter of Chief Grey Eagle, elopes with her sweetheart. White Star, who also loves Big Moon, conceives a deadly hatred towards Prairie Flower.

With the birth of Prairie Flower's son, White Star conveys the news to Grey Eagle. She conspires with the chief to kidnap the child. Fearing evil, Big Moon and Prairie Flower beg Deep Thunder, the Medicine Man, for aid. The Medicine Man promises that warriors who approach the child with evil intent shall vanish into the thin air.

Grey Eagle sends some of his braves to steal the child. These men disappear before the eyes of White Star. Later, the woman steals the child and carries it towards Grey Eagle's camp. Big Moon and his squaw pursue White Star and recover the child. Chief Grey Eagle and his people witness the incident and give chase to the pair. They are just about to overtake Prairie Flower and her brave, when the entire tribe suddenly vanishes.

JONES'S WEDDING DAY (Sept. 25).—While speeding to the minister's home on his wedding day, Bill Jones is arrested for breaking the speed laws. Despite his pleas, poor Jones is lugged to the police station where he is held under $20 bail.

Calling up a friend, Jones explains the situation. The friend dispatches one of his employees to the rescue. Meanwhile, Jones discovers an old chum in the turnkey, and is allowed to escape. Another Jones, a hobo, is brought in and placed in the cell Bill has vacated. When the employee of Jones's friend arrives, he bails out the hobo and takes him to the minister's in an auto.

Suzanne and her parents wait impatiently for Bill, who has been rearrested. When the tramp and his guardian enter, the two are almost mobbed by the irate bride and the guests. The hobo flees but is captured and lugged off to jail Meanwhile Suzanne and the guests learn of what has occurred and hasten to the police station. Bill greets his bride with joy and the wedding ceremony, although several hours late, proceeds.

RORY O'MOORE (Sept. 26).—While fleeing from the British soldiers, Rory O'Moore, stops to bid his sweetheart Kathleen, goodby. Black William, an informer, learns of Rory's whereabouts and brings the soldiery to the scene.

Rory flees. Kathleen delays pursuit by engaging the officer in command of the English soldiers in a flirtation. The redcoats later continue their chase. On the verge of being captured, Rory plunges into the water. One of the soldiers follows. The two are some distance from shore when Rory hears the soldier shout for help. Throwing all chances of escape to the wind, the brave patriot goes to the man's rescue.

His noble conduct would win him his freedom but for Black Williams' threat to have the soldiers arrested for treason. Rory is imprisoned and later sentenced to be hung. Father O'Brien, the parish priest, comes to Rory's aid, however, and succeeds in cutting the patriot's bonds just as he mounts the gallows. With a lusty blow Rory fells the hangman and, aided by the peasants, makes his escape. Making his way to the sea, Rory finds a boat in which Kathleen waits for him, ready to take them to America and freedom.

EASY MONEY (Sept. 18).—Having made $2,000 in a lucky speculation, McGuff longs to invest it in an auto. Mrs. McGuff, however, wants a farm and compels her husband to look over a place in the country which is offered for sale. Bill, a tramp, enters the farmhouse when Jones, the owner, goes a visiting. The hobo arrays himself in Jones' clothes and is mistaken for the owner by McGuff. Pleased with the place, McGuff turns his money over to Bill and departs to bring his family to their new home.

McGuff returns to the farm with his family on the following day. Seeing a meal which has been spread for the farmhands, they demolish it. Jones and his men appear on the scene and a rough and tumble battle ensues. Prosperity goes to Bill's head and he invests his money in an auto. It breaks down in front of the farm. Just as the McGuffs are being dragged away by the constables. Bill is captured. Pleading for mercy, he presents the car to his victim. Bill then endeavors to run away, but is captured by the minions of the law and dragged to the calaboose.

THE CUB REPORTER'S ASSIGNMENT (Sept. 19).—Wilson, a reporter, goes to Montville to interview Joshia Milton, an old inventor, who has perfected an appliance which, it is reported, will revolutionize the automobile business. Wilson is mistaken for another "Wilson," who is expected by the inventor. He becomes the old man's guest. The reporter and Ivy, Milton's daughter, fall in love. Meyers, the inventor's secretary, also loves the girl and conspires to win her. Later, the man steals his employer's precious plans and sends them to a rival automobile concern.

Wilson discovers Meyers' plot. Giving chase, he overtakes the messenger and recovers the plans. At the same time Milton discovers his loss. Meyers denounces Wilson as the thief. The reporter enters the house and reveals the secretary's villany. While Meyers is dragged away under arrest, Milton, filled with gratitude, consents to the reporter's marriage to Ivy.

SELIG

THE LIVID FLAME (Special—Two Parts—Drama—Sept. 21).—Burkhart, a prominent business man, owner of a leading mercantile establishment, and the popular candidate for governor on the Citizens' ticket, becomes impressed with the ability of James McNair, a young attorney, and engages him to look after his legal business. He has a comfortable income from his law practice, and has a charming wife and little baby whom he loves devotedly. But the brilliant young lawyer has a weakness which he has successfully hidden from his wife and from his intimate associates. He has not taken a drink of liquor for several years because he realizes that if he once takes the first glass, he will become again a victim to its thraldom. One day while in company with Burkhart, they enter a cafe and Burkhart insists that McNair shall take a drink with the party. McNair declines and takes a cigar instead. However, Burkhart rallies him and jokes him until finally the young man tosses down a glassful of raw whisky, and immediately the inclination for the stimulant returns. He staggers home intoxicated, to the great alarm and consternation of his wife, who never before has seen him in that condition.

Day after day the same thing is repeated. Burkhart endeavors to argue with McNair and dissuade him from the indulgence that is making him day by day more unfit for the transaction of business. Even the business of Burkhart is being neglected by the young attorney, until through his carelessness and disregard for legal procedure, he permits the filing of a suit against Burkhart by the Trust to go unchallenged and undefended. In his endeavors to rally young McNair from his downward path, Burkhart, who has taken him home in a drunken condition to his wife, argues with him and tries to influence him to again become a man and stop drinking. Then McNair, realizing what it means to himself and to his wife, vehemently charges Burkhart with having started him on the downward path.

Burkhart cannot fail to admit that the accusation is true. He writes a letter to the Citizens' Committee to the effect that he cannot be a candidate for governor, and states that he is about to go away for reasons best known to himself.

Burkhart has not realized everything that this might mean to him and to his business. He realizes that he must pay a price for his fault, yet, nevertheless, he is determined to try and save young McNair from his folly. He takes the young man into the wilderness, where he induces the young man to forget whisky. McNair is frantic for liquor. Burkhart argues with him and even uses force to keep McNair from the bottle. In his own chamber Burkhart has a well-stocked cellarette containing various liquors. Young McNair has noted the cellarette which Burkhart has locked and carries the key in his pocket. One day, seeing the old colored servant drinking from a bottle, McNair snatches it from him and drains it.

He has alternate fits of depression and a resolve to overcome his weakness. He does not sleep at night and in the daytime he wanders about the woods, a nervous wreck. One night he has a frightful dream. In a vision he sees himself enter the chamber of Burkhart, thirsting for alcohol, and with an axe, breaking open the cellarette. Then in the vision Burkhart enters and catches him in the act of draining a whisky bottle. There is a struggle—a fight—and McNair sees himself raise the axe over the head of his devoted friend and knocking him to the floor. Then he sees himself, horror stricken and remorseful, dash out of the bungalow and pull a revolver from his pocket, placing it to his own temple and pulling the trigger. He next sees the old negro servitor, awe stricken and frightened at the sight of the wounded man lying near the door, pick him up and carry him into the house. Then he sees the old negro lay him tenderly on the bed, when the vision changes into wakefulness and he is aroused by the touch of his friend, Burkhart, who shakes him by the shoulder. Then he realizes that it was all a dream. He springs to his feet and embraces his friend.

He reads a letter from his wife, telling him of the ruin which has befallen Burkhart owing to his absence from business and his defeat as governor. He is a man again. He will not succumb to liquor in the future. He pledges himself to leave whisky alone. Burkhart takes him home to his wife and baby. He has paid the price of his error and his conscience tells him he has done well.

FOR LOVE OF HIM (Sept. 22).—Homer Davenport and Katherine Mosby, leading members of the Lyceum Stock Co., are great friends. Katherine is in love with Homer who, however, admires her only as a friend. A new actress, May Taylor, is engaged and Homer and she fall in love. Katherine is jealous and she bitterly opposes her rival, May, who scores a great triumph in a new play. Katherine overhears Homer asking May to marry him, and she determines upon revenge. She secretes a quantity of acid in the cold cream jar of May, expecting in this way to destroy her beauty.

May returns to her dressing room and accidentally burns her arm against a hot curling iron and knocks to the floor the jar of cold cream containing the acid. May screams with pain and says she has been badly burned. Katherine hears her scream and, believing that May has been burned by the acid, has a revulsion of feeling and rushes into May's dressing room to help her. Katherine resigns from the company, thankful that her plot to disfigure her rival failed.

A JUST PUNISHMENT (Sept. 23).—Uncle Preston, a financial "wizard," discovers that his nephew, Bob Preston, is a rogue, a gambler and a swindler, who is promoting a mythical mining property, the "Battle Axe." He decides to teach his nephew a lesson. He buys up the fake mining shares and visits Bob and his wife and their little daughter, Adele, who longs for love and attention. The Uncle and Adele become great pals. He decides to abduct the child and take her home. They are warned of a break in the gas main. Bob's wife determines to kill the old man with gas. She turns on the gas faucets and then awaits results. Bob also determines on revenge and plans to murder the Uncle. He comes home drunk and falls asleep in Uncle's room. Old man Preston and Adele escape, but Bob nearly dies from the gas. The Uncle disinherits the guilty pair.

YOU NEVER CAN TELL (Sept. 25).—Sid Smith, a grocer's clerk, wants to become a moving picture actor. His clumsiness makes everybody laugh except the boss, who fires him, when he breaks a lot of cold storage eggs. He applies for a job as a moving picture actor and is so clumsy that he makes a big hit, and becomes a star comedian.

WHO GOT STUNG (Sept. 25).—Harry tries to get even with his friends, Jack and Charlie, for a joke they played on him by advertising for a lot of scrubwomen. They turn the joke by directing the applicants to Harry's office, but Jimmy, Harry's office boy, turns the joke back by causing the scrubwomen to attack Jack and Charlie. It is a side-splitting comedy.

THE NEWSBOY TENOR (Sept. 26).—Dora, a widow, is supporting herself and her six-year-old son, Jimmy, by working as Ware's secretary. Ware falls in love with her and they arrange to marry. Dora believes Ware to dislike children, and desiring to keep him in ignorance of Jimmy, places him to board with Mrs. Gray. While on their honeymoon, a fire occurs in the tenement where Mrs. Gray lives, and Jimmy is taken charge of by Mrs. Dick, a shrewish woman, who ill treats him. Mrs. Dick sends Jimmy on the street to sell newspapers, and he helps business by singing in a marvelously sweet voice. When Dora and her husband return from their honeymoon, she cannot find Jimmy, and engages a detective to search for him. Overcome by grief, she determines to tell her husband all. In the meantime, Ware, her husband, has heard Jimmy singing on the street corner, and takes him to his office. Dora finds husband and son there, and they are happily reunited.

THE WISE DETECTIVES (Sept. 22).—The chief of the Riverside police gets notice that a bank robber is likely to come his way. There is $10,000 in it for the man who catches him. Goodman, the bank burglar, strolls into the station and sees the excitement the notice causes, but he is not a bit afraid. As he stays there, Smith, a solid citizen, comes in with a satchel full of money which he asks the chief to keep for him as the bank is closed. The chief gladly consents. Goodman sees his chance to make a haul by playing on the desire of the police to win the reward. He drops a note in front of each policeman making an appointment for that afternoon with a supposed accomplice. Even the desk sergeant decides to try for the prize and the station is deserted. As one after the other the disguised cops are being "captured" by those already there, the crook calmly walks into the station house, cracks the cafe in broad daylight and wanders down the street with the money. All would have gone well had not Mrs. Smith recognized the satchel as her husband's and made the arrest single handed. She takes her prisoner down to the station with the police following and finds that she is entitled to the reward. The police get arguing over the matter and forget the prisoner. He is just making his escape when Mrs. Smith reappears, and this time he is made safe.

A SIX FOOT ROMANCE (Sept. 22).—Jack Brant proposes to Nell Denton at a dinner dance. Nell loves Jack, but she is ambitious and wants to marry Count Cassiner. At the table the two rivals get places beside Nell. The Count's pumps are tight and they hurt his feet so that he cannot smile upon his lady love. He slips them off. Nell's slippers are none too comfortable and she, too, slips them off. By accident these are kicked where Jack gets them. He senses the situation and kicks the slippers under his own chair.

At the end of the dinner Nell fishes for her slippers and is horrified when her feet slips into the Count's pumps. The Count, reaching for his pumps, accidentally presses Nell's foot. She thinks he did it on purpose and turns to Jack. Jack whispers that he will give Nell her slippers if she will take his engagement ring along with it. She tells him he is a brute, so Jack talks to the lady on his other side and Nell has to kick him under the table in sign of capitulation. She takes the ring and gets her slippers back. The Count, discovering his loss, frowns upon fate and tears passions to tatters in his frantic gesticulations.

TOYS OF FATE (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 23).—Angelo Latini, his wife, Teresa, and their little daughter, Rosa, Italian immigrants, arrive in California. Leaving the train in a large city, the little family is attracted by a wireworker, and Angelo buys for Rosa a brooch which spells the name "Rosa." Then Angelo sights an Italian fruit stand across the street. Rosa is tired. Teresa sits on the old-fashioned gripsack and holds the child in her arms while Angelo goes to buy some fruit.

Albert Hayes, a labor employment agent, has an order to provide strikebreakers for a large foundry. Unable to get sufficient volunteers, Hayes resorts to the shanghai method. Angelo is enticed into the agency by Hayes and when the Italian protests he is knocked down and out, taken to the foundry and compelled to work by armed guards. Teresa, alarmed at Angelo's absence, finally tries to find him. The Italian woman, however, cannot speak English and the police only order her to move on.

After three days and nights of wandering without shelter, Teresa dies of starvation in one of the parks. Rosa, unable to awaken her mother, wanders away, crying. Mrs. Hayes, a gentle, childless woman, meets Rosa in the park and the child leads her to the dead Teresa. The motherless little Italian girl, whose only name is Rosa, is adopted by the Hayes and taken East. Later Angelo escapes from the foundry yard. He can find no trace of his wife and baby. He swears vengeance against Hayes, the man who shanghaied him.

Fifteen years later Hayes returns to California, having been awarded a big construction contract at Deep Gulch. Roland Sands, the superintendent in charge of the work, and Rosa (now Rose Hayes), a pretty girl of twenty-one, are sweethearts. Angelo, in his wanderings, comes to Deep Gulch and is given a laborer's job. Hayes, Mrs. Hayes and Rose visit the work and take possession of Sands' shack on the side of a deep canyon. There is trouble with the laborers. Angelo recognizes Hayes as the latter uses his old bullying tactics on the men. Angelo, his old hatred fanned into a flame, urges the laborers to drag Hayes shack down into the canyon. The sight of the "Rosa" brooch given to Sands by Rose as a keepsake, makes Angelo realize that Rose is his daughter. The Italian, by a superhuman effort, saves Hayes, Mrs. Hayes and Rose, but goes down to his own death in the falling shack.

THE TRIUMPH OF RIGHT (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 24).—John Prescott by speculations with Stephen Jepson of the Bank of Omaha, has brought the bank on the verge of bankruptcy. Ed Harrison, secretary to Prescott and engaged to his daughter, discovers the discrepancies and calls attentions to them. Harrison and Natalie get married when it is discovered that he is deeply in debt on account of gambling. The bank examiners are about to visit the bank, and Jepson takes the money left in the bank, goes West and starts a department store. Prescott goes home and is met by his daughter and son-in-law, who ask him to pay the gambler's debts. A quarrel ensues and the struggle is interrupted by Natalie who separates them and takes Ed to his room.

After Prescott has retired Natalie asks for a book, and Ed goes to the library for it. At the same time a burglar is seen entering Prescott's bedroom. Ed, in the library, is startled by a shot and getting to Prescott's room, finds the banker dead on the floor, but does not see the burglar escaping. Natalie enters as Ed is kneeling on the floor with the pistol in his hand, and remembering the recent quarrel between him and her father, believes that he committed the murder. Ed is accused of the crime, tried and is sentenced for life. On the way to prison he escapes, jumps from a trestle into a river, and is reported dead.

Three years elapse. Ed secures a position as bookkeeper in Jepson's store, and Natalie, wishing to clear his name and that of her father, seeks employment as a detective. Her application is considered favorable. Jepson, discovering that his store is bankrupt, resolves to go to Omaha, secure more insurance, and sets fire to it. At the same time the insurance company reports to the detective department that there have been several incendiary fires which they desire to trace and request the sending of some detective, a woman preferred. The detail is given to Natalie, and she is sent for a conference with the insurance company. While there Jepson makes application for another policy, and advised by Natalie, who recognizes him, he receives it and hurries back, followed by Natalie. On the day of her arrival the store is fired, and Ed, whose existence she has not heard of for three years, is asphyxiated, but rescued by firemen. Natalie takes her husband to a hospital, secures the services of an officer and sets out to arrest Jepson. They enter his house on the pretense of being insurance adjusters, but an inadvertent question from Natalie warns him of danger and he rushes out of the house locking the door behind him. Natalie and the officer jump from a window in pursuit, and finally come upon him in their automobile, only to find that Jepson's car has overturned and killed him. Before passing away he confesses his guilt to Natalie, who telegraphs her success to the chief. Returning to the hospital she finds her husband out of danger, and while telling him of her adventures a message comes from an adjoining room asking for an interview with Natalie. Going to the room, she finds a dying stranger, who confesses to the murder of her father and thereby clears her husband's name.

THE INVESTMENT (Sept. 25).—Old Grandpa Papkin and Auntie Purvis are in love with each other, and Papkin courts auntie as assiduously as if he were in the heydey of his youth. Jim, Papkin's son, and Martha, Jim's wife, are dead set against such foolishness, as is Annabelle, Auntie Purvis' daughter. The courting goes on despite the lectures and jeering of the younger people, and the old folks at last decide to elope. Upon figuring their finances they find that the $1,000 that Papkin has saved up would be soon dissipated, for they would have to live alone and not with any of the children.

Papkin is deeply discouraged. James Wharton, a slick salesman, selling stock in an auto concern, interests Grandpa Papkin, and when he hears his story agrees to take his thousand and invest it for him so that it will bring him in dividends of $500 a pear. Papkin is overjoyed and so is Auntie Purvis. They have complete faith in Wharton. Later the younger folks find out about it and Jim sees his chances of buying additional land with his father's savings gone for good. They jeer at Papkin's scheme, and both old folks strive to keep up their faith in the face of the hardest kind of opposition.

On the day the dividends are due Papkin hangs about the postoffice all day. The first and second mails arrive with no letter for Papkin. It is late when he goes back home and on the way he sees Auntie Purvis waiting at their old trysting place, all expectancy. He can't face her and goes home. He tries to steal up to his room without being seen, but Jim and Martha catch him and sneeringly ask to see his dividends. He tries to bluff it out, but his own courage and faith have been wrecked. He goes to his bedroom and breaks down. Later, a boy with a special delivery letter comes and it bears a check for $500 and a letter telling him that the sender will see that the dividends are sent regularly each year, and that he is trying to believe that he is doing it for his own grandfather. Papkin is well nigh insane with joy, and Jim and Martha are simply flabbergasted. Papkin goes to the meeting place, where he finds Auntie Purvis alone and weeping. He takes her in his arms and shows her the letter and the check, and then the wedding ring which has lain tucked away in his pocket for so long.

BETWEEN ONE AND TWO (Sept. 26).—Bill Brown and Jim Jordan are roommates. Bill is a sleepy head and Jim a night owl. Jim goes off to a poker game and forgets his keys. Bill goes to bed. Around one o'clock Jim comes home and wakes Bill, who wraps the keys in the table covers and tosses them out of the window; but he has to go downstairs in his night shirt to let Jim in because the latter insists that someone has stolen the keyhole.

Bill goes to recover the table cover and Jim closes the door and goes to bed. He sleeps so soundly that Bill cannot waken him. An actor is leaving the house by the rope route and Bill tries to climb up the rope, but he falls. The policeman on the beat happens along and clubs him before Bill can explain. They find an open window and the policeman wants to boost him in through, but Bill objects, because it is the old maid's room. The policeman declares the old maid is asleep and that Bill can sneak through on tiptoe. It might have worked, but Bill knocks over a table. The crash rouses the old maid and she rouses the house. Bill tries to explain that the policeman pushed him in, but the policeman has fled and that alibi doesn't work. Bill has to give the elderly woman an engagement ring and he goes upstairs to take it out on Jim.

DID HE SAVE HER? (Sept. 26).—Auntie objects to Louie's attentions to Helen and she forbids them meeting, but the sweethearts meet on the sly. Auntie accidentally hears of this and to prevent it she takes Helen to the seashore. Helen, through the maid, gets word to Louie and tells him to come down to the shore, and think up some good scheme to get into auntie's good graces. Louie arrives at the shore the following day and sees Helen sitting on the beach with auntie at her side asleep. He signals Helen and she sneaks away. Louie trys to get her to elope but she is afraid, so he figures out a plan to win auntie's favor. Stealing two buckets Louie runs into the water, gets his clothes wet, fills the buckets and then he and Helen run back and drench auntie. Louie then picks auntie up in his arms, lays her down as if he had just carried her out of the surf and they both start pumping her arms up and down. When auntie is able to realize where she is, she is made to believe that when she fell asleep the tide carried her out and just as she was going down for the third time Louie, at the risk of his life, swam out and saved her. This, of course, puts Louie in strong.

ELSIE'S UNCLE (Two Parts—September 25.—In a girls' seminary, Elsie Gladdon, a regular hoyden, and in love with Jack, a student in the university across the street, finds the life frightfully irksome, and the seminary matron decides that the girl is well nigh incorrigible. Elsie plans one of her escapades in the shape of a midnight taffy feast in her room, and invites Jack to crawl up to the window on the second floor so she could give him some of the candy. Alas! Bob, the bitter rival, learns of the affair and plans revenge. Accordingly when Jack is up the ladder, Bob yanks the ladder from under him. Jack scrambles into Elsie's room, narrowly escaping a fall. The falling ladder crashes into a window on the ground floor, frightening the poor matron to death.

To complete his revenge Bob tells the police that there is a burglar in the girls' seminary and the minion of the law goes there in all haste. After a short search Jack is discovered and dragged out of the wardrobe in Elsie's room, his feet tightly adhered to a pan of taffy. The matron expels Elsie, and writes for her Uncle Barney to come and take her home. Uncle Barney, who has threatened Elsie with a future in a convent if she does not finish Miss Clanger's school successfully, starts for the seminary. Elsie is terror struck. She sees before her visions of a secluded life in a convent, far away from her lover, Jack. So she writes Jack and tells him to get someone who resembles Uncle Barney to come to the school and take her away. She also sends him a photograph of her uncle.

Jack decides to fix himself up to resemble Uncle Barney. So does the rival, Bob, who learns of the scheme and decides to get there first. The rival's plan works successfully for he arrives at the seminary first and whisks Elsie away, but Jack discovers this, starts in pursuit and manages to communicate with her. Meanwhile Uncle Barney arrives and learns that an impostor has taken Elsie away. The police are at once notified and start in search of the culprit. Hurrying to the police station, Uncle Barney encounters the two rivals fighting, who run at his approach. Uncle Barney leads Elsie away in rightful indignation, but the blundering police, relying in their information, believe him to be the offender and carry him off to the station house.

Jack follows them, remaining on the outside, and talking to Elsie through the open window. Then Jack flounces in, declares himself the real uncle and carries Elsie away. Uncle Barney storms up and down, threatening the law with all sorts of vengence. Then the rival, Bob, is arrested and taken to the station where the surprised justice declares that the woods are full of uncles. Uncle Barney jerks the false whiskers and moustache from the rival's face and proves that his own are real. Securing his release he hurries to the railroad station just in time to see Jack and Elsie on the rear platform of a fast departing train.

HELPING MOTHER—(Three Parts—Sept. 10)—When the story opens, Agnes, with her husband and little son, is living with her mother. Poverty has overtaken the family, and when Agnes is offered her old position as maid to Beatrice Merrill she decides to accept. This she does in spite of her husband's objections. As Beatrice's maid, Agnes observes an opportunity for securing the position of chauffeur in the family for her husband. The matter is suggested to Beatrice and she intercedes successfully with her father. The husband first attends a chauffeur's school; and later we find him as the driver of the rich girl's car.

Beatrice's father is a wealthy banker. He has a young secretary, to whom he has become much attached. During the preceding action, he has quietly urged his daughter to encourage his secretary's advances. However, the girl fails to see anything romantic in the secretary and so refuses. On the other hand, she becomes interested in her maid's husband, the chauffeur, and he, an impressionable chap, readily responds to her encouragement. It is but a short time before Agnes finds herself deserted. Enthralled with the passion of romance her husband and mistress have eloped together.

Agnes returns home, crushed, to support herself and boy as best she can. The father of Beatrice soon dies through sorrow at his daughter's action, and he leaves his entire wealth to his secretary. This secretary possesses real manhood; as a lookeron, he has seen the whole tragedy as it progressed, and in his heart he has experienced sympathy and deep friendship for the little maid. He tries to help her financially, but is repulsed. On the street he discovers the son with his toy automobile posted out for rent—an action suggested by his elders as a means to help his mother. The secretary hires the boy's machine for five dollars a day, keeping his identity secret. This money is carried to the mother and she is puzzled.

At this time fate—or call it what you may—plays her hand. Beatrice and the chauffeur with whom she eloped are caught in an automobile explosion. The chauffeur, Agnes's husband, is killed and Beatrice is mortally wounded. An account of the accident finds its way into the press. Beatrice, in the hospital, dying, is visited by the secretary. She asks to see Agnes, that she may beg forgiveness. Agnes responds to the secretary's urgings and goes to Beatrice; and as the unfortunate girl dies, she is forgiven by the woman she has so unjustly and, perhaps, unwittingly wronged.

From here on we are carried into the romance which springs up between the secretary and the maid, Agnes. It is the little son, who suggests to the secretary that he marry his mama, so that she could accept money from him. But the suggestion was only an echo of the man's own feelings. As the picture fades out the one-time maid submits herself to the arms of the man with genuine, living romance promised her in the days that are to follow.

LITTLE SISTER (Sept. 24).—The brother, a ne'er-do-well, is strongly influenced by the crook, who in turn has designs on Little Sister who works in a factory. The detective is typical of the best blood of our police departments, ambitious, courageous and "on the level." In hopes of getting Little Sister in his power, the crook inveigles the brother to join his gang in a robbery, he planning to "double cross" the brother, bring about his arrest and thus secure Little Sister. All works out as the crook plans, until the brother happens to look through a window and sees the crook signal to the police whom he has informed of the burglary. The crook hastens to the tenement home of Little Sister, followed by the brother, with the police in close pursuit. After a brief struggle the brother forces the crook to exchange clothes, hoping thus to turn the pursuers from himself. As the police break into the house, the crook escapes through a window onto a fire escape and is shot by the brother. Unable to fasten the crime on the latter without implicating themselves, the police are forced to depart. Little Sister and the detective are united and the brother mends his ways.

BISON.

OUR ENEMY'S SPY (Three Parts—Sept. 12).—Captains Bainbridge and Clifford are pals in the same regiment, stationed at Honolulu. Boyhood chums, they joined the army together and attained an equal rank. Both love the same girl, Marie Wilson, daughter of their colonel. The three young people lived in the same town and grew up together. The two men agreed long before, that neither should make love to the girl. Bainbridge suggests a plan that each shall take her flowers and the one whose bouquet she first accepts shall have the right to woo her. Marie takes Clifford's flowers first, and later accepts his overtures of love. The seed of jealousy and hate is thus sown in Bainbridge's heart, later to grow into a deadly parasite.

Later, the two officers are delegated to carry a confidential letter to Colonel Brown at the Presidio, San Francisco. Marie and her mother decide to avail themselves of the officers' escort to visit friends in the states. Santos, a spy, interested always in the movements of the U. S. army, observes the two officers embarking for San Francisco and realizes that they must carry important papers. He follows them.

The next day a rough sea washes Bainbridge back from the bow, injuring his knee. Santos rescues him and the resultant gratitude opens up the way for the spy to meet the party. Santos recognizes the inherent weakness of Bainbridge and plies him with liquor. The officer soon tells of his love for Marie, and of the mission that carries him and Clifford to California. Santos plays on the drunken man's mind and agrees to get rid of Clifford. The spy intends at the same time to secure the papers. Santos attacks Clifford, and, with Bainbridge's reluctant help, throws the officer overboard. While Santos is searching the stateroom, a trick of fate makes the steamer strike a derelict. Several passengers, panic-stricken, jump overboard. Life buoys are thrown to them and a boat is lowered.

One of the buoys drifts near the weakening Clifford. He puts it on and drifts for another day. He is rescued, unconscious and half dead, by a pleasure yacht bound for San Francisco. Clifford's absence is discovered aboard the steamer. They believe he was lost in the panic. Santos learns that Marie is carrying the confidential letter, and determines to search her cabin. He secures the papers, but as he is leaving through the window, Marie fires and kills him.

Arrived in San Francisco, Marie and Bainbridge deliver the letters to Colonel Brown. Thinking to divert Marie's mind from the tragedy of Clifford's disappearance, Bainbridge orders their machine to pass the fair grounds. Clifford has arrived in the city and starts for the Presidio. He sees Bainbridge and Marie and follows them. Seeing that he cannot escape in the machine, Bainbridge jumps out and tries to hide. He is driven to the platform over the rocks at the Cliff House. Seeing there is no escape and preferring death to arrest, the wretched man leaps over the cliff, down a hundred and fifty feet to the rocks and waves and death below.

"UNIVERSAL BOY" AS THE NEWSBOY'S FRIEND (Sept. 24).—Matty is led to the Newsboy's Home Club by a little "newsie" whom he has just treated to some ice-cream. Pitying the poor little boys who have so few pleasures in life, Matty asks the superintendent of the Home if he would consent to his asking some "newsies" to Coney Island. He promises to gather together, by means of contributions, enough money to defray the expenses of the trip. The superintendent, touched by the boy's goodness of heart, agrees to the plan, and Matty, thanking him, goes forth on his mission of collecting contributions.

The first contributor to the fund is the world-famous philanthropist and friend of the poor, Nathan Strauss, whom Matty met at his home in Mamaroneck, N. Y. Next to add to the fund is Hy. Mayer, the famous cartoonist and Editor-in-Chief of Puck.

Last, but not least, he received a helping hand from the wellknown comedian De Wolf Hopper. Well pleased with the results of his mission he returns to the Newsboy's Home Club to arrange for the outing. At last the day arrives and Matty takes fifty newsboys to the Island in a sight-seeing bus. There they take in everything. He even buys them tickets for a dip in the ocean as a suitable finish to a very pleasant day. Back home once more the grateful "newsies" gather around their little benefactor and loudly sing "He's a Jolly Good Fellow."

UNVERSAL IKE.

THE DEAR HUNT (Sept. 22).—The deer season opens in Deerfoot, Colorado, on the fifteenth of August, and the run promises to be heavy. Lord Charles Raleigh, an English tenderfoot, comes Westward to bag, if possible, some of the game. He arrives in Deerfoot and is directed to Mrs. Thatcher's house for board. On the way he passes Louise, the daughter of the landlady, and there is a mutual attraction. Louise, on returning from town, finds several cowboys who are enjoying their own fun at the expense of the monocle worn by the Englishman.

After getting established in his boarding house, his Lordship produces a very expensive gun and goes out to practice. His aim is anything but exact, and he inadvertently shoots the milk bucket from the hand of Mr. Thatcher, who forthwith causes his Lordship to do a merry tango to the tune of a 44. The cowboys on a lark, dress one of their number in a deer's head and skin, conceal him in the woods. His Lordship comes through, he sees the antlers and fires. His surprise is great when, instead of falling, the deer does a merry little jig. He fires again, and this time the supposedly enraged deer charges his Lordship, driving him to the branches of a tree.

Louise has overheard the plot to play a joke on the Englishman and goes out in search of him; she finds him treed by a fierce deer and taking her own rifle she clips the ear from the supposed deer, who beats a hasty retreat leaving horns and skin behind. Louise rescues his Lordship and decides that he shall not go back gameless. Putting the skin and horns around herself she is carried into camp on the shoulders of the Englishman. As the cowboys rush up to see his trophy, Louise emerges and laughingly tells the cowboys that the tenderfoot has bagged the first "dear."

CRYSTAL.

EAST LYNNE IN BUGVILLE (Sept. 22).—An amateur dramatic company arrive in Bugville. They are to produce "East Lynne." The curtain rises, and then things begin to happen. The audiences, among whom are a number of small boys, enjoy the performance for a time, but soon tire, and decide to have some fun. They take out their putty blowers and hit the actors with the pieces of putty. Next they throw eggs and cabbage. Consternation reigns, and the play ends when in the final scene the scenery falls and the bed breaks.

STERLING.

IN AND OUT (Sept. 21).—Mrs. Murphy, the wife of a butcher, and Mrs. Schultz, the wife of a grocer, gossip across the way. Mrs. Schultz invites Mrs. Murphy over; they get into a friendly conversation which develops into a quarrel. Their husbands have a card game in back of the store. Schultz finds Murphy cheating. This starts a fight, the neighbors getting articles thrown. They send in a riot call to the mounted police. The Schultz's and Murphy's throw eggs and meat back and forth while the police are on a mad chase to reach them. When they arrive, instead of stopping the fight, they find themselves between a storm of eggs and ham and make a heasty retreat, letting the bunch fight it out.

FRONTIER.

CATTLE (Sept. 13).—Fred makes love to Dolly, the daughter of a neighboring ranchman, who resents the young man's attentions. This news Fred imparts to his mother, who, by the way, is a widow. The insult is, of course, resented by her, and as a revenge she plans to win over the old ranchman, a widower, hoping by so doing that the neighborly feud will be ended and that her son will be able to marry Dolly.

The widow, whose scheme has been working successfully, is on her way to town with the widower-ranchman, her lame excuse being that possibly Dolly, for whom the ranchman is looking, has gone into town with Fred, and that they might have gone to the parson's to be married.

Before the widower gets to town he becomes aware that the widow has some very charming ways, and when they get to the parson's, and find that Dolly and Fred have really been married, the widower suggests that the feud might be doubly ended if the heads of the family were to be united. Meanwhile Joe has called the sheriff's attention to the fact that in Fred's herd there is some of his father's cattle, but the widower informs his son that their neighbors aren't such bad cattle after all, and as they have decided to combine interests it really doesn't make much difference who owns the cattle.

THE MAN IN THE ATTIC (Sept. 20).—The ranchman sells his horse to Joe, supposedly a rancher, but in reality a counterfeiter. Joe rides into town and passes off a cosiderable amount of bad money. One of his victims is Fred. Another victim later meets Joe and knocks him from his horse. Joe fires after the man, and the bullet strikes Fred in the hand. Seeing a riderless horse, Fred follows it, as he knows it is the counterfeiter's horse.

It brings him to the cabin where Dolly and her father live. Fred has previously met Dolly, and the two love each other. They hear the father coming and Fred goes up into the attic to hide.

The sheriff and his men have decided to search all suspicious cabins for the counterfeiters. They arrive at the ranchman's cabin, just as the father is examining a counterfeit bill that Fred has been showing to Dolly. Things look bad for the ranchman, particularly when a deputy finds another roll of money, also counterfeit, which Joe had given him for the horse. A drop of blood falls on the sheriff's arm. He orders his men to search the attic above, and Fred is brought down. Fred tells what he knows, and the sheriff sends some of his men to search Joe's cabin. Counterfeiting apparatus is found and confiscated, Joe is taken a prisoner, and Dolly falls a prisoner to Fred.

JOKER.

JANE'S LOVERS (Sept. 23).—Jane is a beautiful country lass and is courted by three young men. Jane, while hanging clothes to dry, is seen by willie, who comes and makes love to her. Jake, on the other side of the street, sees them and thrusts a pitchfork through the fence, hitting Jane. She, thinking 'tis Willie, becomes angry and leaves him, going over to John who consoles her.

Willie sees there is someone on the other side of the street and runs around to start a fight. Jake sees John and Jane and informs Willie, also putting him up to getting revenge, giving him a mallet to hit John with. Willie received the worth of it, and for spite, goes back to Jake and hits him. Willie then hides in a hay pile and is seen by Jake, who goes over and thrusts a pitchfork into Willie's trousers. Willie runs off, but is seen by John and Jane, who grab hold of the fork and are dragged across lots. Finally Jake interferes, so Jane then chases Willie and succeeds in pulling the fork from him, but by so doing falls in the lake. In the meantime, two cops join the fray and a fight ensues. All are thrown into the lake excepting Willie who rescues Jane and wins her favor.

POWER'S.

THE ACTRESS (Sept. 25).—Edna, the actress, goes out in search of actual experience for her next season's play. She is hired by a family under an assumed name as a maid. The young son is very much taken with her, and his aristocratic mother is shocked. The mother incurs gambling debts, and to cover her losses determines to rob her husband. In the night she sneaks into the library and begins to open the safe. Edna hears a noise and gun in hand enters the dark library.

She commands hands up, and is horrified to find the wife. She hears the son's voice and quickly makes up her mind. She hands the gun to the mother, and when they come in she appears as the thief. She is arrested and her trial set for the next day. She appears at the station in her real self and pleads her case. She tells the magistrate that she wished the actual sensation of being arrested for her new play. The mother presses her hand and the son seems very cheerful.

GOLD SEAL.

THE TREY O' HEARTS (Two Parts—Sept. 22).—When Alan Law rescues Judith Trine, believing her to be her sister Rose, from the New York home of Seneca Trine, they proceed at once by motorcar to Jersey City, where arrangements are made for the marriage of Rose and Alan. Marrophat, Trine's lieutenant, discovers their escape, learns that it is Judith, and not Rose, who has fled with Alan, and with wild jealousy pursues, his car overtaking theirs in a slum on the Jersey side.

Judith still pretending to be Rose begs Alan not to let Marrophat speak to her, and when Marrophat makes a leap from his car to Alan's the latter throws him violently to the street. This incident occurs directly in front of the ramshackle tenement occupied by Red November and his gang of gunmen, some of which rush out, pick up Marrophat and convey him to the room where November lies dying, in consequence of his injuries sustained in attempting to assassinate Alan in a previous episode of this series.

Marrophat promises, in Trine's name, to avenge the death of November, and sends several members of the gang to try for confirmation of this promise. He then renews the pursuit of Alan and Judith, again overtaking them and stopping their car by shooting a bullet through the gasoline tank which ignites the gasoline and blows up the car, but Alan and Judith continue without injury by taxicab to the house of the minister who is to perform the wedding.

Here, as Alan is about to be married to Judith, who is still impersonating Rose, Marrophat bursts into the room exposing the impersonation. Judith turns in fury on Marrophat and runs from the house, getting away in the taxicab. Marrophat pursuing. Alan proceeds to look for Rose. On his way back to the ferry to take him to New York, he passes the tenement of the gunmen, just as they arive in a taxicab with Rose, who has been taken prisoner by them, while attempting to escape from the house of her father in New York.

Alan sees Rose hustled into the house, jumps out of his car and goes to her rescue. The gunmen lock Rose in a room at the top of the house, and after a violent fight with Alan, on the staircase, throw him from the house. In the course of this fight a kerosene lamp is kicked over and explodes, setting fire to the tenement. The fire alarm is turned in, but escape from the upper floors is cut off because of the blazing staircase. Rose appears at the topmost window and Alan seeing all other means of rescue has failed hauls himself up to the level of the her window by means of a block and tackle in front of the warehouse across the street. He then swings himself across the window, where Rose is waiting, and so contrives her rescue, bringing her safely to the street.

NESTOR.

THE HALF BREED (Sept. 23).—Moosejaw, a notorious half breed, who has an hatred for the whites, heads a band of renegade Indians in an attempt to steal the horses and cattle from the "Big U Ranch." The two rangers guarding the cattle are killed by the Indians, but before the renegades succeed in driving the cattle from the range, the riderless horse of one of the slain rangers reaches the corral, warning the cowboys that something is wrong and they immediately start for the range. They overtake the Indians and a desperate attack is made upon them. In the encounter Moosejaw is seriously wounded, but he escapes to the woods and is later picked up by Johnson, a neighboring ranchman. Hoping to gain Johnson's sympathy, Moosejaw tells him that he has been attacked by a band of renegade Indians. Believing his story, Johnson takes Moosejaw to his home, and after he has recovered from his injuries hires him to work on his ranch.

Later Moosejaw discovers some whiskey in the cellar of Johnson's house, of which he drinks freely. In an intoxicated condition Moosejaw attacks Mrs. Johnson and is severely beaten by Johnson and driven from his ranch. In spirit of revenge Moosejaw returns to his band of renegades and leads them in an attack upon the ranch during Johnson's absence. They attack the ranch, set fire to Johnson's house, lock his child in the burning house and carry Mrs. Johnson to the woods. Johnson learns of the attack upon his home and, securing the assistance of the cowboys of the "Big U Ranch" starts for his home. On the way they overtake the Indians in the woods, with Mrs. Johnson tied to a tree. Johnson's clever marksmanship enables him to sever the rope binding Mrs. Johnson and she is freed. A battle takes place between the cowboys and the Indians, in which Moosejaw is killed. Mrs. Johnson tells her husband that the baby is in the burning house and a wild ride is undertaken in an endeavor to save the child. Fortunately they reach the house in time to rescue the child.

FRUITS AND FLOWERS (Sept. 22)—Harry and Jack are clerks in the office of a financier who has a pretty daughter. The two boys are always trying to make a hit with the daughter, and great jealousy exists between them. Miss Morgan is about to give a musicale to Prof. Treble and sends invitations to her father's two clerks. The office boy in distributing the mail forgets to give Harry his invitation, so when Jack gets his, he is elated, and twits Harry about it. Jack goes to lunch and in honor of his getting the invitation buys a box of flowers for the evening. In the meantime, the office boy gives Harry his invitation and he goes out to buy a basket of fruit to give his boss's daughter. Jack returns with the flowers and is called to the boss's office when Harry is seized with the idea to substitute some vegetables in place of flowers, so he buys some from a peddler and makes the change. Jack comes back and a fellow clerk tells him, and shows him the basket of fruit that Harry has bought. Jack gets vegetables and fills Harry's fruit basket.

The night of the reception is at hand, and both boys go to it thinking of the fun that each is going to have at the other's expense. Jack presents his flowers to Miss Morgan, and when she sees the vegetables she almost faints. Harry laughs and pushes Jack back and gives his basket of fruit to Miss Morgan, which turns out to be vegetables. Miss Morgan is insulted and goes to tell her parents who are in the next room listening to the professor playing. The boys are now raving and start to throw vegetables at each other. The vegetables are thrown through an arch and hit the folks at the musicale. The butler throws both out after they have broken up the reception.

The next morning the boys arrive at the office and the boss fires them. Harry picks up a paper and starts to laugh, and points to an item in the paper which announces that Miss Morgan is engaged to the professor. They look at each other in disgust as the girl and her fiance drive past.

ECLAIR.

THE AZTEC TREASURE (Two Parts—Sept. 23).—The story deals with the finding of a great amount of gold buried by Montezuma. Miguel Perez, the Governor of the province, oppresses and enslaves the peons of Mescalito so that they face starvation. Dolores, the daughter of the head man, Juan Icaze, arouses the tyrant's admiration and he decides to annex her. Luckily, however, Miguel's passion is turned momentarily by the capture of Dick Henshaw, a Yankee insurrectionist, who has been leading the insurrectos against the despot. His capture naturally places the revolutionists in a precarious position as they are entirely dependent upon their Yankee leader for success. On the morning of the execution, however, Dick escapes the firing squad and flees, seeking refuge with Juan and Dolores. Miguel wrought up by this escape, satisfies his vengeance by exiling the peons to the salt mines of the Villa Nationale for non-payment of taxes. This practically means a living death, but Juan has the secret of the treasure buried centuries ago, to be used only as a last resort to aid the stricken insurrectionists. Juan pays the taxes with a portion of the treasure and Miguel, with the hope of finding the vast millions, captures Juan and tortures him unto death. Realizing that her father is in danger, Dolores with Dick's help starts an uprising. The plans are laid and formulated and the peons overpower the guards to the castle where Miguel is confined. Upon entering, however, they find Miguel has escaped and that Juan had died as a result of the iniquitous governor. The secret has died with him and search as they may Dolores and Dick are unable to find where the treasure is buried.

Peace reigns in Mescalito momentarily and Miguel returns to his palace to assume command again. His hatred of the Yankee insurrectionist leads him on in an endeavor to capture the American. He succeeds in his plot and also captures Dolores. Dick does not fear death, but he is overcome when he finds that Dolores has fallen into the tyrant's hands. Miguel taunts the pair by offering to release Dick if Dolores will submit to his advances, but death is preferable to dishonor and they are led at sun-up to the walls outside the palace, where the firing squad of soldiers reluctantly take aim. On account of their great love for the daughter of their savior the soldiers suddenly mutiny and Miguel narrowly escapes retribution. In his flight he sees the trap door leading to the treasure vault, but in finding the treasure he meets with instantaneous death, as a viper in the vault stings him. Dick, after killing the viper, discovers Miguel's body surrounded by the vast Aztec treasure.

Naturally Dick marries Dolores and he is made Governor General of the Province and devotes the treasure toward the betterment and welfare of the oppressed people.

FATE'S FINGER (Sept. 27).—The doctor's young wife, jealous because her husband's professional duties occupy the major share of his time, seeks revenge in a dangerous flirtation. The affair has advanced to an alarming stage when her old school friend comes from a distant city to visit her. This unfortunate girl has contracted a clandestine marriage with the other man in the case two years before, and has been deserted by him. At the time she is made the wife's confidant she is too overcome by her conflicting emotions to expose the man. Only a few days later a climax is reached. The friend discovers the young wife in the act of leaving the house to join the other man, and the guilty woman does not deny her intention. Her friend begs to be allowed to accompany her to the rendezvous and once there succeeds in unmasking the traitor. The disillusioned wife turns her footsteps toward home.

She had left a written message on the doctor's study table. How its high-flown wording sounded now! How utterly fatal to her future hopes should it reach his hands. Half fainting she regained the house. The study door was closed, and behind it she could hear her husband's steady pacings. Presently he left the room; and, rushing in, the wife found the note gone! In its place, its silent message not to be misunderstood, lay her husband's pistol. Ready to embrace her fate, she took it from its case ad went to her room. There, through the agency of her faithful friend, her life and happiness were handed back to her by her baby's hands, for the child had been Fate's instrument in saving the fatal paper from ever having reached the unsuspecting husband's eyes.

THE MOTHERLESS KIDS (Sept. 8).—Betty Trent arrives to take charge of a newly acquired farm. She reads in a magazine of the profits derived from raising goats, and though the farm is well stocked with other animals and fowls, she decides to raise some goats. Her hired boy, Sammy, tells her a neighbor has a couple of kids she can secure, omitting to mention the fact that they are human, and so Betty at once proceeds to send Sammy for the two kids.

While Sammy is on his errand, Betty and her housekeeper proceed to build a pen for the kids and also prepare a meal of milk and cornmeal mush. Waddell, father of the kids, is called to town for the day on business, and glad of the opportunity to have someone look after them, readily gives them to Sammy, who keeping the joke to himself, has not mentioned that the kids are expected to be goats by Betty.

The kids are brought to Betty and she is greatly disappointed, but seeing the dirty little pair are crying and in need of proper attention, she takes them up and after a day of feasting, she sends them back to Waddell. Visions of what they had at Betty's house cause them to refuse the simple food they have heretofore been accustomed to and they run away to see the kind lady, time after time. But a day comes when they fail to appear and she learns that they are sick. She is invited to nurse them by Waddell and through her attentions and kindliness she is at last asked to shepherd the little flock through life, and she accepts the invitation.

THE ONLY WAY (Sept. 15).—A village belle, June Meadows, is wooed by the town banker and by a young sailor, who, in spite of his poverty, wins the heart of June. The banker learns of her affection for the sailor and retires from the field. The seaman sails with his ship and leaves his sweetheart, with a promise to give up the sea upon his return and that they will be married. Months pass and June learns that the ship went down at sea and all on board were lost. In desperation she goes to the banker, who asked her hand, and confessing pleads with him to save her from disgrace. He still loves her and they are married. The child is born and its father the sailor, supposed to have been buried at sea, arrives to find June the wife of the banker. Jack goes to the banker's home and confronts the banker, whom he is about to strike, when June, hearing them quarrel, rushes in and recognizes her lost lover. She throws herself upon him and in her wild joy shows him the child. The banker, watching them, gently reminds her that she is his wife, not Jack's. He bids Jack call on the morrow by which time he will have thought of what is best to do under the circumstances and when the morrow comes the young couple find themselves alone, as the kind-hearted banker has disappeared and an apparition to June discloses that he is no longer among the living, an evidence of his sacrificing love for her.

AMERICAN.

THE COCOON AND THE BUTTERFLY (Two Parts—Sept. 14).—Two sisters, Clare and Anne Meredith, left destitute by the death of their father, go to the city to seek their livelihood. Clare secures a position in a department store and insists that her younger sister go to school. Here she meets a quiet young man, John Walton, working as a bookkeeper, and they form a strong friendship. Walton is the real owner of the store, although no one knows it.

The manager of the store pays such unpleasant attention to Clare that after a time she is forced to resign. The need of money, however, compels her to reapply for another position, this time disguised as an old maid. In the meantime the little sister, wishing to pay her share of the household expenses, secures a position in the store as a model. The manager, St. Clair, at once pays assiduous attentions, which the young girl in her innocence accepts. In order to prove to her younger sister the falseness of her alleged admirer's character, Clare discards her disguise and pretends to accept his attentions. She succeeds admirably and soon St. Clair forgets the younger sister in pursuit of the older but more attractive one.

John Walton, the young millionaire, has meanwhile been watching Clare's cleverness and has fallen in love with her. At his suggestion, to thoroughly convince her sister Anne as to St. Clair's perfidy, Clare accepts an invitation to dinner with the manager. By prearrangement Walton is on hand and when St. Clair becomes particularly obnoxious, Walton appears on the scene and discloses his real identity. He discharges St. Clair, assumes management of the store, proposes to Clare and sends the little sister back to school.

THE MIRROR (Sept. 16).—A mysterious veiled woman has been burglarizing in fashionable circles and baffles all attempts at detection. A young bachelor and his sister having just returned from abroad, rent a fashionable old home that has been unoccupied for a year. Janet, daughter of the owners of this old house, in response to a letter from her mother, asking her to go to the old home and secure a locket that was overlooked and left in the secret drawer of a dresser, is about to enter the old premises while the young bachelor and his sister are looking over the grounds.

Ben sees Janet and is struck by her beauty so much that upon entering the house he fancies he sees her reflection in every mirror he passes. Ben and his sister take possession of the house at once. Janet returns that same evening, not knowing the new tenants have already taken possession. Ben accidentally passes the room and seeing Janet at the dresser where she is searching for the locket, believes her to be the mysterious veiled woman. That night Ben attends a ball and to his surprise is brought face to face with Janet, whom he has every reason to believe is the much-wanted veiled woman.

Overhearing a detective remark that the veiled woman is present at the ball and would be arrested after the next dance, he hastens to warn Janet and offers to help her escape. Janet is astonished. Explanations are about to follow when the detective pases through the corridor escorting the real veiled woman to the station. Janet then explains her mysterious visit to her old home and, accepting Ben's apology, they proceed to enjoy the dances of the evening together.

THE REDEMPTION OF A PAL (Two Parts—Sept. 21).—Dora, a girl of the underworld, has never known other influence until she meets Lane, a young wealthy banker. Lane has a young sister whom he loves. One night she accompanies friends on a slumming expedition, and, in a spirit of bravado, she takes a few puffs from an opium pipe. She acquires the taste, which later develops into a craving for opium. Lane, one night accompanies a friend to a dance hall. Dora is present with some friends. A bully insults her and Lane knocks him down. Lane and Dora become acquainted. On Lane's refusal to buy some flowers from a poor old woman, Dora, on the impulse of the moment, gets up and dances and hands over the collection she gets to the woman. This generous act awakens in the soul of Lane a desire to uplift the denizens of the underworld. With the assistance of Dora, he starts a club in close proximity to the district and has installed a hospital, reading room, employment bureau, nursery, etc. Under a different environment, Dora realizes the shallow life she has been leading. Thrown in daily contact with Lane, she learns to love him, but one day in calling at his office, she sees Lane kiss his sister and, believing it to be his sweetheart, stiffled the love that had grown up in her heart. By her own changed life and influence she sets a good example for her pal, Andy, who reforms and becomes a man. Later on the sister of Lane again visits the opium den. A fire breaks out in the old shack and the place is soon enveloped in flames. Dora and her pal run to watch the fire. A woman breaks through the flames and informs the crowd that another woman is still in the building. Andy rushes through smoke and fire, picks up the woman and carries her to safety. Dora has her conveyed to her little hospital that Lane founded. The next morning Lane reads of the fire and that the woman rescued was brought to his hospital and decides to visit it. Dora conducts him to the ward and Lane recognizes his sister. Dora leaves the two together and goes to where her pal Andy is. Andy is seated in a chair with his hands in bandages. When Dora comes in Andy greets her with a smile and asks her to become his wife. After a moment of hesitation she consents and when Lane finally enters the room she tells him the tidings. Lane congratulates them both and concealing his disappointment turns once again to the hospital and realizes that in his philanthropy he but cast his bread upon the waters.

HIS FAITH IN HUMANITY (Sept. 23).—Robert Sands, a sociologist, believes that there is good in all men irrespective of the depths to which they have fallen. To test his theory he picks up Jim Marsh, a social outcast, and installs him in his home as a servant. Mrs. Sands, a social butterfly, is skeptical of her husband's theories, and predicts that his experiment will fail. Jim finds and restores to her a piece of lost jewelry, but in spite of this, Mrs. Sands remains skeptical and treats him with continual distrust. In the course of events, Mrs. Sands loses heavily at bridge and gets into debt. Fearing to tell her husband, and dreading exposure, she surreptitiously takes money from his safe and is seen by Jim. When she has gone Jim enters the library and is puzzling over the matter when Sands enters unexpectedly and discovers him under suspicious circumstances.

As Jim leaves the room Sands picks up a slip of paper from the floor bearing the safe combination. His wife, in her haste, had dropped it. Suspecting Jim, Sands opens the safe and discovers the money gone. Sick at heart, he goes to his wife and admits that his experiment has failed. By a supreme effort, Mrs. Sands conceals her guilt and is silent. Summoning Jim, Sands sadly charges him with the theft and tells him to leave the house. To shield the woman, Jim assumes the blame, but betrays the fact to Mrs. Sands that he knows of her guilt. When he is gone Mrs. Sands hastens guiltily to settle the card debt. Conscious-stricken and miserable, she is about to ring for admittance to the home of her friend when the door suddenly opens—and Jim steps out. Shocked and amazed by his unexpected appearance, Mrs. Sands gets control of herself and coldly demands to know what he is doing there. Jim's explanation is simple. He had answered an ad "Butler Wanted," but had found upon applying that the position required good references. "I had none and they didn't want me." Stricken by the pathos of his explanation and awakened to a fresh realization of the wrong she had done him, Mrs. Sands repents of her act.

THE TAMING OF SUNNYBROOK NELL (Sept. 25).—Clon, an aged mountaineer, has a daughter, Sunnybrook Nell, so called because of her devotion for her native Sunnybrook mountain. Her lover, a sober youth of the hills, loves her deeply and devotedly, and the story opens with his giving her an engagement ring. Near the home of old Clon, a summer resort is visited by a Mr. and Mrs. Slifford Durkin; and Durkin, meeting Nell, becomes madly infauated with her. Her wild mountain ways and woodland mannerisms cause him to completely forget his wife, and he fairly overwhelms the ignorant girl with his glib tongue and city ways.

Steve, her mountain lover, notices a change in her reception of his frequent calls, and one day learns the cause. His primitive passions are aroused and at first he is inclined to crush the city man as he would a wood rat, but on second thought he decides upon a more manly way, and at the same time hopes to teach the impetuous Durkin a lesson he will remember. Learning of Sunnybrook's intended flight with Durkin, Steve goes to the hotel the night of the elopement and tells her to come with him to where her husband has said he will show her the beautiful moon rise over the mountains.

Steve takes her to Nell's cabin and then strikes out upon the trail of the runaways. He quickly overtakes them and by the simple words "You wife is waiting at Nell's cabin, where you promised to show her the moonrise," he exposes Durkin to the unsophisticated Nell and saves his rival from an awkward situation. Durkin acts upon the hidden threat and hastens shamefaced to meet his wife, who never learns of his perfidy, while Steve, again turns to the defiant manner in a way quite suggestive of the rough code of the mountains, which leaves her in little doubt as to who is her predestined lord and master.

KOMIC

FOILED AGAIN (Sept. 20).—Ralph Coises, a stage villain, sees Moitle Perry and falls in love with her. Percy Basker, a dude farmhand, is her accepted lover and they are to be married as soon as she has enough money saved up. Ralps pays court to Moitle, but she repulses him. He swears revenge, and prepares to act like a typical villain, but finds that Percy has stolen his cigarettes in order to foil him. Ralph is balked and forswears his revenge until he can get a cigarette. But Percy's father, the constable, prohibits the sale of these articles, and Ralph has to go to another town to get them. Returning Percy foils him again by doping him and shaving his curling black moustaches, without which he cannot work at the trade of villain. Waiting until they are grown again, he seizes the scornful Moitle and ties her to the railroad track. Days pass, but no train comes. Then he learns from a native that "there hain't been a train on this line for more'n five years." As his next play he puts the poor girl in an abandoned cistern and leaves her to her fate. As the water rises higher and higher, Moitle keeps herself from drowning by drinking the water blow her up, but having no match to light the as fast as it comes in. Later Ralps seeks to fuse, borrows one from the unsuspicious Percy. Just at the psychological moment, however, he receives word from the Villains' Union that they had made a mistake and sent him after the wrong girl—Moitle hasn't a cent. So it's all off.

PRINCESS.

SIS (Sept. 11).—Sis is a country girl, but being left a large sum of money, she goes to the city to visit her cousin Alice. At first she is gawky and awkward, but after a few months, Alice and Clarke make a beautiful and talented girl of her. She meets a young man named Boyd, an intimate friend of Clarke's, and the two immediately fall in love.

In the meantime Sis's aunt and uncle in the country become homesick to see her and decide upon a visit to the city. When they see her beautiful home and her still more beautiful clothes, they realize the gulf that has grown between them and return home heart-broken at not seeing the little girl, who had left them. Sis learns of their disappointment through a letter they send her, reading between the lines the reasons of the old couple's chagrin. She plans a surprise. Dressing up in her old gingham dress, which she had worn when she came to the city, with Boyd, Alice and Clarke, she goes to the country to see the old folks. Her aunt and uncle are delighted to see Sis once more as she was before she went away, and their happiness is complete when Sis tells them, "I will be Sis to you always."

KAY BEE.

NO-ACCOUNT SMITH'S BABY (Two Parts—Sept. 18).—"No-Account" Smith is a shiftless miner, too lazy to work his mine. While he is spending most of his time in the saloons, his wife, Lucy, struggles along in poverty. A baby girl comes to brighten her life and for a time Smith's affections for the infant make him fairly industrious.

Finding a nugget he buys a pair of shoes for the baby's Christmas. For a time he resolves to let drink alone, but his good resolutions fail and two years later he is a worthless drunkard. He hears the miners talking one day of the arrival of the stage coach with a considerable sum of gold. He determines to hold up the stage and his wife, learning of his intentions, wraps the baby's first shoes in the mask which he has made for himself. When he goes to hold up the stage, as he takes the mask from his pocket the baby's shoes fall out and a strong revulsion of feeling comes over him. He tears the mask into shreds and a little later overtakes the stage, which has broken down. In the stage Smith finds a man who had previously written to his wife about purchasing the mine and invites him home for the night. Ross, the prospective purchaser, buys Smith's mine and Smith, thankful over his failure to rob the stage, resolves to lead a better life.

BRONCHO.

PARSON LARKIN'S WIFE (Two Parts—Sept. 23).—Jane Woods, a chorus girl, goes on a vacation to a small New England village and is immediately the subject of all the town gossip. James Larkin, the village parson, proposes to her and is accepted. Jane makes a very good little wife and everything runs smoothly until the musical comedy company with which Jane used to be, arrives in town, and Jane is recognized by the girls. Madge and two or three of her old companions call on Jane during a meeting of the missionary society, which breaks up in horrified confusion when the ladies learn that the strangers are members of the theatrical profession. Even Larkin is influenced by the women's story of what Jane "used to be." He turns against his wife and Jane decides to leave him.

She is on her way to the station when she encounters Hud, a half-witted boy whom she had once saved from the hands of an angry constable, but who later had been sent to an asylum. Hud is sneaking into the school room with a large bread knife, intent on killing the children who have teased and taunted him. Confident in her influence over him, Jane succeeds in attracting his attention long enough to enable the children to escape, but she is wounded while trying to take the knife from the infuriated boy. After that she is reinstated in the good opinion of the village. The mothers of the children, whose lives had been threatened, make amends for their past aloofness.

THANHOUSER.

IN DANGER'S HOUR (Sept. 11).—Marion and Madeline, girls of twelve years, the twin daughters of Travis, a well-to-do farmer, are very fond of animals, but their father strongly disapproves of them. Carlo, a stray collie, lame and starving, is found by the two children and brought to their home, where they make much of him. When their father discovers what they have done, he orders the dog away, but the children care for him in a secluded spot on the farm.

Their kindness is amply justified when Marion falls in the water and Madeline summons the dog to her assistance. He springs into the water and brings back to safety his little friend. The father then learns the value of this particular animal, and gladly consents to have the dog remain on the farm.

THE EMPEROR'S SPY (Sept. 13).—A certain foreign government desiring information in regard to certain of the fortifications of the United States, send Valerie Vergere, one of its cleverest spies, to gain the required information. She meets Captain Davis, a young officer of the Engineer Corps, who is in the confidence of the general staff of the army, and soon wins his love. Learning that the plans of the fortifications must be secured at once, Valerie, by a clever ruse, secures possession of the plans through Davis. A secret service man is suspicious and warns the captain that Valerie is a foreign spy, but the captain, madly in love, indignantly denies it. Valerie, who overhears this conversation, is shamed by the fact that her companion is the man she has betrayed.

A dummy envelope which Valerie has substituted for the one containing the real papers is then in the possession of Captain Davis. Determined to make amends, however, Valerie makes a second substitution, placing in the captain's pocket the envelope containing the real papers. Thus the career of the man she loves is saved, although for the first and last time of her life she has disobeyed the orders of her Emperor.

GOLD (Two Parts—Sept. 15).—An old mountaineer, who has secretly accumulated $5,000, hearing of the numerous bank failures, determines to draw out the money. With a miser's caution, when asked by a rough character in the village, when he was going to draw out his money, he replies that he intends to do it on the following afternoon. Then he goes to the bank, receiving the money all in gold and hides it away in his cabin. His granddaughter and small grandson are away at the time carrying water for a surveying party. The following day, the mountaineer returns to the village to lay in supplies. He is seen to visit the bank and comes out with a big sack over his shoulder, which the bad man believes contains gold. The bad man follows him and when the opportunity comes pushes him over a precipice, where he is instantly killed.

To his surprise, however, he finds no gold. Being somewhat in liquor, he determines that the grandchildren know the secret of the hiding place and when he finds that they can tell him nothing, he ties the little girl in a chair, lashing her grandfather's gun with its triggers pulled back by a string, which passes over the flame of a burning candle. He then tells her only confession will save her and goes outside. The little grandson seeing his sister's danger runs to the surveying party for help. They arrive just in time to rescue the girl. The gun explodes and the shot shattters the woodwork of the window. The gold hidden there by the mountaineer comes tumbling out, and some of the shot passing on kills the murderer, who is standing outside.

THE VARSITY RACE (Two Parts—Sept. 22). Frank Irving, bow-oarsman of the Garford University Eight, is depended upon to win the annual rowing contest for his alma-mater. Irving is in love with Muriel, the pretty daughter of the professor of mathematics, but the professor doesn't look upon the athlete with much favor, particularly as he has fallen behind in his studies. The professor speaks to him about his shortcomings and the oarsman endeavors to make up for his past remissness. Another student, who has also been behind in his studies, is Ralph Davis, a young man of rather dissipated habits, who is an unsuccessful suitor for Muriel's hand. Realizing that Irving has won her affections, he hates him accordingly.

Just before an important examination is to be held, it is discovered that someone has tampered with the professor's papers. Circumstantial evidence points to Irving, so much so that he is expelled from college. There is no one competent to replace him on the crew, which now faces almost certain defeat at the coming race. On the day of the race, however, Muriel discovers a clue and succeeds in establishing Irving's innocence and in proving that Davis is the guilty man. Word is sent to Irving who, despite numerous difficulties that greatly delay him, arrives just in time to take his place in the boat and win the race for his college.

MAJESTIC.

THE FINAL VERDICT (Two Parts—Sept. 13).—King rides into a western saloon and recognizes Burns at the bar. He covers the crowd with his gun, shoots Burns and makes his getaway. At his rendezvous, King finds himself out of tobacco and sends his companion, Eagle Eye, back to town to buy some. Eagle Eye discovers a reward for King outside the saloon, and the Indian leaving to return, brings the sign with him. King at the rendezvous takes the sign from Eagle Eye, destroys it, but Eagle Eye shows he is afraid of being caught with King and leaves, after being warned by King not to squeal.

Taking a job on a ranch, Eagle Eye meets the daughter through a little accident to a pail she is carrying, which he fixes for her; he is infatuated. King stops at the ranch house for a drink and sees Eagle Eye attack the daughter in another part of the place. King, going to rescue, beats up Eagle Eye and sends him off.

IT'S ALL IN THE LENS

No matter how thrilling a story one may read, interest is not sustained if poor type, poor paper and poor press work make hard work for the eyes. It's the same with motion pictures. A clear picture is as necessary as a good scenario.

Because the basic product is right, the clearest pictures are on "Eastman" film. Look for the stencil mark in the margin.

To revenge himself, Eagle Eye turns informer and directs the sheriff to King's position. King sees them near the cliff and the shooting brings down Eagle Eye, who falls over the cliff. A duel follows between the sheriff and King. The sheriff is finally keeled over with shot and King goes to wet handkerchief. He leaves his gun behind, and the sheriff, reviving, covers King, ties his hands with a handker hief.

The westerners decide to take the law in their own hands and coming on the sheriff in his cabin, eating, they take the prisoner away from him, after hog-tying the sheriff. The crowd makes for a tree but as they arrive and are ready to string up King, the sheriff comes, after freeing himself by rolling into the hayfield and cutting bonds with a hayknife he found. The sheriff covers the crowd with his revolver, makes them remove the rope and King tells his story.

King, Burns and Mary are making the journey over the range when they come upon an old miner's shack. They answer his cries for help, King and Mary going in. The miner is on his deathbed and before he passes away gives them the bag of gold he has hoarded. The two make Burns a third partner in their good fortune. At camp that night, Burns takes the money from King and with the only water bag in the party, steals away.' After a terrible trip across the desert, Mary dies, with King attending her. Hence the swift revenge on Burns in the saloon.

Back to the tree, where the westerners commend and sympathize with King, and all leave except sheriff who looks at King, grief-stricken.

HER AWAKENING (Two Parts—Sept. 20). - The will of old Dr. Andrews left the bulk of his property to his niece, Mary, who was an orphan living in a distant mining town. The small balance of his wealth went to a married nephew, John, who had been practicing medicine with him and was now made the executor of his estate, but who felt that he should have been made the sole heir. It fell to John to seek out Mary and bring her to her inheritance.

John and his wife went to the mining town and found Mary working in the hotel, where she had been employed since her father's death. The three started back to the city, accompanied by the Indian guide. On the way they came to a stop for rest near a high cliff overlooking the desert. Mary was attracted by the beauty of the view and stood on the cliff with John's wife near by. John came behind them unperceived except by his wife. He could reach out his hand and touch Mary. A slight shove would send her over. A look of intelligence passed between husband and wife and a moment after Mary fell to the rocks far below. They went down and picked her up, and she was apparently dead. They wrapped her body in a blanket and buried her in a shallow grave in the sand. Then they went on to the next settlement and taking the affidavit of the guide to the effect that the death of Mary had been accidental, they returned to the city, where John claimed the entire inheritance. Meanwhile, Bob Turner, a young miner living alone with his mother in a cabin, passing the grave noticed a strange movement of the earth. He investigated and found that Mary was just recovering consciousness. He carried her to his mother's cabin and they nursed her back to health, but her memory was gone.

Bob was college bred and his mother was with him for her health. The two decided that Mary must be taken to a doctor. So they set out across the desert for the city with Mary, who had now come to love Bob. In the city they stopped at a cheap hotel and sought a doctor, who agreed to operate, but he must have assistance. He called in Dr. John. When John saw Mary his terror was complete, but when he found that she did not know him he regained his composure. He proposed the next day for the operation at his own office. It was agreed and he left the office, hastening home to his wife, to whome he told the news. They agreed that he must risk anything to render the operation abortive. His sudden terror had been noticed by Bob, who inquired of the first doctor who John was. The doctor told him, relating the matter of the inheritance from old Dr. Andrews. The truth dawned on Bob and he told of his finding Mary buried alive. The doctor agreed to help him trap John.,

The next day found a third doctor present to assist in the operation and a detective posing as a waiting patient. The patient was placed in the chair and John was about to operate when the first doctor interposed and the third doctor proceeded to operate. John was forced to watch the result with his wife, while the detective watched both of them that they should not escape. The operation successful, Mary's memory slowly came back. She recognized John, and her first words were, "He shoved me over the cliff." The arrest of John and wife followed as they were escaping, and as an aftermath we see Bob and Mary happily married.

MEG OF THE MINES (Sept. 22).—Meg and her father are mining in the desert and suddenly the old man discovers gold. Jimson, a prospector, and his pal see this and decide to jump the claim. This they do, leaving the old man dazed by the roadside while Meg is off after water, and drive away to record the claim in their own names. But Meg has returned unobserved and seen the whole affair. Climbing into the back of their wagon, she hides and is carted off with Jimson and the gold. Later she is discovered, is pursued and falls over a cliff, being rescued by an old Indian and his squaw. Recovering she tells the Indian of the claim-jumpers and he follows and recovers the gold and kills one of the thieves and wounds the other. Restoring the gold to Meg, he helps her find her father again and the latter in gratitude repays the old Indian with a share in the rich mine discovered.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (No. 35—Sept. 14). - Before Margaret left town to visit the John Hays Hammonds at Lookout Hill, the famous estate in Gloucester, Mass., she determined to get some toys for Baby Lily. She took counsel of Jean Parke, her very good friend, who had been Our Mutual Girl's sponsor in New York artistic and literary circles, and Miss Parke suggested that Margaret visit Rose O'Neill, creator of the famous Kewpies.

So Our Mutual Girl and Miss Parke motored to Miss O'Neill's studios. Miss O'Neill, artist, painter, and author, drew Kewpie pictures for Margaret and, when she learned that Our Mutual Girl intended to buy some Kewpies for Baby Lily, insisted that Margaret accept as gifts a number of the handsomest and cutest of these sprites.

Having seen the little foundling safe with her old nurse, Sally, Margaret felt free to go to Gloucester. There "Jack" Hammond, inventor of the method of steering ships by wireless, not alone showed Our Mutual Girl how he maneuvered a huge vessel about the harbor, though the ship did not have a soul aboard her, but he treated Margaret with a view of his latest invention, an electrical dog that hopped and played about as lively as if it were a real dog.

Our Mutual Girl, ever adventurous, determined that she would go out early one morning with the fishing fleet. Her friends tried to dissuade her, saying that the trip would be nasty and dirty and smelly. But Margaret became only the more enamored of the idea. So one morning she quietly left her hostess' estate, slipped to the wharves, and soon was aboard an old fishing smack. For several hours—and it was all before eight o'clock in the morning, too—the fleet stood back and forth, now throwing out its nets, now visiting the lobster pots. An old, weather-beaten sailor taught Margaret how to hold a live and very bitey lobster so that its claws couldn't invade Our Mutual Girl's soft hands. But Margaret quickly gave up the idea of playing with lobsters when she found aboard the fishing smack a tiny kitten, the pet of the captain.

When Margaret returned she had a lengthy talk about the future of Baby Lily and it was suggested that Margaret visit a Mrs. Rogers, a very wealthy and childless widow who wanted to adopt a little girl. Our Mutual girl adopted the suggestion reluctantly, because she wanted to keep Baby Lily for herself; and she became more determined to do so when she found that Mrs. Rogers' idea of a baby girl was about the same as of her toy dog.

So Margaret left Gloucester for Newport with the question of the baby's future still unsettled.

THE RUNAWAY FREIGHT (Two Parts—Sept. 26).—Boston Blackie, a tramp, arrives in a little town and is refused food by the station agent. But the latter's daughter, Anna, interferes and persuades her father to feed the tramp. Later on he is joined by Red and Slim, a couple of his crook pals, who plan a holdup of the station agent, and Blackie is asked to join the plan. The robbery is about to be pulled off when Blackie discovers that the agent is the girl's father, and refuses to join the plan. Red and Slim, afraid he will interfere, tie him up and go through with the plan, but find that the girl is tending the station in place of her father that night, the latter being ill.

The robbers think they have a cinch and terrify the girl and proceed to help themselves, getting very drunk meanwhile and insult the girl whom they have frightened, but whom they have not bound, leaving her free, though unable to get out or to reach the telegraph key. Blackie rolls over to the track and lies in such a position that a passing train cuts his bonds. He hastens to the rescue, and after a big fight captures the crooks and turns them over to the constable. Next day he is rewarded by the agent, who secures him a place as a student freight "brakie" running out of town.

Later Blackie is successful and in love with the agent's daughter. The two crooks have sworn vengeance against Blackie and while the latter is "braking" the two crooks board his train at a lonely water tank and are discovered by Blackie, who fights them and cleans them up. They are even more strong for vengeance after being thrown off the train and return to town and lay for him, finally planning to avenge themselves on him through Anna. The plan is to put her on a car on a grade and send her flying down grade to her death at a curve by the river. The two crooks lure her into the yards by a fake note purporting to come from Blackie, but Blackie returns in time to warn the girl. Dressed up in sunbonnet, Blackie goes to the car but is overpowered and the crooks start the car rolling down the grade, first setting the switch to throw the car over an embankment into the river. Blackie loosens his hands but the car is going too fast for him to escape, and he goes into the river with the car; but he crawls out unhurt and meets the girl, who has forced the two crooks at the point of a gun to ride her on a handcar in pursuit of the runaway cars. The two crooks are caught and Anna helps rescue Blackie.

WHERE THE MOUNTAINS MEET (Sept. 30).—Jerry Kane is broke and disconsolate when a letter is brough him saying an old friend has died and left him $1,000, enclosed. Jerry and his friends, delighted, starts celebration. Maizie Wallace and her sick father arrive in town without friends or money. Wallace is too ill to go on to their destination. Jerry sees them at a hotel, where the proprietor grudges them reception. Jerry pities them and takes up a collection, and, finding it scant, puts most of his money into the hat. He presents it bashfully to Maizie in hotel parlor.

Two crooks, Pinny Falk and Big Dan Jaffry, see the money given to the girl. After Jerry goes, they take it from her and knock her senseless. Jerry, incensed at the hotel man for treatment of the girl, has found a vacant cabin up the glen for her and her father. He gets a carriage to take them there and returns to find the girl senseless. A posse is organized to hunt the thieves. Meantime the crooks, hard pressed, hide in the cabin in the glen.

Jerry takes Maizie and her father and woman from hotel to the cabin. The crooks, seeing them coming, climb to the loft over the rafters. Maizie takes possession of the cabin. Jerry gives her one of his guns and goes, but decides to remain in the woods, nearby. He lies down to watch, but goes to sleep. Maizie goes to the spring for water. The crooks attack the woman left in the cabin and run out. Maizie, returning, sees them. She finds father and woman hurt. The crooks running through the woods wake Jerry, but neither party sees the other. Maizie, seeing Jerry in the woods, takes him for the enemy and fires upon him. He drops. Maizie faints. Meantime the posse gives up trailing the crooks and short-cuts back for the town. The crooks nearly meet them and turn back toward the cabin.

Jerry, after being fired at, reconnoitres and finds Maizie, who has fainted after shooting at a crook, as she supposes. He is bending over her when the crooks come back and attack him. Maizie, coming to, sees the crooks and warns Jerry, who rises and fights. One crook is shot; the other closes up with Jerry. The posse comes out of woods just in time to save Jerry from death. The crooks are captured; Maizie and Jerry find the money on Falk. Each insists that the other take it, but finally agree to divide it—and all other things for future.

Wherever Motion Pictures Are Used—

There You Need

THE PHANTOSCOPE

whether at home, in the school, the church, the hall or salesrooms—whether for advertising purposes, amusement, instruction or education, the Phantoscope is the best projecting machine.

It takes standard motion picture film, film standard the world over.

It takes electric current from the ordinary incandescent lamp socket, either current.

It may be stopped anywhere, and the picture examined at leisure; the film will not be ignited.

It also projects standard magic lantern slides, alternating without interruption.

It is light, and portable, weighing in its carrying case about twenty pounds.

It projects an eight-foot picture, well lighted, with the usual film and slides.

It works equally well in rural districts without electric current.

It is remarkably simple (and easy of operation), and costs but $100 complete.

HEPWORTH.

A PRICE ON HIS HEAD (Two Parts).—Mr. Murgatroyd buys his grandson, Eric, a pony on the occasion of his twelfth birthday. Eric is delighted and Mr. Murgatroyd advertises in the local paper for an expert horseman to teach him to ride the animal. The advertisement happens to attract the notice of a gang of thieves and blackmailers. One of their number, known as "Flash Charlie," happens to be a very good horseman. He secures the post, and the gang is correspondingly jubilant. Their plan is nothing less than to kidnap the boy and keep him captive while they demand an exorbitant sum for his safe return.

One night Charlie opens the ground floor window and admits two more of the gang. Creeping into the boy's bedroom they chloroform him and carry him downstairs to a waiting auto. The next morning Eric is missed, and when "Flash Charlie" is also found to be absent, Mr. Murgatroyd can perceive foul play. When the mail arrives it brings a letter stating that his grandson has been kidnapped and that his only chance of seeing him again is to pay a ransom of £5,000, which is to be handed to a messenger at a given spot on the following day. Mr. Murgatroyd consults Detective Brendon. His first discovery on entering Eric's bedroom is the cloth which was used for the chloroform, and, following up this clue, he soon discovers signs outside the house which plainly show how the capture was effected. He next advises that the messenger should be met at the appointed spot. Brendon is there to meet the man, and hands over to him what appears to be £5,000 in banknotes. The man has not gone far before he is arrested by police. On being taken to the station and searched, they discover on the man minute instructions as to where he is to meet the rest of the gang, and Brendon resolves to assume a disguise as much like the man as possible and go in his place.

Brendon sets off for the "Red House," where Eric is concealed. The detective's disguise is so good that the gang believe him to be the man they are expecting with the money. As soon as they are inside the cottage Brendon whips out his revolver, when a door suddenly opens behind him, and another member of the gang takes him from behind unawares. Brendon, overpowered, is bound hand and foot and thrust into the same room where Eric is lying a captive. The old man is in a great state at receiving no news, while the detective's assistant, Jack, has been wandering about all night trying to pick up some traces of his master. His wanderings have carried him to the edge of the moor when his attention is caught by some repeated flashes of light from one of the windows of a desolate-looking cottage. Time after time the flashes are repeated with exact regularity, until it suddenly dawns upon Jack that it is a heliographic message of "S. O. S."

Jack rushes off to the police station for help and excitedly pours out his tale to the inspector in charge. A posse of police, armed with revolvers, set out with Jack as their guide. Their approach is noticed by the kidnappers, who greet them with a shower of bullets. The police rush the house and after a fierce struggle the members of the gang are captives.

BOSWORTH, INC.

AN ODYSSEY OF THE NORTH.—To Cal Galbraith's cabin in the Klondike, one winter night, comes a starving, frost-bitten figure. Cal recognizes it as Naass, an Esquimau dog-driver, to whom he had lent sixty ounces of gold dust that he might buy release from the service, and who thereupon had left for a prospecting trip with Axel Gunderson and his wife many weeks before. Crouching by the fire, Naass tells his story.

We see the feud in the Esquimau village between the descendants of two shipwrecked sailors, which terminates at the wedding plotlach of the last of the two lines, Naass and Unga. We see Axel carry Unga off to his ship, where he later wins her love and marries her. Knowing nothing of this, but always remembering the last appeal in Unga's eyes, Naass follows as best he can. From city to city he journeys, till a clue carries him to the sealing grounds. With Axel's ship in sight, Naass' ship is captured by Russians in waters forbidden to sealers, and he is sent to Siberia. Not even the horrors of the salt mines and the knout daunt him and he escapes, to make his way back through Alaska to San Francisco.

There he learns that Axel and Unga had left the day before for the Klondike; but at least he has a definite clue and a bait to trap Axel with in the shape of a map leading to a wonderful mine in the unknown mountains of interior Alaska, given him by a dying prospector, so with renewed courage he starts out again. At Dawson the long search is ended, but they do not remember one who had paid for Unga's love an untold price, and he easily persuades them to go with him in search of the mine in the mountains. The odyssey is over, the never-forgotten appeal in Unga's eyes will now be answered, and Axel is in his power. He destroys the caches for the return trip, kills the dogs, and watches with the exultation of the just avenger Axel's slow death from starvation and frost.

Then when death has come to Axel and is very near himself and Unga, he reveals his identity. "I am Naass, the last of the blood, as you are the last of the blood." To his bewilderment, Unga laughs wildly, then denouncing him in a passionate outburst, throws herself beside the dead body of her husband and refuses to leave him. "But upon me there lay your debt, which would not let me rest. I repay." And giving Cal a bag of gold, taken from the far mountains, Naass turns again to the fire.

GENERAL FILM COMPANY.

A FAIR REBEL (K. & E.—Biograph.—Three Parts).—Steve Monteith and Ezra Mason, upper class men, and Bill Bronson, a plebe, are chums and roommates at West Point before the Civil War. Steve prepares to leave for his home in Virginia, and Mason and he exchange photographs before parting. General Abner Montieth, Steve's father, and his sister Clairette are overjoyed and surprised when Steve arrives. Aunt Margie and her adopted daughter, Joan Fitzhugh, who is very fond of Steve, join the family and give Steve a warm welcome. One year later the rumble of war is heard. Steve, now a major, and his father, General, leave at the head of separate companies with the Confederate troops.

The days at Monteith Manor are lonely for Clairette, and her cousin, Captain DePerrin, formerly of the French Army, comes to act as her protector. He falls madly in love with Clairette, but his attentions annoy her and she tries to evade him. Ezra Mason, now a Colonel in the command of Union forces, and Major Stillman are granted a short leave of absence. They are ambushed by a Confederate near Monteith Manor. Major Stillman is wounded and is assisted to Montieth Manor by Mason. Nelse, the Monteith slave servant, sees the "Yanks" (Mason and Stillman) coming towards the house. He calls Clairette, who shows resentment at their appearance, but when she discovers Major Stillman is wounded she softens. Major Stillman is made comfortable and Aunt Margie is put in charge as nurse.

A few days later, Mason received a message telling him Clairette's father has died. Clairette is paralized with grief, and Mason, now very much in love with her, tries to console her. DePerrin is jealous of Mason's attentions to Clairette and schemes to get him out of the way. Major Stillman recovers and proposes to Aunt Margie. She surrenders and leaves for Washington with the Major, who has been promoted to Colonel, taking Joan with them. Colonel Mason prolongs his stay at Monteith Manor. DePerrin is persistent with his attentions to Clairette and is passionately declaring his love for her when Mason enters. Clairette goes to Mason for protection and he then tells her of his love. Major Watkins, in command of the U. S. Telegraph Corps, while passing the manor, reports to Mason that all is quiet and Masor looks forward to a few more pleasant days with Clairette.

Bill Bronson, now a straggler from the confederate ranks, is caught by DePerrin taking food from the window. DePerrin questions Bronson and learns that Major Steve Monteith is in command of his troops. DePerrin is struck with an idea to get even with Mason and sends Bronson back to Steve with an anonymous note telling him that a Union officer is making the Manor his headquarters, much to the annoyance of his sister. Major Watkins and the Telegraph Corps reach their supply house and are startled by the Confederate troops who open fire. Watkins, though badly wounded, rushes off for aid. The Union forces are attacked by the Confederates while crossing a bridge and are thrown into a panic. The bridge is blown up by the enemy but the Union troops repel the attack and drive the enemy back.

At the same time the supply house of the Telegraph Corps is burned by the Confederates. Major Watkins reaches Monteith Manor and reports to Colonel Mason, who orders him to telegraph the information to headquarters and save the army. Watkins, bleeding and badly wounded, climbs the telegraph pole near the Monteith home and is about to send Mason's message when the Confederate troops in charge of Steve open fire and kill him. DePerrin gives the troopers orders to shoot Mason. Bronson recognizes Mason as a friend who did him a service before the war and is very angry at DePerrin. The Confederate troops are about to kill Mason when Steve orders them to fall back. He is astonished to find Mason, and, forgetting his position, clasps Mason's hand. Mason surrenders and is placed in Libby Prison. DePerrin, officer of the day at the prison, has Mason placed in quarters known as "Rat Hell."

Bronson on guard, acts as guard for Mason in aiding his escape. Mason starts to dig a tunnel but is interrupted by DePerrin making his rounds. Clairette arrives in Richmond to effect Mason's exchange. The Commander at the Confederate Headquarters sends DePerrin a message asking for a report on Mason. DePerrin tells Mason if he will swear never to see Miss Monteith again he will secure his release. Mason, enraged, tells DePerrin he disgraces the uniform he wears and rejects the proposition. Clairette is informed of DePerrin's action and is about to give way in utter despair when she is struck with an idea. Bronson secures a Confederate outfit for Clairette and instructs her in the duties of prison guard. Clairette meets Bronson at the prison and takes his place. He gives her his gun and countersign "Virginia." DePerrin, making his rounds tells "Bronson" (Clairette) to shoot any Union officer on sight who attempts to escape. Clairette salutes, and is about to collapse from fright, when the earth near her breaks and she sees Mason coming through. He is about to strike when he recognizes Clairette. They exchange coats, she gives him the signal to pass the sentry and the countersign "Virginia."

Clairette, now thoroughly frightened, sees DePerrin and guards coming. She tries to hide Mason, and DePerrin at sight of a Union officer fires. Clairette stumbles and falls at his feet. DePerrin recognizes Clairette, and, thinking he has killed her, commits suicide. The surgeon at the Confederate headquarters orders Clairette removed to her home. The war is over and Major Stillman and Aunt Margie return to Monteith Manor. Steve is astonished at the wonderful development of Joan and falls in love with her. He proposes and is accepted. They are sealing their engagement when Mason enters and interrupts them. Major Stillman and Steve greet Mason heartily and tell him he is all the medicine Clairette needs, and they plan to surprise her. Aunt Margie tells Clairette the Major has the medicine for her in the conservatory. Mason comes out from his hiding place and proves to be the tonic Clairette needed most.

THE PLUM TREE (Essanay—Three Parts—Sept. 18).—Craig Ewell and Norris Griggs are in love with pretty Alice Graham. One night the limited is held up and Craig is accused. He is tried and found guilty. Alice is stunned by the fate of her sweetheart and is forced into a loveless marriage with Griggs. Ten years later, Craig is freed and wanders heartbroken to the Pacific coast. Criggs has become the financial leader in a Mexican revolution plot. One night Craig is discovered watching a Rebel ship being loaded with contraband arms and is put to work on the vessel. He overhears the revolutionist's plot, and, after a terrific hand-to-hand battle, swims to shore and gives the alarm. The Federal troops, guided by Craig, rush to the scene and a battle takes place. Griggs and Ewell, not recognizing each other, engage in an encounter in which Griggs is mortally wounded. Craig carries him out of the line of fire to a hut. Here Griggs summons a padre and confesses to having planned the train robbery to implicate Craig and to get him out of the way. Hearing his name mentioned, Craig hastens to the bedside and the two men recognize each other. The shock kills Griggs and Craig is left with a written confession. He then returns to Alice and a beautiful reunion takes place under the old plum tree.

THE LION OF VENICE (George Kleine—Six Parts).—Captain Benito Rienzi, in command of a small fleet of Venetian men-of-war, is sent to hold the island of Cyprus against the onslaughts of the Turkish squadrons, but after a valiant defense is forced to give way and put back to Venice for re-enforcements. His masterly retreat and his preservation of the fleet in the face of such odds wins him almost as much glory as a victorious battle would have done, and he is complimented by the Doge and the Council of Ten, the highest powers of the republic. Those honors, however, are meaningless to Rienzi when he learns that during his absence his sweetheart, Bianca, has been forced to marry Count Orsini. He meets her at their trysting place, the famous shrine of Our Lady of the Water, and there she tells him that although her heart is his, she has pledged her faith to Orsini and that she will be true to her vows.

In the meantime a scapegrace young nobleman of unsavory reputation has been unsuccessfully wooing Adriane, Rienzi's sister, and, unsuccessful in his attempts to win her by flattery, plans an abduction. Rienzi discovers the plot and pursues the would-be kidnapper, who takes refuge in a home frequented by Orsini. The Count protects him. Orsini, knowing of Benito's love for his wife, conspires with the young nobleman to bring about the captain's downfall. They conceal a forged letter in his apartment and denounce him to the authorities as a traitor to his country. His house is searched and the paper, ostensibly a letter from a Turkish commander accepting Rienzi's offer to surrender the Venetian flotilla to the Sultan, is found. He is arrested and only the personal intervention of the Doge's wife, who acts in response to an appeal by Adriane, prevents his execution. The disgrace causes the death of Rienzi's mother, and he, his death sentence commuted to exile from Venice, is forced to leave the country.

Taking his sister with him, Rienzi joins the pirates of Delmatia, who have risen in revolt against the power of Venice, and in revenge for the ungrateful treatment he has sustained at the hands of his fatherland, determines to lead her enemies against her. Adriane still loyal, begs him not to turn his hand against the flag of his country, but he will not listen to her. News of Rienzi's connection with the pirates is carried to Venice and a price is set upon his head. Learning of this, Bianca hopes to win him back to loyalty, and to this end sends him a banner displaying "The Lion of Venice," which she has embroidered. The bitter-hearted captain, however, refuses to be won over. He throws the flag aside, but Adriane, still confident of changing his heart, secretly takes it and hides it in the hold of the pirate ship.

Meanwhile Orsini has been placed in command of a great squadron sent out by Venice for the double purpose of destroying both the Turkish fleet and the pirate vessels. He is attacked by a giant Turkish armada, whose commander, knowing of Benito's rebellion, sends to invite the pirate vessels to participate in the attack. Benito gladly accepts and puts his vessel under way. While the ship is headed toward the hard-pressed Christian fleet, however, Adriane brings the lion flag of Venice from the hold and, unobserved, climbs quickly to the masthead. There is a moment of silence among the pirates as they see the waving folds of the national emblem, then they break into a hearty cheer. Rienzi can no longer resist the call of flag and country. With a shout he urges his men against the astonished Turks. By his aid the fleet of Venice comes out of the struggle victorious, and Orsini, mortally wounded, confesses the plot against his rival. Then, with the Crescent banners as trophies of his victory, Benito sails back to Venice, where his seeming treachery is explained and he is restored to rank and honor. And Bianca, freed by the same stroke that took her husband's life in battle, is waiting for him on his return.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode Twelve—Parts 23 and 24).—After her trying experiences in Episides Ten and Eleven, which culminated in her rescue of Norton from death under the wheels of the "Lightning Express," Florence, upon her return home, determines to remain within the safe walls of the Hargreaves' mansion for an indefinite rest. Not so Norton, who, little the worse for his desperate adventure, redoubles his efforts to learn the plans of the conspirators. The Countess Olga, now recovered from her injuries in the wreck, is brought back to the city by Braine, whose fertile mind is still filled with schemes for getting trace of the missing million.

Meanwhile, a ship, bound for the Bahamas, while weighing anchor in New York harbor, brings up a mysterious strong-box from the mud and sand at the bottom of the bay. One of the sailors, realizing that it may contain treasure, hides it in his gunny-sack. At the end of the voyage, however, he loses the box overboard again in a fight with the mate, but not before he has seen the name "Hargreaves" upon it. All this, of course, neither the conspirators nor Florence know. What Braine and the others do know, however, is that a mysterious stranger has been loitering around the grounds of the Hargreaves mansion and has had several secret conferences with old Jones, the butler.

Just who it is, that Braine suspects this stranger to be, is not entirely apparent, but that he menaces the plans of the conspirators seems certain. Learning, late one evening that the man is lurking in the Hargreaves' grounds, Braine and the Countess Olga take a hurried trip thither in a taxi. While the Countess remains in the taxi, Braine makes a hurried reconnoissance. He sees the mysterious man in earnest colloquy with Jones, and, taking careful aim with his revolver, prepares to remove him forever from interference with the conspirators' schemes.

Just at that moment, however, Florence, who has come to her window to enjoy the limpid moonlight, sees Braine in the garden and realizes his deadly intention. Quick as a flash she seizes a pistol from her bureau drawer and fires, just in time to wound Braine's upraised hand. Balked, the conspirator makes a hurried escape in the waiting taxi, and when old Jones returns to the house, in spite of Florence's inquiries, strangely enough he refuses to disclose the identity of the personage with whom he was conferring, still less the subject of their conversation. In the meantime, Jackson, loitering in one of the rough resorts by the harbor, overhears the sailor, who had first found and then lost the mysterious treasure box, recount his strange experience. A few questions and he makes certain that it is none other than the strong-box which contains the missing million. Having learned its approximate location, he hastens to the meeting-room of the conspirators and makes a report. After some discussion one of the members of the gang is sent to Bahamas with instructions to bring back the box, no matter what the cost.

The conspirators, having ceased their activities, Norton realizes that something important is in the wind, but is unable to ascertain just what it is. Becoming certain that Jackson holds the secret, he trails him steadily and at last plans to take desperate measures. Following Jackson to the grounds of the Hargreaves' mansion, he attacks him and with the aid of Jones, leaves him pinioned behind a thick hedge. From papers in Jackson's pocket he learns the secret of the conspirators' haunt and the passwords necessary to enter it, and also the fact that the gang are momentarily expecting the return of their agent from the Bahamas. Providing themselves with the necessary masks, Norton and Jones set out for the conspirators' den. Neither of them have formed any plan, but decide to trust to developments after they obtain entrance. These come rapidly. Hardly have they entered the room where the conspirators are gathered, than the messenger returns with the precious box.

Braine, with his hand still injured by Florence's shot, is sent for, as is the Countess Olga, and the masked conspirators gather round the table on which the box is laid. With a hammer and cold chisel one of the gang makes ready to open it. Just as he raises his arm to strike the lock a smashing blow, the lights are suddenly extinguished. At once there is the greatest confusion and when, a moment later, the lights are turned on again the chest is gone. While the infuriated Braine and his satellites search wildly for the traitors, whom they then know for the first time have been in their midst, Jackson suddenly appears. He has managed to struggle out of the bonds with which Norton and Jones had bound him and the news which tells the other conspirators of the search the two had made of his pockets, is not all comforting. The conspirators hurry vainly in every direction to head off Norton and Jones, but to no purpose. They have vanished utterly and with them the elusive treasure. In the last scene two mysterious hands are seen lowering the fateful treasure box into the depths of an old well.

CAPTAIN SWIFT.—In order to avoid exposure attendant upon the birth of Harold Gage, the fatherless son of Constance, he, through arrangements made by Lady Staunton, the haughty sister of Constance, is placed under the care of Mr. and Mrs. Marshall, who are paid to rear the boy as their own, cautioned against revealing to him or the outside world his true identity. Mrs. Marshall's real son, in the early years of his life, acquainted with the doubtful parentage of Harold, taunts him. The two engage in a boys' fight, Harold being severely cut on his left arm by a scythe in the hands of his young foster brother, the wound leaving an ugly scar.

The lad, sensitive of the treatment of his foster brother, finally migrates to Australia as a stowaway, where, by reason of forced circumstances and his near starvation to death, become a bush-ranger. Because of the rapidity of his operations, and his ability to escape detection and arrest, he, as the unknown bush-ranger, received the sobriquet of "Capt. Swift."

He attempts to hold up a traveler, George Gardner, who is willing to suffer death rather than part with his gold. "Capt. Swift," hesitating to take a human life, compels him to alight and rides away with the wayfarer's mount. Swift, after having robbed the Queensland bank, suffers remorse, and determines to reform.

Under the name of William Wilding, being the name of his companion in Australia, who died of starvation and thirst on the desert, he returns to London, where, at an opportune moment, he saves James Seabrook, whose life is in jeopardy by reason of a runaway horse. "Capt. Swift," invited by Seabrook to his home, there meets Mrs. Seabrook, their daughter Mabel and their niece Stella Darbisher. Harry Seabrook, brother of Mabel, a whole-hearted but impetuous young man, takes immediate dislike to Swift, whereas Stella Darbisher, a girl of romantic disposition, admiring the brave spirit inherent in Swift, becomes strongly attached to him.

Marshall, the foster brother of Swift, is now employed as butler in the home of the Seabrooks. At a gathering the conversation is directed toward the escapades of one, "Capt. Swift," in Australia, whose name had become almost a household word throughout England. In the course of conversation, George Gardner, who is a friend of the Seabrooks, having returned from Australia, calls at their home, and there identifies Wilding as the notorious "Capt. Swift," and is in turn recognized by Swift, but his identity is not revealed to the others.

Mrs. Seabrook recognizes a strong similarity between the man Swift and her boy, given away in adoption to the Marshalls. Her fears are later justified, when, at a dramatic and tense moment, she proves the fact to him. Swift, however, in order not to stigmatize his mother, determines to leave the household of the Seabrooks. Stella Darbisher's infatuation for Swift has progressed to such a point as to cause a strong reciprocal feeling on his part for the girl.

The rivalry of Harry Seabrook for the hand of Stella causes a violent quarrel between him and Swift, the consequences of which are avoided by the timely intervention of Gardner. Marshall, eavesdropping during a conversation between Swift and his mother, Mrs. Seabrook, learns of the identity of Swift, and further proves it by a scar on Swift's arm, the result of the wound inflicted by Marshall when the two were boys.

With this knowledge Marshall attempts to blackmail Swift, and being repulsed, acquaints the police with his whereabouts. A detective from Australia has arrived in London to apprehend Swift, having traced his movements to that place. Gardner, strongly admiring the manhood of Swift, determining if possible to save him, warns him.

Swift, cornered in the home of his mother, rather than suffer arrest, together with the attendant exposure, and the possible revelation of his real identity, and to save the girl he loves and his mother the disgrace that would necessarily follow, jumps out of a window, knowing that the possibility of escape is meagre. Marshall, working in league with the detective, is hidden in the shrubbery, and seeing Swift, fires, mortally wounding him, at the same moment that the detective from a window above shoots, the cross shot which strikes Marshall, puts an end to him. The denouement ends without the identity of "Capt. Swift" being revealed to the others.

BROADWAY STAR FEATURES.

A FLORIDA ENCHANTMENT (Five Parts).—Miss Lillian Travers, a New York heiress, is about to visit her aunt, Miss Constancia Oglethorp, at her home in St. Augustine, Fla., and at the same time join her fiance, Dr. Fred Cassadene, in order to discuss preparations for their coming nuptials. Lillian's coming is to be kept a secret from the doctor, who is busily engaged in a gallant flirtation with a charming New York widow. The pleasant surprise party planned by Lillian develops disagreebaly when, having arrived, she hastens to the Ponce de Leon Hotel and finds the doctor making violent love to the widow.

Although fearfully jealous, Lillian continues to accept the doctor's attention. One day, while sightseeing, Miss Travis finds in an old curio shop, a box, the exact duplicate of one owned by her aunt. She hurries home with her find, expecting to meet the doctor, but receives a note in which he says he will be professionally busy and unable to see her that afternoon. Piqued at her lover, she plans vengeance and is idly investigating the contents of her purchase when she discovers it contains a bottle in which are four seeds from the tree of Sexual Change, and a parchment giving detailed account of how, by taking one of them, the person will be immediately transformed into one of the opposite sex. She determines to try the effectiveness of the seeds, and if the parchment tells the truth, to get square with her lover in the guise of a man.

A moment of indecision, and the deed is done. She sinks into a chair in a trance, to emerge in a few moments completely metamorphosed, and the boyhood of Miss Travis has begun. Next morning she awakes to find herself the possessor of a full-grown moustache. After much difficulty she succeeds in shaving it off, as she stills finds it necessary to be seen in feminine apparel. Joining her friends, she proceeds to make love to every female in sight, much to the discomfiture of the male members of the party. Realizing that it is improper to have a maid, Miss Travis makes Jane, her colored attendant, take one of the seeds so that she may be valeted by a person of the proper sex. The doctor, while aware that something is radically wrong with his sweetheart, persists in his love-making.

Lillian, disgusted with the Doctor's amorous attentions, determines to leave St. Augustine, and, by a clever ruse, just makes a train for New York. Arriving home, she sees her lawyer, turns her fortune over to a fictitious friend, Lawrence Talbot. Talbot shows up in St. Augustine with a letter of introduction written by himself and makes life miserable for the doctor by flirting with the widow and other guests in whom the doctor is interested. Circumstances arouse the doctor's suspicions regarding the integrity of Talbot, and he accuses him of murdering Lillian Travis. To save himself, Talbot confesses the mystery of the seed. The doctor does not believe him, and in a spirit of bravado, swallows one, and its action is immediate. The doctor, transformed, now makes love to all his male acquaintances. Disgusted at his actions, they call a policeman, but the doctor, scenting danger, escapes into the hotel and, to avoid the crowd following him, rushes into a strange room, where he dons a lady's dress and then hastily leaves as the owner of the room discovers him. In trying to make his escape, he is seen by his pursuers, who chase him until finally, just as he is going to be caught, he jumps into the ocean, and, as he is going down for the last time—Lillian Travis awakes to find it all a dream, and with a laugh looks at the vial in her hand as Dr. Cassadene enters to pay his respects.

You throw your money away when you pay big prices for new film and project it on a worn-out machine.
You cannot expect steady, clear and flickerless pictures from an old style projector.
Perfect projection can only be obtained by a first-class machine. We are distributors of the Motiograph, Power, Simplex and Edison Machines and Genuine Repair Parts and Supplies.
We sell for cash or on easy payments. Write today for our plan.

It Is Not Impossible

Some theatre owners have the idea that it is not possible to use the only perfect screen on a full drop. That idea is wrong. You can use the on any size drop and with the employment of a little mechanical skill have the screen adjust itself automatically to be absolutely perpendicular to the angle of projection.

This will positively eliminate the "Keystone" effect so often seen.

It will also screen your pictures in perfect proportion.

Ask us to tell you how you can do this yourself at a trifling expense. Then you too can

The Light Which Does Not Interfere With Projection

The day of the dark theatre has passed. This is due primarily to the perfection of the EYE COMFORT LIGHTING System. This system is neither an imitation nor a substitute. It is based on fundamental principles discovered by us and proven by long practice to be absolutely correct. It is the original indirect lighting.

Indirect Light does not interfere with the clearness of the picture. It has no glare, does not distract attention or cause headaches.

It lights the house evenly. It relieves eyestrain.

The Eye Comfort Lighting System

is so good and so successful that it is imitated. But these imitations, which are offered you because they are "cheap," lack the powerful one-piece silvered mirror X-RAY EYE COMFORT reflectors which control and direct the light by their scientific design and evenly light the house. These are the most powerful reflectors made and require less current than any others.

Fill in the blank below and allow our engineers to lay out a plan for lighting your theatre. This won't cost you a cent and does not obligate you in any way. But it will tell you exactly how much EYE COMFORT LIGHTING for your theatre would cost.

KINEMACOLOR COMPANY OF AMERICA.

GENERAL OFFICES:
MECCA BUILDING, SIXTEEN HUNDRED BROADWAY, NEW YORK

Oct. 28, 1913.

General Electric Co., (Attention Mr. H. C. Nelson)
Sales Department,
30 Church St., City.

Gentlemen,

In response to your favor of the 23rd inst., would state that we have received a great many reports from exhibitors using Mercury Arc Rectifiers in connection with Kinemacolor pictures, and they are unanimous in stating that the Mercury enables them to project a beautiful picture.

Yours truly,

KINEMACOLOR COMPANY OF AMERICA

A. H. Spurgeon Manager.

The G-E Mercury Arc Rectifier With the Kinemacolor.

"The Mercury enables them to project a beautiful picture."

This means a clear, sharp, brilliant picture, it means that in the highest type of projection a Mercury Arc Rectifier is used.

The Rectifier is equally good with black and white pictures—brighter, whiter, clearer, steadier pictures are the result. Throw out those troublesome, expensive-to-run "convertors" and put in a G-E Rectifier; the big saving in your lighting bills will soon pay for its installation.

The services of our moving picture experts are always at your disposal to assist you in getting the maximum results from the least expenditure.

Write for booklet B3274—it gives some valuable information regarding your business.

As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat anymore since the was installed.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address:

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

MAJESTIC GUIDE FOR EXHIBITORS

(In which we try to tell only the truth about all Majestic Releases)

DOWN THE HILL TO CREDITVILLE (1 Reel) Release date Friday, Sept. 18—A typical Dorothy Gish comedy presented in a novel way. A valuable offering. Story adapted from a poem in Munsey's Magazine.

HER AWAKENING (2 Reels) Release date Sunday, Sept. 20—A powerful as well as thrilling drama, well produced, featuring Blanche Sweet.

MEG OF THE MINES (1 Reel) Release date Tuesday, Sept. 22—A drama of the West with Mae Marsh in the leading role. The story is not especially novel, but the characteristic work of Miss Marsh makes it a very desirable offering.

THE GREAT GOD FEAR (2 Reels) Release date, Sunday, Sept. 27—This novel feature with Mae Marsh and Robert Harron in congenial parts should prove an exceptional picture. We can tell you better how well it has been produced in our next advertisement.

UNIVERSAL

Programs May Come --- Programs May Go --- But THE UNIVERSAL Will Remain Forever!!

Why? Because: THE UNIVERSAL has enough faith in the industry; enough faith in ITS OWN CAPABILITY to produce the BEST PICTURES IN THE WORLD.

THE UNIVERSAL has enough faith in its future to expend at this time---the most DANGEROUS time in the history of Motion Pictures---MORE MONEY THAN ALL OF THE SO-CALLED FEATURE COMPANIES COMBINED!

THE UNIVERSAL is now spending in the construction of AN ENTIRE CITY—a City large enough to hold a population of 15,000. A City to be devoted exclusively to the making of Motion Pictures. A City built with that Sole Purpose.

A MILLION DOLLARS

UNIVERSAL CITY is the only city of its kind in the world and the new UNIVERSAL CITY will be the most up-to-date and thoroughly modern community in the State of California.

A scientifically paved and scientifically piped Boulevard (SIX MILES)—electric lighted—will be the main artery of traffic.

Concrete dam and bridge across artificial lake and Universal River

Has Faith in You

UNIVERSAL CITY will have the most perfect water system in Southern California---fed by seven artesian wells---giving forth water 99% Pure at the rate of 300,000 gallons per day.

UNIVERSAL CITY is so cleverly constructed that at a moment's notice its entire architecture can be changed from a replica of ancient Greece or Rome to a modern villa—from the laborer's hovel to the King's Palace.

THE ZOO is now the largest and finest of any of the privately owned menageries in the world. African Lions—Leopards—Tigers—Wolves from the Siberian waste—Jackals—Wild Dogs—Mountain Lions—Reptiles of every description, from the mighty Python to the dangerous Cobra—Alligators and Crocodiles—Camels and Dromedaries—a Herd of Elephants—Nine different species of Birds, from the parlor Canary to the American Eagle — from the Dove to the dreaded Vulture. One of the finest Dog Kennels in the State of California containing over a dozen high-priced, prize-winning thoroughbreds. Cats of every description, from the house cat to the Persian Angora. A herd of goats and sheep.

UNIVERSAL CITY has its own Police Department—its own Fire Department, equipped with the finest fighting apparatus obtainable.

Its ADMINISTRATION BUILDING costs over $30,000!

Its LABORATORY costs over $25,000!

Its EXHIBITION THEATRE costs over $8,000!

Its BARRACKS for the housing of its troop of cavalrymen—Its BUNK HOUSE for its cowboys—are modern—clean and spacious.

Its INDIAN VILLAGE is one of the largest in America, with a tribe of Redmen fed and cared for by THE UNIVERSAL with the special permission of the United States Government.

It has Two Restaurants—One with a capacity of 600 and the other with a capacity of 400.

Its Two regular STAGES, built of concrete and steel, are the largest in the world !

It also has a Revolving Stage—a Rocking Stage—and a stage devoted entirely to putting on CHILDREN'S productions.

A SCHOOL, under the State supervision, but conducted and paid for by the Company, for the sole instruction of its large number of child actors, is one of its ways of taking care of the "little ones."

FIREPROOF DRESSING ROOMS—500—with Hot and Cold running water—electric lighted and heated. Bath rooms and swimming pools for both men and women.

Its WARDROBE DEPARTMENT—50 feet x 100 feet, contains a wardrobe valued at $32,000.

Its EMPLOYMENT DEPARTMENT is large enough to handle the 2,000 and more extra people the Company frequently employs.

Its Two HOSPITALS and INFIRMARIES are equipped in the most thoroughly modern fashion with every possible facility, including a complete X-Ray apparatus—all under the direct supervision and direction of the two UNIVERSAL physicians and surgeons—Drs. Lloyd Mace and F. Lamberson—assisted by a corps of trained nurses. Every employee of the UNIVERSAL is treated GRATIS for any ailment or injury sustained during work.

Nothing Like It

Its LUMBER YARDS and SAW MILLS ---Its CARPENTRY SHOPS and MACHINE SHOPS --- Its POWER HOUSE and PUMPING STATION---Its entire Mechanical equipment compares with that of any of the mammoth Corporations of the World.

Its CONCRETE BRIDGES over UNIVERSAL RIVER are so constructed as to be altered from a Roman arch to an American Trestle —from an English causeway to a Japanese pontoon.

Its LAKE and LAGOON have sufficient depth and size to float any craft from an Indian Canoe to a full-rigged ship.

Its MACHINE SHOPS for the repairing of cameras and laboratory equipment are the finest in the country.

Its PROPERTY DEPARTMENT is equipped to build any sort of stage property or furniture used in Motion Picture making.

Its ARMORY is equipped to make and repair every known weapon, from the Red man's bow and arrow to the high-power rifle—from the Roman javelin to the disappearing cannon, and contains in stock every conceivable weapon.

Its QUARTER-MILE RACE TRACK—Its GRAND STAND and STADIUM, are prepared to stage every kind of play calling for out-of-door sports—from the County Fair trotting meet to the Indian Durbar. All of which can be turned into a Baseball Park or a Golf Links.

Its TENNIS COURT is used in staging tennis scenes and for the amusement of Universalites during idle hours.

Its VILLA OF COTTAGES now under construction will include every sort of dwelling from the modest bungalow to the twenty-room mansion—all to be rented by the Company to its employees at rates far under the usual cost—the Company not making a Red Penny on this investment.

On the opposite page we show a reproduction of our page ad to appear in the October 3rd issue of the Saturday Evening Post—the second shot in our powerful publicity campaign.

As the reduction makes it difficult to read the TEXT, we have made a separate plate of that portion of the advertisement. The TEXT is so important to exhibitors we are reprinting it below in readable size type for your benefit.

You can now begin to grasp the important part Paramount Advertising is playing in the Paramount Plan—you can now see how it will benefit YOU when you sign the Paramount contract.

Paramount Plan
Hall Caine—on the Paramount screen! George Barr McCutcheon—on the Paramount screen! Owen Wister—on the Paramount screen! Jack London—on the Paramount screen! George Randolph Chester—name after name of popular writers could be mentioned here who are now in association with such prominent motion picture producing companies as The Famous Players Film Company, The Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, and Bosworth, Inc., who produce Paramount Pictures.
As a result of the formation of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, the works of a greater number of the best fiction writers and playwrights than were ever before obtainable on a single film program may now be seen in the most attractive picture form. Superb picturizations, produced with infinite care and regard for the affectionate esteem in which these World's greatest story tellers and dramatists are held by the public, are now being presented in the best theatres for the entertainment of the best people.
During the past month such well-known producers as Daniel Frohman, David Belasco, Henry W. Savage, Charles Frohman, Jesse L. Lasky and Hobart Bosworth, have added to the motion picture realm such popular productions as H. B. Warner in "The Lost Paradise," Hobart Bosworth in "Odyssey of the North," Dustin Farnum in "The Virginian," Henrietta Crosman in "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch," Edward Abeles in "The Making of Bobby Burnit," Mary Pickford in "Such a Little Queen."
These are the quality of stories that appeal to the better class of people—these are the quality of stories the better class of people will always see in Paramount Houses. Just scan this partial list of Paramount releases for the present month (October): Karl Kienlechner in "William Tell," Mme. Bertha Kalich in "Marta of the Lowlands," Charles Richman in "The Man from Home," Max Figman in "What's His Name," Marguerite Clark in "Wildflower," Robert Edeson in "Where the Trail Divides," Maclyn Arbuckle in "The County Chairman," etc. Look a little farther on, into November—Mary Pickford in "Behind the Scenes," Bessie Bariscale in "Rose of the Rancho," John Barrymore in "The Man from Mexico," Hobart Bosworth in "The Pursuit of the Phantom," etc., etc.—nowhere are stories so graphically told as on the Paramount screen.
The authors and playwrights whose photographs are reproduced above—as well as many others not shown here because of lack of space—offer their productions to the public upon Paramount Programs in Paramount Picture Houses because of their confidence in the Paramount Plan, which, briefly, is to establish a Paramount Theatre standard that will attract people of refinement and intelligence. You can identify a Paramount Photo Play by the Paramount trade-mark, always shown with Paramount Pictures—look for it.

"The Pursuit of the Phantom"

Written and Produced by

HOBART BOSWORTH

The writing end of the motion picture business is by no means new to Mr. Bosworth, although this is his first five-reel drama. He is the author of over a hundred photo plays of great success, and is a master not only of photo-play technique, but of the creation of strong dramatic plays of extraordinary screen value.

"The Pursuit of the Phantom" is an absolute innovation. Mr. Bosworth is supported by Courtney Foote, the eminent English actor.

HERE'S ANOTHER BIG ONE!

The second of Essanay's great PRIZE mystery dramas, produced in conjunction with THE LADIES' WORLD magazine,

"IN THE GLARE OF THE LIGHTS"

(IN THREE ACTS)

will be released through the feature department of the General Film Co., October 17, at the same time the November number of the magazine containing the story is on the newsstands and in the hands of subscribers. Like "THE PLUM TREE," the first of these COMPLETE PRIZE DRAMAS, "In The Glare of the Lights," will be a thriller from start to finish. In the magazine story there is a MISSING PARAGRAPH. In order to find the missing paragraph it will be necessary for THE FIVE MILLION readers of the Ladies' World to see the ESSANAY drama. The magazine is offering prizes for the best written MISSING PARAGRAPH.

YOUR AUDIENCES ARE WAITING FOR THIS TREMENDOUS FEATURE.
DO NOT DISAPPOINT THEM.

REMEMBER THE RELEASE DATE IS OCTOBER 17

A Few Other Big Features

"The Plum Tree"
(IN THREE ACTS)

is undoubtedly the most masterful drama of the year. The demand for it is growing daily.

"One Wonderful Night"
(IN FOUR ACTS)

is "packing 'em in" all over the country. It is called "one wonderful picture." FEATURING FRANCIS X. BUSHMAN.

"The Good-for-Nothing"
(IN FOUR ACTS)

Features G. M. ANDERSON, the most picturesque of all photoplay stars. The drama is one of gripping intensity.

"Blood Will Tell"
(IN THREE ACTS)

The climax of romantic Colonial dramas. Critics call it "one of the best photoplays ever produced."

"Ambushed"
(IN THREE ACTS)

Another of those ESSANAY successes abounding in mystery and adventure which delight any audience.

"MOTHER"

BY JULES ECKERT GOODMAN

IN 4 ACTS

RELEASED SEPT. 28TH

THE NAME SPEAKES FOR ITSELF. THE WHOLE WORLD LOVES THE MOTHER. DON'T FORGET TO SEE HER.

When Honor Calls

A four-part hammering drama which registers a punch in every scene. Frenzied mobs, crazed by the bursting of their financial bubble, themselves burst the bonds of restraint and storm the house of the fallen financier. The latter's daughter plays a prominent part and teaches a powerful lesson to a young man whose affections wane with the loss of her money. Your patrons can feel the throb of this film. It bites in. 1-3-6-sheet posters.

COLONEL HEEZALIAR IN THE WILDERNESS

More fun from the funny colonel—the great American cartoon character by the inimitable cartoonist J. R. Bray. Those who have seen the colonel accord him the place of the funniest character in film life—and they're quite right. They all want to see more of him and here's your chance to show him again along with Strange Animals (South America), in natural colors—a combined comedy-educational split reel that leads the field.

THE COLONEL'S WIFE

A skillfully staged drama in 3 parts. The story of a second wife, a suspicious husband, a loyal step-son and his friend. A plot of unusual entanglements that gains in strength with every twist. A former love affair breaks the cord of an otherwise happy alliance and the settlement is of the most unexpected sort. A living story about live people. 1-3-6 Sheet Posters.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE

Pauline's head is still above water and she's swimming strong. It would seem that she must have gone under long ago from the great mass of obstacles she's encountered and overcome, but she comes from plucky stock, and is still risking her life for the benefit of YOU, Mr. Exhibitor, that you may continue to show to crowded houses.

WAR STRICKEN LOUVAIN

Real authentic war scenes taken in and near Louvain in Belgium, showing the Belgian forces and the beginning of the destruction of the fine old city. The best war film that has yet reached the United States. One full reel.

Vendetta!

(Released through Special Feature Department, General Film Co.)

Five Parts (5071 Feet)

FROM MARIE CORELLI'S FAMOUS NOVEL

Now—in the Second Week of its Release—"Vendetta" Proves Itself Another Kleine Triumph!

GENERAL FILM OFFICES Already Feel a Heavy Demand for the Beautiful Corelli Tragedy—The Better Class of Theatres Are Playing it NOW—Newspaper Critics the Nation Over Call It a Second "QUO VADIS?" in Story, Acting and Photography, the Three Essentials of the Genuine Masterpiece!

THE NOVEL "VENDETTA," BY MARIE CORELLI, Has Been Translated Into the German, French, Russian, Italian, Greek, Persian and Hindustani Languages. Thus You Are Advertising a Story well Known in Almost Every Part of the World.

"VENDETTA" is a Natural Masterpiece. Every Tense, Dramatic Moment (as when Count Romani awakens in his own coffin) has been given the Touch of the Artist. Not a shade of over-acting, not a tableau held an inch too long. "VENDETTA" will delight the psychologist in its expression of subtle emotion.

"VENDETTA" Is Now Booking Through the Special Feature Department of the GENERAL FILM COMPANY

HOW YOU CAN MAKE MONEY ADVERTISING "VENDETTA"

Go to your local bookstore and ask them to lay in a big supply of the novel "VENDETTA" by Marie Corelli. Ask them to make a window display of the books, using your three and six-sheets conspicuously in the foreground, giving the name of your theatre and the date. Your bookstore proprietor will at once see his advantage in giving you valuable window space. Or perhaps you could profitably sell the novel in your theatre. It is printed in editions of every description from ten cent paper covered volumes to ten dollar apiece de luxe editions. If you are unable to obtain an attractive price from your local bookstore, write us and we will send you a list of publishers from whom you can obtain wholesale prices.

THE POISONED BIT

A drama by Clyde Morey

Tom had been held by the gypsies, but got away and exhausted fell asleep on Col. Standish's doorstep. Next morning, learning the boy's story, the Colonel employed him in his racing stables and thereupon began Tom's real career. He became a jockey and won several races, but lost one on which the Colonel had staked his entire fortune. He was summarily dismissed but eventually proved to the Colonel's satisfaction that a poisoned bit had made the horse lose and that this bit was the work of a dastardly culprit named Maloney. He eventually marries the Colonel's daughter.

In two parts, 2,000 feet. To be released Friday, Oct. 2nd.

Facts and Comments

A FRIEND and reader of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD writes to us from a large Western city protesting against the action of the manager of a motion picture theater in exhibiting a war film said to be strongly partisan and to constitute a violation of the spirit of President Wilson's proclamation of neutrality. The President's proclamation is a thoroughly sensible and statesmanlike document and has, we are sure, the hearty approval of every American. The exhibition of war films glorifying one nation at the expense of another is altogether objectionable. From our own observation we are able to state that exhibitors have been very careful in their selection of war films and have aimed to be neutral and to give a fair and impartial exhibition. We earnestly hope that this policy will continue and that the case mentioned by our correspondent is the exception which proves the rule. The warning of the National Board of Censorship against displays of feelings and demonstrations during the exhibition of war pictures is well timed and will, we earnestly hope, be heeded by all to whom it has been addressed. It ought to govern the policy of all the branches of the industry. We hope that no producer or importer will become responsible for any picture which is likely to strain the just sense of neutrality.

IN ANOTHER part of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD we print an interesting article about an attempted new departure in posters. The subject of posters is always of vital interest to exhibitors, and any effort to improve either their artistic or moral standard is deserving of unqualified support. Some of the posters the public is called upon to endure in these days well deserve the caustic criticism that "they are trying to show above all things that the heroine has blue eyes and manicured fingernails and is dressed in a wonderful and terrible costume." Many of these posters might be collected in one gorgeous edition and republished under the title of "The Lithographer's Dreams and Temptations." Posters of course were made to attract and to speak loudly, but that is no reason why they should be devoid of every trace of art and imagination. Practical exhibitors, to be sure, want lively paper, but it is quite possible to furnish lively paper without outraging taste and common decency. The men interested in effective paper with "pulling power" will follow the new departure with close attention. The room for improvement is vast.

A NEWSPAPER in Denver devotes a somewhat frenzied editorial to a protest against raising the price of admission in that city to a figure above five cents. The article states that "a man has come into Denver" for the fell and treasonable purpose of raising the prices of admission to the picture shows from five to ten cents. The agitator is advised to give up the attempt because, in the editor's opinion, "it can't be done." The editor adds this edict: "Five cents is the price of the 'movies' in Denver, and in the interest of the people the editor of the —— feels that five cents it must remain." This edict seems to be based on the mere will of the editor, who with far more boldness than discretion constitutes himself the champion of the people. It is a decided novelty to have the press of a city regulate the prices of admission to motion picture theaters. Suppose we film men were to try to tell the newspapers how much they ought to charge for their advertising space. We would be told to mind our own business. We do not know what kind of an editor our friend is, but we doubt whether he knows much about the motion picture industry. Does he know that all over the world people are paying higher prices of admission to motion picture theaters? In New York the number of "nickelodeons" has gone down appreciably, while the better sort of motion picture theaters are constantly on the increase, asking and receiving as high as a dollar for a good seat the right distance from the screen. This news may harrow up the soul of our journalistic friend, freeze his young blood, etc., etc., but it is true. The one sad thing about this impertinent meddling with motion picture theaters is the effect it has on ambitious and progressive men who are anxious to lift the motion picture entertainment to the highest possible plane. The subscriber who sent us the editorial in the Denver paper says that he had "just sold a very nice little suburban house that made a little money but would have made more if exhibitors were organized." He says further that he is going to a place where the local newspapers refrain from fighting the exhibitors on the question of the price of admission. If there is any glory in being the cheapest town in the country, Denver is welcome to it.

Worse Than Ignorance

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

AMERICANS do not participate in any of the motives actuating European nations now at war. There is not a flicker of hatred in our hearts but only sympathy for those of broken homes and blighted lives. What we do feel is that a rule of arbitrary power is not in accord with our own conceptions of civilization and common happiness. If culture, kindness of heart, and world-wide intermingling of sentiment are to be replaced by the arrogant intolerance of brute force, this is injurious to our higher ideals, obstructive to all we have been striving for, a defiance of our system of government. If Germans, even those dealing with us, are astonished at our attitude, it is because they do not understand our people and have but a dim idea of how this nation came into existence.

They could be very simply enlightened through moving pictures. It could easily be shown that there were great men associated with the formative period of our national existence, men who were typified in Washington, though they presented a diversity of character. They were men of sound judgment, men of quiet dignity, men of firm purpose, men of keen sensibilities and strong passions, yet big enough to lay aside personal feelings, to sacrifice material interests for the greater good of the greater number. These men of high standards, gentlemen in the finest sense of the word, shaped the political and social system that started our country on its mighty way to the forefront of all nations, yet how little of this is shown in visualizations of historical times!

I have severely criticised pictures which belittle these men, which show them as unimportant factors, merely contributing to the advancement of a hero and heroine who are to embrace at the end of a story. Those who know better are not affected, but we have an uninformed population among us, to whom any historical play should be presented in truthful aspect. Particularly is this true in representations of men whose individual achievements and united intelligence made our civilization possible. There were several millions of Americans of American parentage in this country when its present form of government was adopted some six generations ago, and Carnegie has estimated that their descendants number about seventy millions, yet many of our three million people of German birth and direct origin assert that there are no "Americans," that there is no such thing as "an American."

This is not due to total ignorance, but to superficial knowledge of our people and their history. These Germans come to our shores in quest of better conditions than they have enjoyed at home and find so many from other countries doing the same thing that they are led in the beginning to draw unsound inferences which are subsequently fostered by lack of right information. We are, in truth, somewhat indifferent as to what they think, but that is no reason why moving pictures should falsely present historical conditions. It is worth any producer's while to grasp and visualize the truth of Revolutionary episodes for the sake of an added educational value to a story. These pictures are operating to build character. When they arouse the right sort of feelings by adhering to truth of visualization, they become a factor in building up national character.

An enormous number of war pictures have been shown on this side of the Atlantic, and most of them have been beneficial in depicting the horror of war, exhibiting it as a force purely destructive as a rule, hence they have been crystallizing in our minds an idea that we can only develop our best plans in times of peace. They have helped to make us peace-loving. If thousands of such pictures had been shown in Germany, for a long number of years, we might have recently witnessed a revolt of intelligent Germans against territorial acquisition from intelligent neighbors by sheer preponderance of numbers and brute force.

I cannot conceive of any finer mission of moving pictures than that of disseminating the truth. The tremendous error now being made in the Old World has grown out of primitive resistance to enlightenment. It is almost inconceivable that this or that family should be permitted to hold authority on self-assured "divine right." Where political liberty has not been achieved, where people are living under a stupendous system of organized murder and robbery, it is obvious that error rather than truth has been disseminated and fostered. Human liberty has been the darling of all brave and intelligent men, but the splendid opportunities of freedom and education are but imperfectly understood by those who need them most, those who are now straining at the fetters of tradition, hence there has only been lacking a medium to reach the aspiring of all nations and moving pictures seem to provide that medium.

What one of us may say to another on the question of natural rights is rarely well expressed and may be discredited. What is said in print reaches only a limited number. What is well put forth in moving pictures reaches out to all parts of the earth. What a splendid opportunity to bring men and women all over the world into a common faith and a common understanding of what we should accomplish as individuals and as social bodies! H. G. Wells said some ten years ago, in speaking of mankind's struggle to win a permanent civilization, "If they had only understood one another all this bloodshed, all this crash, disaster, and waste of generations could have been avoided. It is upon the broadening and increase of the flow of ideas that our hope depends."

"At present," he continues in 1903, "the stream of thought and common understanding is not nearly as wide and deep as it might conceivably become, as it must become if this present civilization is to be more than another false start. For the lack of a sufficient literature a number of new social types are developing, ignorant of each other, ignorant almost of themselves, full of mutual suspicions and mutual misunderstandings, narrow, limited and dangerously incapable of intelligent collective action in the face of crises. It is absolutely necessary to the progress of our civilization that these isolations should be overcome. The only thing that can put the mass of intelligent men upon a common basis of understanding is an abundant and almost universally influential contemporary literature."

It is strange that so wise a prophet should have not foreseen that the visualization of thought supplies a medium superior to language because it can become universally influential. In speculating upon possibilities and means of raising the average human result, this man who predicted almost exactly what is happening, overlooked what has found its own way to the sympathy and understanding of millions. The new art has spread beyond national boundaries, has scaled mountains of tradition, is as free as the aeroplane. Ours to make it effective.

Opportunity

By W. Stephen Bush.

NEVER before in the history of motion pictures have conditions in the international film market been more favorable for American producers than at this time. To appreciate the opportunities which are now offering themselves to our manufacturers a short review of conditions abroad will be enlightening.

The countries of Europe which have contributed the greater share to the world's film market are Italy, France, Germany and England, probably much in the order named. Of these countries all are at war except Italy, which seems to be trembling on the fatal edge. While it is true that Italy with its twenty-two large and small producers is at the present writing still maintaining a precarious neutrality, conditions in that kingdom are bad as far as the production of films is concerned. From friends who have but recently arrived from Genoa and Naples we learn that mobilization is going forward with increasing speed and that factories are closing every day. At any moment the call to arms may be sounded, and, while the people are in an almost hysterical state of excitement and the government is uncertain about its next step, industries are paralyzed. The production of films in France and Germany has come to a practical standstill. England has not so far felt the evils of militarism and compulsory conscription, but if the war continues for even a few months the drain upon the country in men will tell, and the motion picture industry will be affected as much as other industries. Russia has no producers, while the manufacturers of Austria are negligible both in regard to quantity and quality. Among the neutral countries, Spain, Portugal and Holland may be left out of the reckoning entirely, while Denmark and Sweden have never produced more than a small percentage of the world's film market.

Under the circumstances it is entirely reasonable to assume that the production of motion pictures in England and the continent of Europe will be practically suspended or at the very least greatly reduced. At the present moment of course the exhibition of motion pictures has suffered tremendously and while Europe continues in the agonies of war the demand for films in the war-ridden countries will be small. A friend who arrived from Paris on Monday, himself a well-known film man, tells us that there are but two motion picture theaters running in Paris at the present time. With the recent successes of the allies there may have been a change for the better after our friend's departure from the French capital. The German press is appealing to the motion picture exhibitors to keep open as many of their theaters as possible. It deplores the wholesale closing of these theaters since the commencement of the war. Similar conditions no doubt prevail in Russia, Austria and in poor afflicted Belgium.

With the end of the war, whether peace come tomorrow or a year from tomorrow, the nations, exhausted and tired of battle, anxious to forget and eager to rebuild the industries which war has destroyed, will turn to the solace and pleasure of the film as they did in times of peace. There will be no supply of films to draw from.

Whether the country is a victorious one or whether it must be numbered among the vanquished it will have to look for its films without its borders. There is but one country which can offer the supply needed and that country is the U. S. A. The American film has never failed to prosper abroad whenever the distribution was in competent hands. In every country of Europe the American film was as well known as the Connecticut clock. Some of our producers, notably the Vitagraph, had achieved enviable successes in every part of Europe, but I know of no instance where other American brands failed whenever they were intelligently handled and distributed. To the European picture "fan" the American films always had the charm of variety. People abroad liked the swift action of our dramas, the unique humor of our good comedies and all pictures dealing with phases of characteristic American life. It has long been an axiom among the exchange men of Europe that American films were easy to sell and easy to rent. In many studios our producers make their pictures with an eye on the European market even today. Within the next year or so the demand for American films in Europe will be large enough to justify a greater "invasion" than Europe has ever known before. It is scarcely necessary to admonish our producers to make films that are internationally acceptable, for they are doing that very thing right now.

The real problem in Europe will be the problem of distribution. From my own observation and experience in Europe I can safely say that distribution or rather the lack of it has been the stumbling block in the extension of American film trade. Every country in Europe has peculiar conditions which require expert treatment. The prospective increased demand for American-made films will greatly smooth the way of distribution, but much remains to be done. It may be questioned, for instance, whether the distribution via London is in all cases the best. Whatever has been done up to now in extending the sale of the American film in Europe has been done via London. There is no doubt that more distributing stations on the continent will be needed in the future. Some countries in Europe have hardly been touched by the American film. I refer especially to Russia. A little more than a year ago a prominent Italian producer showed me by his books that he sold twenty-two copies of a well-known picture to Russia and only sixteen copies of the same subject to the United States. Russia some day will be among the important producing countries of the world, but at present it uses films made abroad exclusively. French, Italian and German films predominated.

I am mentioning Russia particularly because it is one of many rich fields for the American producer.

The neutrality which we have so wisely observed in this country will aid the sale of American films. The animosities which have led to so much bloodshed will not die out over night. The French film will find a hard road in Germany and vice versa until the bitterness of the conflict is forgotten.

While on the subject of the American film abroad let us not forget the great South American market. Barcelona and Paris have been the two principal sources of supply for the South American exhibitor. At present these two sources are almost dried up. We read in a Spanish contemporary that the call for films from the South-American republics is greater than ever, but that the demand cannot be supplied as formerly because of "the events of the war."

Opportunity is knocking at our door and we will have to be deaf, indeed, if we cannot hear, and lacking in enterprise if we will not heed. It will be necessary for us to give more attention than ever to the needs of the European and South American distributor, to study his business methods and deal with him as much as possible in his own language, and with due regard to his commercial peculiarities.

"The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch"

Famous Players Company Presents Henrietta Crosman in Mrs. Burton Harrison's Society Drama—Four-Part Offering with Distinguished Acting.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE object of this drama is to lay bare the human heart. Its central figure is a mother and the key it uses to open her experience to us is her abiding love for her daughter. One of the distinctly noticeable things about the picture is the vivid way it portrays to our eyes the changes that character, aided by time, makes on the human face. The three leading characters are first presented to us in what may be called their second youth and are re-introduced after a lapse of about eighteen years. It makes us realize not only the years, but much of the fates the years have held. The means it uses are wise make-up reinforced by control of facial nerves that only skilful and experienced artists could attain.

Scene from "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch" (Famous Players).

The central theme, which is mother-love, and which is brought out clearly by its being placed in a corner of the world unworthy of it, is broken, in the last act, by another theme, that of vengeance. A higher phase of this, the vengeance that character always takes in the heart of those who transgress, is seen splendidly at work all through. In the last act, the author has obtruded a lower phase of it and makes one of her lesser characters, for whom she has really asked our sympathy, act the part of cad just to make the two guilty people, a man and a woman who are already suffering, suffer more. This is, roughly speaking, not far from poetic justice and no doubt it was put in to make the drama popular. To many it will be the big "punch." But to those who look at life more justly, it will perhaps be a weakness. To such it will be the picture's only noticeable fault.

Good acting makes the picture rich in quietly attained mental suggestion that "gets over" into the emotions of the spectator. At all points of the action this flow of the emotions in the spectator is marked and is often lively. The object of the picture's author has been sufficiently reached all along the line; there is no break in the entertainment it gives from the opening scenes that introduce to us a family, Mr. and Mrs. Lorimer, to which a daughter has just come. The husband is already under the spell of another woman, Madge, and he has a man "friend" who uses every means to attract the wife. This man makes the state of the husband's mind so plain to her, at the same time offering his love, that she writes a letter to her husband saying that she is going away with the friend; but she repents on thinking of her child. Lorimer is relentless and gets a divorce with the custody of the child, then marries Madge. Mrs. Lorimer that was takes the name of Hatch and moves to San Francisco. She keeps her love for her daughter through all the years that have wronged and embittered her. The baby has grown up to be a charming young woman, Gladys, whose engagement to Jack Adrian is announced in the papers. Mrs. Hatch comes east to get a glimpse of her daughter, but is refused by Lorimer even to see her except at a distance. An old nurse, still in the family, gets her into the house on the wedding day as a seamstress who brings the wedding gown. Left alone, she sees a picture of Gladys and attempts to steal it, but is seen by a detective. This brings Lorimer, Madge, Gladys and her lover Jack on the scene and Gladys finds out the whole story. It happens that a friend of Jack's who has known Mrs. Hatch in the west and who loves her, is also present. Later, for revenge, he makes love to Madge, the second Mrs. Lorimer, who has been far from happy with Lorimer. She falls into the trap; writes a letter to her husband just as did the first Mrs. Lorimer, and goes to this man, Harry Brown, but is shown the door by him. Lorimer treats her just as he did the first wife. After the honeymoon, Gladys comes back to her mother.

ROTHACKER NOT INTERESTED.

Watterson R. Rothacker, general manager of the Industrial Motion Picture Company of Chicago, Ill., writes the Moving Picture World with emphasis, to say that he is not interested in the movement to organize the ad-film men which was launched at Brighton Beach, N. Y., recently. Mr. Rothacker says that his appointment on one of the committees of the organization was made after the meeting had adjourned and that he has since advised Mr. Smallwood that he would not serve thereon. Mr. Rothacker says finally that while he is not opposed to the organization he feels that the time is not ripe for the movement and refuses to be identified with it.

MRS. BOISSEVAIN A SWEDE?

The Sociological Research Film Corporation, which Mrs. Eugene Boissevain sued for $1,000 legal fees in connection with the crusade against displaying the pictures called "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic," filed its answer to the suit yesterday. It contends that Mrs. Boissevain cannot sue for legal fees because she is not eligible to practice law in this State, being a native of Sweden, which she became when she married, as her husband is a Swede. The defendant asks that the suit be dismissed.

INVALUABLE TO THE WRITER.

Moving Picture World, New York City,

Gentlemen:—Enclosed herewith please find my check for $3.00 in payment of renewal of my subscription for one year.

While your publication is primarily intended for the benefit of the exhibitors and manufacturers, of course, it is invaluable to the writer, as well. You are certainly fortunate in having so thoroughly competent a department editor as Mr. Sargent—and long may he live!

With best wishes for the future of the paper, I remain very truly yours, E. R. COFFIN.

UNDER the direction of Richard H. Ridgely, this adaptation from "The Picaroon" by H. B. Marriot Watson is delightfully presented. There is an implied connection between fiction and the drama, but the construction of a novel is much closer to that of the screen form than to that of the stage. The photoplay does not illustrate—it visualizes the printed story. It is a unified narrative, not a sequence of three or four crucial scenes, hence it may be called fiction through a more direct medium than that of words, a short circuit to the mind. Ridgely has handled "On the Isle of Sarne" with fine artistic taste and, in this way, given it a faint old rose-leaf flavor of romance. It is either disappointing or amusing to an audience that so many stories start with the incident of forced matrimonial alliance. At one open-air performance this summer no less than three photodramas started that way. People giggled or yawned at the second and roared or hooted at the third. The main issue of "On The Isle of Sarne" may have seemed to be the arrangement for Countess Dorothea to wed Count Sigismund, but it was not. The adventure of Peter Seabrooke was the real line of interest.

Woman, because of her greater affections, is pre-eminently a social creature. The charm of home and family life are very largely of her creating and she is more attached by instinct to one place—nearly always to one man. Not so with man. He loves to roam. Freedom of movement is one of his most cherished ideals. Peter Seabrooke, handling his own sailing yachts, is a type. He is free to go where he lists, the world forgetting. He is enjoying the extreme of liberty in command of a small yacht on the open sea, when his food supply runs short through inattention of his steward.

He anchors off the Isle of Sarne and goes ashore in search of supplies. He lands at what turns out to be an estate and is given an extraordinary reception. It is obvious that he is mistaken for some one who is expected, and there would be a lot of mystery about his reception had it not been carefully divulged at the beginning. He is mistaken for Count Sigismund, who is to come in his yacht to court Dorothea. Seabrooke is not enough of a picaroon to permit this error to be shared by Dorothea when they meet. She quickly sees in the adventurous Seabrooke a possible factor in opposing the man chosen for her and Seabrooke is just the man to respond to an appeal for protection.

These two promptly fall in love, and their courtship is encouraged by those unware of the social corsair's identity. When the real Sigismund arrives in his yacht, he is treated as a pretender, harshly treated, until Dorothea's uncle arrives. Then the lovers flee and are last seen sailing away in each other's arms. Why Sigismund did not pursue the runaways in his steam yacht is left to conjecture.

The story contains much that is bright and refreshing; it is well handled, and the performers are beyond reproach. MacDermott is manly, Miss Nesbitt charming and Mrs. Bechtel as Dorothea's aunt is a delightful personage. She has an art all her own of giving strong characterization to any role she assumes. The settings are of Ridgely excellence—pleasing the eye with beauty and adding materially to the sum of values by their appropriateness. The play holds interest well because of these factors, and is assured of grateful reception.

MARY FULLER RETURNS FROM SHOHOLA.

Mary Fuller with her Victor Company, including Charles Ogle and Walter Edwin, has just returned to the Imp studio, New York, from Shohola, Pike County, Pa., where several big features were produced. Miss Fuller, with a splendid coat of tan and rejuvenated spirits, has many interesting experiences to tell and more interesting pictures to show. However, the following came from her director, Mr. Edwin:

"Just prior to returning we scheduled a particular day to do a spectacular scene with Miss Fuller doing some perilous work on a cliff. When the country side heard of this they turned out in droves; wagons and rigs and buggies and buckboards loaded down to the water's edge with neighbors and summer boarders came from a radius of twenty miles. Pedestrians and equestrians, children and grown-ups coming, augmenting the crowd until there was no background visible to the photographer. After succeeding in clearing enough country and mountain to "take," Miss Fuller took up her position on the top of the cliff, preparatory to making the spectacular descent. The property men climbed down and out of sight. Miss Fuller having stated that she did not wish to rehearse same, the camera started. When half way down Miss Fuller lost her hold and slipped about ten feet. The crowd, already breathless with excitement, gave an audible gasp. But Miss Fuller having caught herself on a little ledge, shouted to the cameraman to keep on turning. Scratched, torn and dusty, she at last reached the foot of the cliff to the relief of the spectators, many of whom asked and received permission to take snapshots.

When the scene was over Miss Fuller and the camera packed up and off in the auto, spectators were still arriving with their lunch and though disappointed at not witnessing the scene taken, they exclaimed with satisfaction: "Well, we saw HER anyway."

A SCENARIO IN JIGTIME.

If the ability to take advantage of the unexpected is one of the requisites of a good film producer, then all hats off to Al Christie of the Nestor comedy company. In the production of "All Aboard," the latest of his comedies, he has occasion to charter a train for a day. In that there is nothing startling, but before he had been half an hour out of the city, he found that the engineer was an old actor and that he was willing to appear again before the public. Mr. Christie re-read the script, but there was nothing in it that called for an engineer.

The opportunity was too good to lose, so he sat down on a cross-tie and rearranged the scenario to fit the emergency. The engineer was told what was expected of him, the crank on the camera was put in motion and the result is one of the best two-reel screams ever turned out under the Nestor trade mark.

"The Phantom Violin"

Universal Four-Part Special Picture by Grace Cunard and Produced by Francis Ford Tells a Strange, Unusual Story.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

LOVE of romance whose special properties are such things as a skeleton lying forgotten in some dark and ruined crypt or dungeon, and other goblin, creepy things, lives forever in the hearts of many people. It is a story with this kind of romance in it that is told by the special four-part Universal picture, "The Phantom violin." It reminds one of Poe, of Hoffman's "Weird Tales," and of Maupassant. Its authoress, Grace Cunard, and its producer, Francis Ford, play the leading roles in it. It offers us a marked feeling of suspense as to how it will eventually end and bolsters this with an interesting showing of human character and also with entertaining backgrounds.

One of these backgrounds is the room of a musical genius, just such a room as weird strains of violin music might come from to the ears of the girl living across the garden when the night was dark and lightning was flashing out of the sky. Another background is a cabaret, both that part of it which is always open to the public and also what is behind the scenes that to see one must have business there or be invited. The building of the cabaret was once a monastary; but that has been forgotten and under it is a region of darkness and goblin horror-dungeons where white bones lie asleep.

The action begins in a thunderstorm and closes with a tragic leap of a madman husband, with the wife who had wronged him in his arms, down a horrible pit in the crypt under the cabaret. The story is set in some city in France and the producer has been careful to keep little things in it true to this intention from the start. We heard someone ask whether the picture was made in America. It was made here; but it looks very French.

A young girl (Grace Cunard), wakened by a thunderstorm, hears the strains of a violin coming from the house across the garden. Next morning she investigates and by accident is caught by the musician. This is the beginning of an acquaintance that soon ripens into love. The musician plays at a cabaret and after the two have been married, the wife one night gets one of his friends to take her there. Soon she is a regular attendant and even plays her husband's music to add to the entertainment of the place. But she flirts with the friend. The husband finds this out and attempts to jump ino the Seine; but, hindered by the police, goes back to the cabaret and in his madness finds a secret door leading to the old and forgotten crypt. There he lives for some time among the white bones.

The woman also tires of her new lover and takes a third. She plays one of her husband's pieces on the stage of the cabaret, but willfully burlesques it. Down in the darkness, he hears it and, ragged and unkempt, comes forth. The man for whom she deserted him is the first victim he siezes on. But after a time he sets the place on fire and also carries off the woman, taking her down into the crypt and finally leaping with her into the deepest hole of the lower regions of the place. The effect is decidedly sensational and wierd. It is an unusual offering and will be, we have no doubt, quite acceptable and pleasing to the average patron.

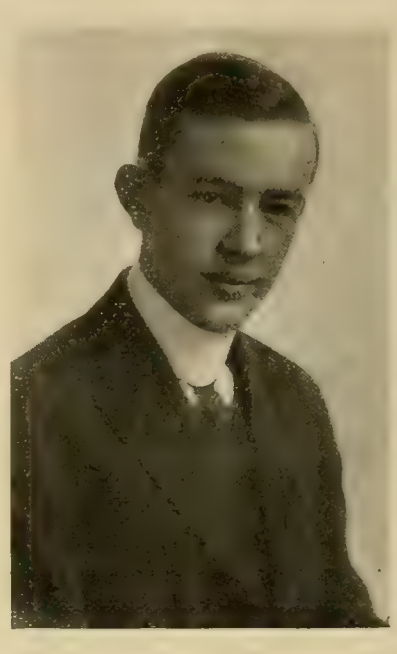
"Growing Up With the Movies"

Is Title of Book Being Written About Florence Lawrence, Who Was First Motion Picture Favorite in the United States.

FLORENCE LAWRENCE—"The Maude Adams of the photoplay"—is to be immortalized, for Monte M. Katterjohn has just announced that he is busily engaged in the writing of a book which chronicles the authentic and romantic events in the life of the delightful little star of Victor photoplays.

"Growing Up with the Movies" is given as the title of the book-length article, but the author apologizes for the same by claiming that his original title was "Growing Up with the World's Newest Art."

"Few people, even in the busy production realm of the film play," says Katterjohn, "know that Miss Lawrence has enjoyed the most remarkable experiences within the wish of any motion picture actress, for she is the only picture star of today who has been continuously before the motion picture camera since the photoplay stepped out of the novelty class. Miss Lawrence was acting in motion pictures long before she became associated with David W. Griffith's famous Biograph Company, and where she appeared with Arthur Johnson, Mack Sennett, Mary Pickford, Billy Quirk, Marion Leonard and the many others who made up that famous company of players."



Monte Katterjohn.

Followers of the silent drama will recall the days of "The Biograph Girl" and next, her advent into Imp pictures. Later Miss Lawrence became a Lubin player, where she played opposite Arthur Johnson. Then she established the Victor Film Company, which later became a property of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, and has headed her own company of players ever since.

Prior to the publication of "Growing Up with the Movies" in book form it will be published as a serial by "The Photoplay Magazine," the first installment appearing in the November number. Each installment will be profusely illustrated with photographs never before published in any magazine, and from "stills" furnished by the various companies with whom Miss Lawrence has been associated. These same illustrations will also appear in the book when published.

Monte M. Katterjohn, the author, is a well known scenario writer, and was formerly in charge of the Universal Company's Eastern scenario department. While associated with that company he learned of the facts of the motion picture and studio life of Miss Lawrence and resigned his position that he might devote his whole time to the writing of an authentic book on the life of the little movie prima donna.

SCREEN CLUB BUYS COTTON.

Following the splendid example set by the President of the United States, the Screen Club has arranged for the purchase of one of the bales of cotton piled up in the South because of the war.

The banner cotton crop, coming as it does at a time when the foreign markets are demoralized, has tied up capital in the South in a manner that threatens great hardship. President Wilson recently bought several bales of cotton, thereby setting an example well worthy of serious consideration.

At a special meeting of the Board of Governors of the Screen Club on September 9, Treasurer Jake Gerhardt was authorized to buy a bale of cotton for the club, which has a large Southern membership.

Of course cotton is a good investment and the bale will undoubtedly sell at a profit when the market again becomes active. Any money realized upon the investment, which is altogether an act of charity, will be placed at the disposal of the relief committee.

"The Tenth Commandment"

Strong and Fresh Handling of This Limitless Theme by William Blaisdell, Well Interpreted by Imp Players, Makes Desirable Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is probably no theme by which an author can show how deeply and clearly into human life his vision goes than this—the coveting of one's neighbor's wife. Sanity and wholesome commonsense characterize the handling of this theme in this picture, the script of which has been written by William Blaisdell, and which Herbert Brenon has produced with the good help of the best Imp players, which in itself means much. It is a three-reel offering; it tells its story logically and clearly; it has vigorously imagined and truthfully acted emotional climaxes; and, best of all, there is a quality of realism in it that sets its characters out as actual men and women and not manikins.

Scene from "The Tenth Commandment" (Imp).

Whenever any picture persuades the spectator that what it shows is actual, that is, truly human, it is sure that author, producer and players have made themselves into a unit for the work in hand—team work is needed. There is good evidence of team work here. There is a masculinely truthful boldness in the scenario that calls in one or two places for incidents that in producing hands not masculine, healthy and courageous would have been spoiled. It is a picture that necessarily treats of a kind of evil that, if it is to be shown in a healthy way, must be shown truthfully and courageously. It has treated this evil in just this way and the offering is, in consequence, one that the wisest and best among spectators will be sure to commend. It is not a murder story; but tells of things quite like what sometimes happen to one's acquaintances.

Four strongly contrasted individuals find themselves entangled in the dramatic situation which the picture exploits. One of these is a weak, unthinking, ill-controlled character and the three others are human beings in each of which we find enough sterling good to strongly attract us, the more as each has his or her moments of weakness showing that they are people just like ourselves. The central character is a doctor's wife—a role that is remarkably well played by Ruth Donnelly. Her picture of this woman is virile and nervous to a degree. When the story opens, this wife is perhaps not very well. She is snappy with her husband, the doctor, because he is so busy that he can give little attention to her. The doctor, as played by William Shay, is typically a man whose view of his profession is earnest, but who needs sympathy and is troubled by his wife's temper and unreasonableness. In his office is a nurse. As played by Violet Mersereau, she, too, takes her work seriously and is a good, strong woman, yet she is a woman, and is not insensible of the doctor with whom she works. The last character is one of those drifting, aimless men, self-pampered until he has lost power to understand anything but pleasure and lost power to see in others anything better than himself. He is an evil-minded fool. Polite in society, because he has to be, he is ready to unmask at any moment that he dare. This man is played by William Welsh, who, like all the others in the cast, does very commendable work in his part.

The fool gets an inkling of how things stand in the doctor's family and persuades the wife that the doctor loves the nurse and gets her to put a dictograph in his office. The wife has been behaving badly and the doctor tells his friend, the nurse, about it. He wishes his wife were more like her. The wife is at the other end of the dictograph and hears just enough. After writing a letter to her husband she lets the fool take her home to her mother's. They lose the last train and take separate rooms in a hotel. The fool creeps into her room, where he becomes most familiar. There's a fight and one of the liveliest and most convincing of this kind that we have seen. The woman fires him out of the room and then repacking her things escapes and walks to her mother's.

About five years have passed. The wife is living with her little girl at her mother's. The doctor is still at work. The nurse is still with him and their relations are as they have always been and nothing else. The wife's brother comes into a scene walking with the fool. She sees the two and tells her brother of her experience. The brother goes to the fool and tries to shoot him which, of course, is merely for the sake of the story. There is a struggle, the pistol goes off and the little girl, picking flowers in a meadow nearby is shot. The fool goes back to the hotel and in a very clearly acted scene full of strong character drawing shows us how such a man would feel about the accident. The wounded child is brought to the same hotel, which is at hand. The village doctor is away and a city doctor is sent for. It happens to be the woman's husband. He arrives with the nurse; meets the wife in the hotel and just at that moment the drunken fool comes out. The doctor misconstrues it all; but attends to the child. The drunken fool falls asleep smoking and sets fire to the hotel and then follows a set of stirring incidents that finally clear up the misunderstanding and bring an acceptable unraveling of the situation.

MADAME BLACHE MAKES WAR PICTURE.

The anxiety of Madame Alice Blache to take part in the war has resulted in a photodrama unique in the annals of motion pictures. Having many relatives and friends at the front, Madame Blache has been unable to think or talk anything but war since the opening of hostilities, therefore it was perfectly natural that a drama written and staged by her at this time should deal with the one subject that has been occupying her mind, and also that the plot should center in a woman's efforts to aid her country.

The story, staged under the working title of "Women of the Wars," is strikingly original and ends with the complete surrender of a scouting party to a woman who, aided only by her mother and little son, has succeeded in capturing the soldiers, not with firearms, but by the clever use of a few bottles of wine and a large amount of water.

VISITING IN NEW YORK.

Frank Montgomery, the motion picture magnate of Jacksonville, Fla., and other southern cities, spent Labor Day and several others in New York City. He made the Hotel Martinique his headquarters.

Guy W. Green, manager of the Nebraska Feature Company, of Lincoln, Neb., has been in New York for the past week selecting features for Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska and the Dakotas. He will handle all Walter MacNamara's productions for that territory.

Universal Publicity Staff.

Some Things You Don't Know About the Men Who Are Making "That Universal Program" Famous.

SENDING a man to London as European publicity representative may not appear to some as the most desirable way of rewarding him, in view of the conditions over there at the present time, but these very conditions have made it necessary for the Universal Film Manufacturing Company to have a European publicity representative right away, and a good one at that. And instead of having to call for volunteers, it was a case of careful selection and of choosing the right man. In George U. Stevenson, who has for the past year been editor of the Universal Weekly, and part of the time in charge of the publicity of the company as well, the Universal feels that it has made a wise choice, and one which will reward them with the results they are looking for.

Mr. Stevenson sailed on Sept. 16, and his promotion is the cause of several changes in the publicity department of the Universal. Mr. Stevenson's place as editor of the Universal Weekly will be taken by Paul Gulick, a newspaper man of wide experience who has been connected with the company on several occasions in special capacities. He will be assisted by Harvey Harris Gates, who was also Mr. Stevenson's associate.

Robert H. Cochrane.

The general supervision of the publicity and advertising departments will remain under the watchful and experienced eye of Robert H. Cochrane, secretary and treasurer of the Universal Film Company. In fact, the department owes itself to him and is, in a way, a creature of his fertile brain. He not only did the first advertising and publicity for the company, but he did the advertising for Mr. Laemmle in Oshkosh before the head of the Universal ever thought of making a business of manufacturing and marketing films.

After Mr. Cochrane graduated from the high school in Toledo, Ohio, as president and head of his class, he went to the Toledo Bee, as a cub reporter. So well adapted was he to the newspaper game that within two years he was managing editor of the paper and in well-earned enjoyment of the title of "the old man." At the time he was the youngest managing editor in the country and in Toledo he had the reputation of being one of the best. From Toledo, Mr. Cochrane went to Chicago, where he entered the advertising business with his brothers, Witt K. and Phil D. Cochrane. It was during this time that Mr. Laemmle and Mr. Cochrane met. Mr. Laemmle, in the clothing business in Oshkosh, needed attractive advertisements written. That was Mr. Cochrane's specialty and the advertisements that he wrote for Mr. Laemmle were so successful that he remembered them when he entered the film business a short time later. It was, naturally, to the man who had helped him so much before that he turned then.

As Mr. Cochrane wrote ads for the movies he became intensely interested in the new business and he threw his whole soul into it. The ads made Chicago sit up and take notice and made the Imp Company one of the best known moving picture concerns in the world. It was but a step more for him to acquire a financial interest in Mr. Laemmle's film ventures and it was not very long after that that Mr. Cochrane sold out his interest in the advertising business and came to New York as the secretary and treasurer of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. Ever since that time he has exercised a wonderful influence on the publicity and advertising of the Universal, an influence which has been felt much further than the majority of people suppose, for Mr. Cochrane is a very modest man and one very seldom sees his name in print.

Mr. Cochrane has never lost the "newspaper angle," and his imagination and originality have had a lot to do with the big place which the Universal now holds. He is a hard worker and one who works at 100 per cent. efficiency. And this, combined with his reputation for standing by his word at all costs, has marked the general director of the publicity and advertising of the Universal as one of the big men in the business.

Joe Brandt.

Joe Brandt, whose middle is "Convention" or "Serial," according to the angle from which his busy life is viewed, has been with the Universal from the start and has been the principal channel of outlet for the amazing amount of news which the company is making all the time. If there is an exhibitor, exchangeman or a manufacturer of films who does not know Joe Brandt, this Universal live wire is ready at a moment's notice to jump on a train and become acquainted.

Mr. Brandt received a singularly fitting education for the postion he holds and for future usefulness to the Universal. He was educated to become a lawyer and took his degrees at the College of the City of New York. But even before he received the coveted "LLB." he had begun his newspaper career. And as soon as he hung up his shingle he was forced to choose between the active life of a reporter on the Evening World and the uninteresting process of waiting for clients.

Joe chose the busy life and has pursued it with avidity ever since. As reporting was not remunerative enough, he went after the advertising end, and gained much useful experience and knowledge of space values and mediums from his connection with the Hampton Advertising Agency. He next became manager of the New York office of The Billboard, then advertising manager of the Dramatic Mirror.

Mr. Brandt was one of the first newspaper men who realized the importance of motion pictures in advertising and he gave the first stimulus to many of the film companies which induced them to increase their sales through advertising in the theatrical trade papers and later in a wider appeal through newspaper and magazine advertising. In the course of this work he made a great many fast friends who respected him for his own work and the clearness of his foresight into the possibilities of broadening the business by a wider appeal. His work drew him to the notice of Carl Laemmle, and he soon associated himself with the man who is now the president of the Universal, as his private secretary.

When the Universal was formed Mr. Brandt was made advertising manager of that corporation, and his duties have been broadening ever since. When he assumed editorship of the "Universal Weekly" he instituted a campaign of publicity in connection with the convention of the exhibitors which was not only a big thing for the Universal Program, but added thousands of exhibitors to Mr. Brandt's remarkable list of friends in the trade. No convention was complete without Joe, and his ingenious advertising schemes brightened up every convention which he attended.

Last year he was sent to London to boost the Universal Program in Europe. His task there was no bed of roses, for he had never been brought up to the idea of the afternoon-tea-in-the-office life, and the tranquil course of business there galled his restless spirit, but the results of his stay are apparent to all and the publicity which he gave Universal pictures in Europe has had a guiding influence on the European business of the company ever since.

"Lucille Love" called Mr. Brandt back from Europe, and he fell with his accustomed vigor upon the syndicate idea and formed a combination of newspapers which made the "Girl of Mystery" famous from coast to coast. He continued his success with the "Trey o' Hearts" serial and in this way has had a very determining influence on the course of moving picture publicity in the newspapers of this country. Just at present he is engaged in procuring for the Universal as many of the well-known writers of fiction as can be induced to write for the movies.

George U. Stevenson.

George Urie Stevension, who has just left the position of managing editor of the "Universal Weekly" to assume the direction of the publicity of the Trans-Atlantic Film Company in Europe, has been associated with the Universal Film Manufacturing Company for the past year and a half. His intense zeal for the interests of the Universal, and his unswerving loyalty to the company, have caused his associates and his fellow members of the Screen Club to bestow upon him the soubriquet, "George Universal Stevenson."

Mr. Stevenson's first work with the Universal was as associate editor with Joe Brandt, the originator of the "Weekly." Upon Mr. Brandt's departure for Europe, Mr. Stevenson succeeded as director of publicity and managing editor of the publication. In this capacity he developed new channels of publicity, providing a full line of inexpensive electros of Universal stars for the exhibitor, and originating publicity props of various kinds that have widely increased the prestige of the films bearing the "U" brand.

Mr. Stevenson is well known in amusement and journalistic circles in New York and Chicago. For ten years he was owner and editor of the Chicago Weekly Amusement Guide and has been more recently advertising manager of the New York office of the Billboard and general manager of the Chicago office of the same publication. He is known as the author of several successful dramatic sketches and of quite a few works on theatrical subjects, including in collaboration with his kinsman, the late Adlai E. Stevenson, ex-Vice-President of the United States, a comprehensive "Historical Memoir of the Stevenson Family in America."

Two American mottoes, "Do it now," and "There's a reason," are living watch-words with Steve, and in pursuit of the former, he has been unsparing of the midnight oil. Conspicuously displayed above his desk is a quotation from Elbert Hubbard: "Responsibilities gravitate to the person who can shoulder them." It is this willingness to shoulder responsibilities that has caused him to be chosen for the European publicity post by the officers of the Universal during these troublous times abroad.

Paul Gulick.

Paul Gulick, who assumes the editorship of the Universal Weekly, and becomes the first assistant to Joe Brandt, is a well-trained newspaper man and publicity promoter. Almost directly upon his graduation from the University of Vermont he joined the editorial staff of the Journal of Commerce of New York City, and became successively exchange editor, maritime editor, and assistant night city editor. When the dramatic department of that conservative daily was organized, he was made music critic and assistant dramatic editor.

While engaged in this capacity, he entered into partnership with Philip Mindil in a publicity enterprise which was very highly regarded in every newspaper office in the United States, and gained a unique standing through representing such eminent clients as Sir Ernest Shackleton, Rear-Admiral Peary, Signor Zenatello, Signor Alessandro Bonci, Miss Ellen Terry, and the late Mme. Lillian Nordica. In this connection Mr. Gulick learned the requirements of a large number of newspapers and magazines on every conceivable topic, and gained an invaluable acquaintance and experience.

At various times he has written special articles for the New York Times and other metropolitan newspapers and magazines, and was for six months city editor and baseball editor of "Vanity Fair," just prior to its purchase by Conde Nast and its change from a general illustrated weekly to a woman's monthly magazine. He has done special work for the Universal at various times, and is no stranger to the moving picture business, or to the men who are prominent in the newspaper and advertising end of the industry.

Harvey H. Gates.

Harvey H. Gates, who is associate editor of the "Weekly," has now had a year of experience in the position, and has proven himself a very valuable and versatile assistant, not only in the duties which naturally fall to the lot of a feature writer of a magazine, but also in furthering the interests of the publicity department in general. He was secured from the Dramatic Mirror, where he made the study of the photoplay as well as the drama from every angle. This equipment has helped him in a decided degree in his work for the Universal, and it has fitted him to write scenarios, quite a few of which have been produced by different companies. Mr. Gates has also aspired to write melodrama, and has a three-act play now under consideration by a prominent manager in New York City.

Born in the Hawaiian Islands some twenty-six years ago, Mr. Gates has had the unique experience of having visited every state of the Union. He has traveled very extensively abroad, and derived thereby a cosmopolitan outlook on life and letters which will stand him in increasingly good stead. He was brought up in Salt Lake City, and entered the newspaper profession almost as soon as he was graduated from school. Part of his fitting was derived abroad and his active service took place there, and in the west as well as in New York City.

BERNSTEIN WRITES PHOTOPLAY.

It is extremely doubtful whether the theater-going public has ever had a chance to witness so keen a portrayal of human emotions as they will have with the release of the latest of Charles Giblyn's masterpieces, "Foundlings of Father Time," written especially for the cast of General Manager Isadore Bernstein of the West Coast studios.

In connection with the production it is an interesting fact that both Murdock MacQuarrie and "Mother" Benson, who work in the lead roles, are able to shed real tears when they are necessary, a thing of which but few of the ablest actors are capable.

"THE BELOVED ADVENTURER" IN BOOK FORM.

For the first time in the history of the film business a story in book form is issued simultaneously with the release of its screened original. Emmett Campbell Hall, scenario writer on the Lubin staff, has published as a novel "The Beloved Adventurer," the serial subject in which Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe are being featured by the Lubin Company. The book contains 155 pages. There are seventeen illustrations of scenes from the play as well as of the players. Exhibitors will be enabled to furnish it to their patrons at a reasonable price. "The Beloved Adventurer" will be released in single reels for a period of fifteen weeks.

PHILIP LONERGAN, the author, and Carroll Fleming, the director, are to be congratulated on the story which they have built around events connected with the races of the National Amateur Rowing Regatta, which took place recently near Philadelphia. The pictures of the actual races that were obtained would, if issued by themselves as an educational, have made a remarkably noteworthy release of historic and athletic value; but author and director have so skillfully interwoven these with such a simple, natural, clean story of university life, that they may well be proud of the combination of heart interest, suspense and thrill that they have achieved. It is really a big three-reel story, and the cutting it down to two reels has marred the effect somewhat by jamming the action in the earlier scenes and necessitating the employment of one or two otherwise needless leaders.

Scene from "The Varsity Race" (Thanhouser).

Scene from "The Varsity Race" (Thanhouser).

But in one respect the picture is most decidedly refreshing and unique. Not only have the actors entered into the idea and spirit of the author and director with marked intelligence and capability but they have actually reproduced the university atmosphere, and look and act like genuine personages of real university life. As a rule, college pictures are not a success because the students almost invariably look like what they are, men dressed up as and trying to act like boys; but the present instance is a very gratifying exception to the rule. Even the actor "varsity team," when it is lined up, as it is in a couple of pictures, alongside of the genuine teams, looks natural, an effect made possible by the fact that Thanhouser has a real crew of its own, composed of members of the studio force, that went down to Philadelphia and put in a couple of weeks of good hard work, training with the regatta entries.

The plot of the story is simple and virile and is told naturally and directly, and at only one point is it unconvincing and illogical. This is when Ruth goes to Bob's boarding house and persuades the landlady to let her ransack Bob's room for evidence. She finds the notes Bob had made and straightway takes them to the faculty. This seems unnecessary and is improbable. Bob's name was on the reverse of his fraternity pin. That was why Ruth recognized it. Its being found in the study was sufficient evidence to reopen Jack's case, and any of half a dozen much more natural ways than the one employed could have been invented to get hold of the notes.

Bob is brought before the faculty, forced to admit his guilt, and Ruth, with the permission of the faculty, telephones Jack to hurry back to the university and take his part in the race. A little more skillful handling of the story just here would have avoided the sinking of interest that comes with Jack's vindication. The story is an excellent example of a double climax, but the two climaxes do not dovetail together smoothly enough. The two interests follow each other instead of intermingling with the first interest—Jack's vindication—being made subordinate to the second—the racing end. It would have been better to have cut out the faculty scene and told the story thus: Ruth finds the pin, takes it, not to the faculty, but to the crew captain and varsity coach. They force a confession from Bob, take him to the president and get the latter's permission to send for Jack. By interspersing this with cut backs emphasizing the approaching race and the despair and gloom of the Garfordites because their crew was out of it—they knew nothing as yet of Jack's vindication—the suspense could have been kept up unremittingly and smoothly, increasing in intensity as Jack misses his train, commandeers first an auto by the roadside, which breaks down, then the speed boat of a Garford alumnus, takes his place in the shell, wins the race and gets his ovation from the wondering and elated crowd who scarcely realize what has happened until it is all over.

Nettie Noges

NETTIE NOGES, who has just signed a contract with David Horsley to appear in Centaur comedies, is one of the most famous actresses in Russia. The first play in which Miss Noges ever appeared was Ibsen's "Pillars of Society." She was not quite fifteen at that time and appeared as Olaf, a little boy.

Nettie Noges.

In her second season with that company, Miss Noges was promoted to more important parts in such plays as Sudermann's "Magda" and "Fires of St. John," and Strindberg's "Father." In the "Fires of St. John" Miss Noges scored her first great hit, which resulted in her being chosen as the leading woman for the Theatre Eathonia, where she immediately starred in the "Pillars of Society."

Since that time she has starred in many important parts in German and Scandinavian plays. At the end of her third season at the Eathonia, Miss Noges was engaged by the Traganow Film Company of Petrograd, to appear in motion pictures in the parts in which she had achieved such great success. Miss Noges remained with that motion picture company for three years, after which she came to America.

"Broken Nose Bailey"

Two-Reel Reliance Melodrama of Underworld Adventure—Some Real Detective Work Shown.

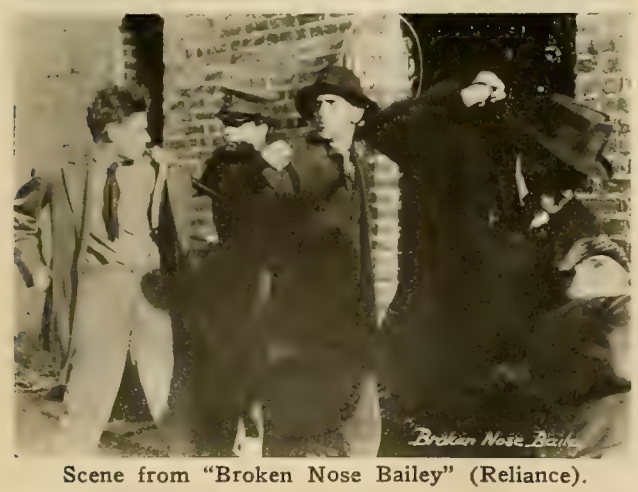
Broken Nose Bailey.....Eugene Paliette
Detective Barton.....Sam De Grasse
The Girl.....Francelia Billington

IN spite of its unattractive title and apparently limited cast, "Broken Nose Bailey" has a ring of truth about it that is far removed from the conventional presentation of yeggs and yegg catchers in stage plays and detective stories, and there are many characters besides those enumerated by the Modest Mutual Publicity Bureau. As the stage has clung to the conventional, giving audiences small opportunity to see interesting phases of life in true physiognomy, it is up to motion-picture producers to take advantage of their medium's wider range, not only in atmosphere and detail, but in the variety and vigor of actuality. There is plenty of high color and vibration in the portrayal of what is actually happening in the eternal struggle of organized society against its destructive elements.

Scene from "Broken Nose Bailey" (Reliance).

"Broken Nose Bailey," the play, not the character, shows the operations of professional thieves with a frankness and accuracy that is permitted because of the lesson against crime involved. Opposed to the gang of plunderers are plain clothes men of ordinary type, not the dress-suit monstrosity with a pipe and a magnifying glass. We are a little bit weary of the infallible detective, who goes straight from a trivial clue to the arch criminal. It is too easy. The plain clothes men who get after "Broken Nose" take their lives in their hands and only get their man after a series of hand-to-hand fights.



Scene from "Broken Nose Bailey" (Reliance).

Broken Nose, as impersonated by Mr. Paliette, is a daring and ingenious crook. Detective Barton as interpreted by Mr. De Grasse, is a plucky and persistent detective. The pals of Broken Nose and the men operating in conjunction with Barton are all active factors in almost constant conflict to the inevitable end. All of these parts are well taken. There are two "gals," both capable actresses, but the detective's wife exhibits tremendous energy in her role. She has a pair of "piercing" dark eyes that outshine those of Mary Fuller, before Mary sailed away on the cloud of her dreams and forgot the terra firma where most of us, from necessity or choice, manage to keep both feet.

The principal weakness in such plays is a general one. The surface effects are produced often with sincerity of purpose, but the elusive causes behind the action escape directorial notice. Directors are usually quick to grasp the objective of a drama, even though they do not find the object, but the psychology will come when we have more playwrights who know how to write for screen production. A director accomplishes much in selecting and training a type—it takes a veritable author to let the audience know how that type occurred. In spite of its principal fault, however, "Broken Nose Bailey" will hold the average audience and add its quota of value to a varied program.

"Matty" in Pictures

The Peerless Pitcher Will Appear in a Universal Picture Serial. "Love and Baseball" the First.

CHRISTY MATHEWSON has arrived in filmdom, in a play specially written for him, around his life. That the Universal secured Christy Mathewson for a series of photoplays is only another evidence of what it can do, what it is doing for Universal exhibitors—Universal patrons. Baseball has long since established itself as the national game; there are millions who follow its destinies. And just so, there are untold millions who are acquainted with the name Mathewson and who follow his career upon the diamond studiously. Christy Mathewson has acquired more fame in the baseball world than any other player; he has established a reputation as the greatest pitcher the world has ever produced.

"Matty" in "Love and Baseball."

An important fact to keep in mind relative to this appearance of Mr. Mathewson, is this: after this notable series, which will run for one year, closes, the picture fan will never have another chance to see him on the screen. According to Mr. Mathewson's own statement, it will be his first and last venture in motion pictures. Every release—and they will appear every month—will be a gem of the kind. Some of the plots, and many of the incidents, will be drawn from Christy's own life; every picture will possess the tang of baseball, and yet every one will be a live, vivid, dramatic story complete in itself. In fact, the series is going to be one of the biggest treats offered the picturegoer in a long time and the Universal are assured it will be appreciated.

"Love and Baseball," in two reels and directed by Stuart Paton, is the title of the first play in the series. Stuart Paton, who has already won high distinction as an author of Universal plays, is the author and also the director of the play. Christy is in the role that was especially created for him. It shows Christy before he was a "Big Leaguer"—when he was a young country fellow fighting between his own ambition to follow up baseball and the desire of his sweetheart to enter her father's store as a bookkeeper. The situation developed is unique. At times the humor is keen only to be contrasted with a climax of gripping qualities. There are scenes showing Christy, such as have never been shown before on the screen, disclosing Christy on the diamond at the Polo Grounds, New York, pitching his team to success and batting out a home run. He followed his own inclinations and succeeded, in spite of all, in winning the girl.

A Picture Caught in the Making

Glimpses of Allan Dwan and His Players at Work on "The Dancing Girl" at Sebago Lake, Maine.

By Alexis J. Coleman.

NATIVES and summer sojourners at Sebago Lake, Maine, were afforded excellent chances to see movies in the making when, in August, Director Allen Dwan put members of the Famous Players Film Company through their paces before the camera in scenes of "The Dancing Girl." The picturesque resort affords abundant opportunities for background, and this was thoroughly appreciated by Florence Reed, who stipulated in her contract that some scenes of the film in which she plays the part of Drusilla Ives, coquette though Quakeress, should be staged at Sebago

Lake, where she and her husband, Malcolm Williams, spend their summers at their pretty cottage on Indian Island. Part of the reel was made with the island as a setting. Another considerable strip of the reel was taken at historic Frye's Leap, a high rock rising sheer out of the deep water, and from which eminence, tradition has it, a certain Captain Frye made a successful getaway from the Indians.

Fuller Mellish as "David Ives" and Loraine Huling as "Faith Ives" in Cottage Scene.

For the scene at the Quaker church a number of the villagers and summer visitors were impressed into service, and the staging of the scene drew a considerable crowd of their friends, who came by all manner of conveyance, automobile, surrey and wagon, as well as on foot—all to look on and see just how it was done, for this, so far as known, is the first occasion upon which Sebago Lake has had a chance to get itself into the films. Here, as at the scene staged at the cottage in the afternoon, the onlookers ranged themselves at a safe distance to the rear, while Mr. Dwan and his assistant, A. H. Rosson, posed the players and made them rehearse, before the camera trained by Operator Bruenning recorded the scenes. Fuller Mellish was the Quaker father, David Ives and his daughters, Drusilla and Faith, were respectively Miss Reed and Loraine Huling. Malcolm Williams was Major Harding, David Ives' friend, and John Christenton, the young Quaker, the beloved of Faith, was portrayed by William Russell. Director Dwan, hatless, coatless and with sleeves rolled up, posed, suggested, ordered, criticized—in short, directed with a big D (D for Direct, of course)—until he had things going to his liking, then: "Action! Camera! Picture!" and the scene was incorporated into the film.

Much of the other part of the film has been taken in England, but it all will be assembled for production this fall and winter in New York, probably at the Strand. As Miss Reed will be appearing in "The Yellow Ticket," as well, it is entirely probable that simultaneously with her appearance in that role her counterfeit presentment will be seen as Drusilla Ives. So her playtime in Maine was used to good advantage. The players generally enjoyed their trip to Maine, as also did Messrs. Murphy and Rothmayer, of the scenic staff, who aided in the settings. Eugene Ormonde figured in one of the episodes as the Duke and captain of a yacht, and one of the wits at the Sebago Lake doin's irreverently styled him "Willie off the pickle boat." Once or twice, on dull afternoons the party went out fishing in Cap'n Phil DeCormio's good launch Lena. And at Frye's Leap one morning, between scenes, Mr. Fuller Mellish borrowed a fish line and captured a pound black bass, which he carefully carried to the hotel and had served to him at dinner.

It is safe to say that all the Sebago Lake natives and summer visitors will be on the lookout for the "Dancing Girl" when it is put on.

Apfel Has a Patent

OSCAR APFEL, who, next month celebrates his first year as director with the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, will at the same time celebrate the securing of patent rights on a new "baby" spotlight which he recently applied for and which has been tried out by both Apfel and Cecil B. de Mille on the various Lasky productions and found to fill a long felt want.

Mr. Apfel, before casting his lot with the Lasky people, was for years one of Edison's trusted directors and was among the first to introduce dissolves and double exposures and in "The Corsican Brothers" innovated the effect of one man appearing on the screen in two different characters at the same time.

Oscar Apfel, Lasky Director, Taking Things Easy in His Den.

Mr. Apfel and Cecil B. de Mille worked together on Lasky's "The Squaw Man" and "Brewster's Millions," but since the demand for Lasky productions increased so that the firm arranged to produce two plays a month instead of one, as announced at the beginning, Mr. Apfel was set to work on "The Only Son," with De Mille doing "The Man On the Box."

Apfel is now working on "Where the Trail Divides" with Robert Edeson and at the completion of this feature will begin work on one of the Belasco plays.

One of the best liked of directors and capable to a fault, Apfel is signed for three years with Lasky and everything points to an even longer engagement, for all connected with that concern are deeply appreciative of his excellent work.

New Two-Part Kalem Handles Delicate Situation Without Offense—Revenge Spoiled Because Wronged Woman Doesn't Allow for Daughter's Clean Heart.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE chief point in this new two-part Kalem is the interesting contrast which different bringing-up makes on two half-sisters. One is illegitimate and her mother has had her brought up in a convent where the sisters have taught her humanity and kept her heart clean enough so that her judgment is unbiased and unselfish. The other, early left motherless, has been brought up by the worldly, selfish father. The woman whom this father had wronged has watched the child growing up and has envied the advantages denied her daughter by the same father. She never realizes that her child in the convent is the more fortunate of the two.

She has nursed thoughts of revenge and her chance comes when the society girl is beginning to go out alone among people, to card parties at fashionable homes and the like. There are evil people in society, and this woman, who is also, now and then, admitted among the "swell" set, gets a man of this kind to help her in her scheme. She gets the girl to a fashionable gaming house, gets her drunk and has the police raid the place. Everything works out just as she plans; but when she comes to the house of the man, with the purpose of showing how much better her daughter is than his on whom she has managed to fasten the stigma of dissipation, she fails. Her daughter brought up in the convent judges her justly, and decides against her, taking the part of the wronged and shamed society girl.

The picture is full of beautiful scenes. It was produced by George Melford, and shows the careful direction and artistic handling and, in large-part acting, that is one of the hall-marks of the Kalem output of which Kalem can be justly proud. Douglas Gerard plays the man in the case, hard-hearted and cold, a man who is not only accepted, but admired by his social set; yet is selfish and unsocial in the extreme. Marin Sais plays the role of the wronged woman. How it came that she gave herself so implicitly to such a man is left to the spectator's imagination. As the action opens she is already a mother out of wedlock and is living in the apartment that he has bought for her. But he is growing tired of her and is already very friendly with the society bud whom he is soon to marry. The breaking away from his paramour by the man is set forth in a group of well acted scenes. Then comes a group of scenes that quickly carry the action forward about eighteen years.

The society man's wife is dead and his daughter has grown up; the part is taken now by Cleo Ridgeley. The woman's daughter, brought up in a convent, is played by Elise Maison. Jane Wolfe plays the mother superior of the convent. After this follow scenes that set forth how the woman gets acquainted with the girl and begins to draw her into paths that are dangerous for the sake of her revenge. After the raid by the police, the bringing home to her father of the girl by the police sergeant makes a touching picture that rings true, more poignant even than the last scene, which is not so simple and doesn't get over so strongly.

As to the quality of the story, we can truthfully find much praise in it. But it lacks something of the liveliness noticeable in most of the recent Kalems. When compared with such offerings as "The Viper," a picture with no idea at all, it lacks punch. It is in part emotional but is more intellectual than emotional. There is a substantial idea in it and it is a good wholesome idea. The author of the scenario is Mrs. Owen Bronson.

"Beasts of the Jungle"

A Two-Part Educational and Scenic Feature of the Highest Quality by the Supreme Features Corporation.

Reviewed by T. A. Church.

IT is very seldom that the opportunity is presented of witnessing the exhibition of a picture that has the quality, snap and punches found in this feature. Practically every scene has been taken within twenty feet of the camera and many as close as ten feet. The photography throughout is of the highest order and certainly is the work of an experienced cameraman. In these days when exhibitors are complaining bitterly of the unnecessary amount of padding that the manufacturers are crowding into their releases it is a relief to inspect a subject that really seems to be too short. There could easily have been several hundred feet added without causing interest to drag, and in its present two-reel length there is not an inch that could be consistently cut out.

Out of the forty-four different subjects contained in this production, it is very difficult to select the ones for special mention as every one is of interest. One of the greatest features is the presence of so many animals gathered from so many corners of the earth, with which so many of us are unfamiliar, either by sight or by name. The Nine-Banded Armadillo, while an inhabitant of our own United States, will surely prove a curiosity to theater patrons, and his bony armor and curious appearance will arouse many a hearty laugh. The Tasmanian Devil, while small bodily, is a giant in his own imagination, as he is absolutely untamable and will indiscriminately attack any animal, regardless of size. This lack of fear has proved detrimental to his breed, as the larger animals have slaughtered his kind until he is now almost extinct.

The Giant Salamander from Japan and China will show a kind of food that is sometimes resorted to in those far-off lands. The Albino monkey is a positive freak, and is the only one of his kind ever seen. A battle between two enormous alligators is a scene that may not be duplicated on a film in many years. The closing subject is of a Congo African, the lowest type of mankind, and a Chimpanzee, the highest type of the Simian and the third largest in size of the man-like apes. A picture such as this brings to our minds the theory presented by Darwin and we are forced to wonder if he was not right, as the animal exhibits an intelligence seemingly much greater than that of the man.

On the whole this is one of the strongest offerings of the kind that has ever been called to my attention and it will certainly hold the intense interest of any audience throughout. "Beasts of the Jungle" is undoubtedly good for return dates from many of the best theaters in the country.

IN MEMORY OF C. J. HITE.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the New York Motion Picture Corporation held on Sept. 10, 1914, the following statement was directed to be spread upon the minutes:

"The directors of New York Motion Picture Corporation have heard, with deep sorrow, of the death of their associate, Charles J. Hite, a man of strong purpose and broad outlook, with whom the appreciation of a problem meant its solution, eager for new operations and quick to seize them when they came, always a true and loyal friend, and fair and just in every relationship. The loss of his counsel will be long and deeply felt, and his memory will go with us through life as that of an upright, able, vigorous and kindly man."

BAGGOT FEATURED IN "THE MILL STREAM."

"The Silent Valley," a two-reel feature recently released and featuring King Baggot in a role ultra-rural, proved such a tremendous success and so diverting that the Imp Company has decided to release several other film dramas disclosing Mr. Baggot in the rough and ready.

"The Mill Stream," a two-reel feature, will be the next along this line. Most of the settings for the play are had at Smithtown, Long Island, where Mr. Baggot with his company has been motoring every sunny day for the past two weeks. It is a gripping drama of the elemental, showing this splendid actor in a role of original qualities. Charles Lessey is the director of the piece.

Hemment Brings African Scenes

New Pictures of the Wilds of the Darkest Continent Secured by the Pioneer of the Motion Camera.

FOR the past two years Mr. J. C. Hemment, the well-known author of the Paul J. Rainey African Hunt Pictures, has had an ingrowing desire to visit Africa on his own hook, believing his previous experience would enable him to get pictures which would not only be of vast value from an educational view-point, but would also be unique in the annals of wild life moving picture films.

It was only last October that Mr. Hemment was able to realize his desire, and after months spent in preparation he departed for the wilds of Africa from whence he has just emerged, bringing with him about 25,000 feet of film, a portion of which deals with wild animal life, notably a buffalo hunt, affording a far and near view of a herd of wild buffaloes, and a "hippo" film in which the hunting and killing of the hippopotamus is illustrated, including a final in which the natives cut steaks from the carcass, eating the meat raw, and washing it down with the warm blood of the freshly-killed mammal.

Mr. Hemment has secured several thousand feet of film illustrating tribal ceremonies, and ceremonies of the courts of the native Kabakas, which is African for Kings. Not satisfied with the foregoing achievements, Jack (to those who know him intimately Hemment is never "Hemment," but merely "Jack") has put into film the life story of the deadly Tse Tse fly, which annually takes toll of many thousands of African lives, and of late is threatening to actually depopulate the country unless checked.

Concerning these films Mr. Hemment says: "I have made pictures from Victoria Nyanza, visiting the large sleeping-sickness belt, running from Entebee, Luzira and Jinja, journeying down the Nile through Lake Kioga from Namagasali to Masindi, thence along 70 miles of forest road to Butiaba on the shores of the oldest lake in the world, Lake Albert. During that journey I made pictures of the clearing of roads for the purpose of beginning a campaign of extermination against this fly, and the working force included many victims of the deadly insect, which is known to science as the Glossina Palpalis. Those helping to do this work, in many cases, are victims who never expect to recover, for the life of a native bitten by the blood-sucking Tse Tse is limited from three to eighteen months. If he is treated he may last eighteen months or even two years, but very, very few of them live that long. This fly seems to attack everything with a vertebra, be it animal or human, and in some cases the victims go absolutely mad before death overtakes them. Its first effect is a sensation of dizziness which is equivalent to sleepiness, and this is, I suppose, the reason it is called the "sleeping sickness." One of my very important pictures is where a hundred of these sleeping sickness victims are felling a tree, and this picture was taken on Washington's birthday. It will, however, clearly be seen in the illustration that the chopping was not accomplished by means of Washington's little "hatchet."

Still another important result of Hemment's expedition is the securing of something like five hundred feet of film, showing the salt industry, conducted along the base of Ruwenzori, one of the Mountains of the Moon, in which approximately 50,000 men are employed. The salt is packed by natives for hundreds of miles along a trail skirting the base of the Mountains of the Moon from the Congo border.

Mr. Hemment has films which will be made the basis of either three or four lectures, and unquestionably the pictures will prove of great interest to theatre-goers. We have not seen the films yet, but we have abiding faith in Hemment's judgment, and there is not a particle of question as to his ability in the photographic end, hence we look forward to something out of the ordinary when the films are finally placed on the screen, probably about the middle of October.

The writer has been privileged to view some stereopticon still pictures taken by Mr. Hemment in natural colors, and it is no more than the absolute truth to say these pictures are literally marvelous in their trueness and accuracy in color effects. It is just as though you stood there and looked at the scene. The effect is wonderful; the color effect is amazing in that it is absolutely natural, and not overdone. I venture to say there is not a particle of difference in viewing the actual scenes and looking at the stereopticon pictures which Mr. Hemment has taken. It is a revelation in the possibilities of stereopticon colored photography.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

A Classified List.

LYLE C. TRUE has issued through the Music Supply Co. of San Francisco, Cal., a book which he calls "How and What to Play for Pictures; A Manual and Guide for Pianists." Its contents consist mainly of titles of musical compositions which will be found useful in accompanying moving pictures. Mr. True has given us a very carefully selected and classified list of about one thousand titles of the best music, together with name of composer and names of various publishers.

The lists are placed under different heads, as: "Dramatic" (for heavy dramas), "Romantic" (for love dramas), etc. Oriental music, Spanish or Mexican music, Irish numbers, Old Songs and Slumber Songs are mentioned at some length each under its own heading; characteristic numbers are given a prominent place as well as different kinds of marches. In addition to this, Mr. True has included twenty-one grand operas with analysis for working purposes, as per following example:

TRAVIATA. (Schermer edition.)

"Combats, etc., pages: 4, 5, 18, 19, 20, 21. Very dramatic for climaxes: 14, 15, 16, 17, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, octet 37 to end 40. Emotional and sad: 2, 3, 12, 13, 15, 28, act three, 40, 41. Ball room or dialog scenes: 6 to 12, 14, 15. Gypsy music: 29 to37."

A catalog of musical numbers with the contents listed to meet the requirements of moving picture pianists will be well received I am sure. Two or three years ago I prepared a small "list" of about a hundred and fifty numbers of easy grade stuff which was sent to all who wanted it badly enough to inclose a stamp—and some few who didn't—but it made such inroads on my time that I cut it out. Mr. True's catalog is much more complete and, to the best of my belief, is the only work of its kind and, judging from my own experience, will really fill a need.

Changing Positions.

About every so often somebody wants to know if I know of an opening in Chicago for a good moving picture musician. Of course, the idea of trying to better one's condition is commendable, but moving to a big city from a smaller place doesn't always mean a betterment. In the first place, the hours are usually longer, the distances to travel to and from your work are greater, and the pay, proportionately, is no better than can be had in the smaller town when you consider the difference in expenses. And again, in every large city there are more musicians than engagements, an opening wouldn't stay open any longer than it would take some one to get there and fill it. If you feel that you must make a change, the better way to accomplish this would be to insert a small ad in the Moving Picture World and hold fast to your present position if it is a half-way decent one.

A "Musical Insert."

From Baltimore, Md.—"I have recently played a picture called 'Kate Waters of the Secret Service.' During the picture the music of the song 'Goodby, Dolly Grey' was shown on the screen. In an argument with my employer, he claimed the music was not put there for the benefit of the pianist, but for the audience to know what the girl was singing. I judged entirely different, saying it was for the pianist to play to show what the girl sings. Now the main point is, I have forgotten the song it goes off the screen so rapidly that it is impossible to read the notes on the screen. Will you kindly inform me, if this is for the benefit of the pianist, why do they not allow a sufficient length of time for music showing on screen so it can be read?"

I would not undertake to say what was in the director's mind when the picture in question was filmed. I don't know whether he intended that particular insert for the benefit of the audience or of the piano players who might accompany the picture. If my personal opinion is worth anything, I will say that I believe all inserts, leaders and so forth are shown solely to make the story a little plainer to the observer, and, in this connection, the pianist is not considered. It seems to me that if the music in question had been included in the picture for the benefit of the pianist, sufficient length of time would have been allowed for its reading. Of course, it goes without saying that when a careful accompanist (such as the writer seems to be) knows the songs referred to in pictures, he will play them. If he doesn't know them, he will have to comfort himself with the thought that perhaps nobody in the audience knows them either. Possibly the director—if he thought about the matter at all—supposed that the song was so old every one knew it. When a song bears so important a part to the story as to entail the music being flashed upon the screen, it seems to me it is also important enough to be heard from the orchestra pit, and to insure this, the fact might be mentioned in advance through the advertising matter or in some other way that such and such a song is used in the picture. This would give the conscientious fellows a chance to brush up their memories—or get the music if possible.

"Rawlins Theater Orchestra."

Friend Montgomery of the Rawlins Theater, Albany, Ga., again comes to the front. He says in part: "If you want to use some musical synopsis for the M. P. World I will inclose one reel Indian, one reel Oriental and three of the five-reel Lasky pictures. That was a magnificent setting of 'Antony and Cleopatra' given us by Mr. Roy Bassett of Hartford, Conn. He must have had a job playing that music with a four-piece orchestra."

(I am sure Mr. Bassett feels gratified to know his program was appreciated at its worth by one who knows what constitutes a "good musical setting."—Ed.)

These are Mr. Montgomery's suggestions for pictures mentioned:

"Romance of the Pueblo." (Biograph.)

1. "Maid of Cherokee" until title: "Apache Chief Comes to Trade."
2. "Moon Bird" until title: "You a Pueblo Not Fit."
3. "Zephyr" until title: "How Much for My Squaw?"
4. "In the Land of the Buffalo" until title: "Beginning the Wedding Rites."
5. "Sun Dance" until title: "Now, Daughter, let," etc.
6. "Anona" until end of reel.

"The Leopards' Foundling." (Part Two.)

1. "Passion Dance" until title: "Natives Plan to Avenge."
2. "Mt. Hindoo Man" until title: "Balu Decides to Go With Stanley."
3. "El Caharia" until title: "Arrival in America."
4. "Jungle Jubilee" until title: "Fascination."
5. "Echoes from Egypt" until end of reel.

"His Only Son." (Lasky) Part I.

1. "Mousme Intermezzo" until title: "Brainerd at Work."
2. Waltz; "Woman's Love and Life" (Introduction and waltz until title): "Way Freight."
3. Galop, "Eolus" until title: "Reward for Valor."
4. Intermezzo, "Autumn Leaves" until title: "Demonstration."
5. March (or intermezzo "Kisses") until end of reel.

"His Only Son." Part III.

1. "Love and Passion" (meditation) until entrance of man in window.
2. Hurry (Hawkes melodramatic No. 14) until title: "Morning."
3. "Chiffon" (Caprice) until Brainerd shows paper to his wife.
4. Barcarolle ("Perfume") until title: "Tom Asks His Father."
5. Reverie ("Wings of Love") until end of reel.

"His Only Son." Part V.

1. Idyll ("Love's Voyage") until title: "Breaking the Strike."
2. Hurry (Fischers No. 14) until Mr. Brainerd receives telegram.
3. Intermezzo ("Roses") until title: "Where Is Your Mother?"
4. Intermezzo ("Kisses") until end of reel.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

IT has been the hope for months on the part of the most influential and prominent exhibitors of the country that the amalgamation of the associations of motion picture exhibitors would be consummated during the early season of 1914-15 and assurances in that direction are apparently well founded, but during the past few weeks another movement has developed which seems destined to divert attention from this very laudable undertaking on the part of the exhibitors. The chief objects of the amalgamation, as outlined by the promoters, are to bring all exhibitors under one banner and have them work in harmony for the interests of all concerned; to eventually formulate plans whereby the reunited and harmonizing influences will be able to meet and confer with representatives of the various manufacturers and film renters with a view to adjusting any differences that exist, or may arise; and bring about a co-operation that will harmonize all interests in all branches of the motion picture business. At no time during the convention at Dayton, O., when the subject was first brought up, or any time since then, has any particular set or class of manufacturers or renters been barred from the policy outlined. The project is not one of class legislation, but in form and desire like a world's peace congress. For this reason it has had the hearty support of the exhibitors and almost unanimous indorsement of those connected with other branches of the motion picture trade.

* * *

The recent movement by which the National Independent Motion Picture Board of Trade, Inc., was formed is looked upon by many exhibitors in this city and other places as a misdirected one. Many fear it may prove an obstacle to the accomplishment of the excellent work outlined at Dayton. It is claimed that if exhibitors join the Board of Trade they cannot consistently take part in the amalgamation, because the harmonizing plans of the latter are not reflected by the former. And should some exhibitors be induced to join the Board of Trade and others carry out the amalgamation plans the time expended on the latter will have been wasted and the Dayton policy will fall. It is obvious that the exhibitors under such conditions will be as much divided as they are now.

* * *

One of the most prominent exhibitors in this country while visiting this city during the past week was very frank in his views of the situation. It was his opinion that the exhibitors should be cautious in considering the Board of Trade movement and not jeopardize, or kill, the excellent plan outlined at the Dayton convention until they conscientiously feel that amalgamation will not accrue to their benefit. The charter of the Board of Trade and speeches made by the sponsors of the new association are practically declarations of war against certain interests in the motion picture business. "In my opinion," said the exhibitor, "the policy of the Board of Trade is too radical to bring benefit to the exhibitors. It looks to me to be an undertaking designed more for the benefit of certain manufacturers and renters. I have failed to observe anything outlined by the Board of Trade that cannot be peacefully and rationally accomplished by the amalgamated exhibitors. As an organized and chartered body they will be able to bring about correction of abuses. If conferences fail to bring about arbitration they can invoke the same laws which the Board of Trade depends upon. The latter organization is apparently depending upon force for the accomplishment of its purposes, while the amalgamated exhibitors would first resort to persuasive policies. To my mind the latter is the best dope and the exhibitors should not allow themselves to be swayed from the Dayton policy."

* * *

After a moment's reflection the exhibitor continued. "I have known William Fox, the instigator of the Board of Trade movement, for several years and know him to have been the champion of the exhibitors' interests when a champion was sorely needed. I well remember when Mayor McClellan of New York, with a stroke of his pen, closed every moving picture house in the city. The order was not an hour old before Fox was on the job and concentrated certain influences that brought all the exhibitors of the city together, with the result that within twenty-four hours the late Mayor Gaynor (then a justice of the Supreme Court) enjoined the police from interfering with the reopening of the houses. Fox claims to have accomplished many other things in behalf of the exhibitors, but I have not been able to follow them up on account of my own interests keeping me from this city. I am satisfied, however, that he has done whatever he could for the exhibitor and it was quite natural that he should, as he was a prominent one. But with all this Fox's present policy is not clear to me. Apparently his main point is against the Motion Picture Patents Company. We all know he has been untiring in his battles against that company, so it was to be expected that he would make it his main target in the present campaign. But in his address at the Hotel McAlpin he said, 'You understand the necessity for those of us who are not in sympathy with the methods of the Motion Picture Patents Company, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, or the Mutual Film Company, to organize a central body,' etc. This is where I lose track of Mr. Fox's real policy, or rather this declared attitude causes me to hesitate and ask if it is possible that behind Mr. Fox are certain influences that do not appear on the surface?"

"Now, let us see what film manufacturing companies Mr. Fox 'and those of us' are not in sympathy with: all the pioneer and old line manufacturers in the business. Every corporation and firm thus far mentioned in connection with the new movement is of comparative recent origin. If the exhibitors are to adopt the policy advocated by Mr. Fox they must necessarily declare themselves as not in sympathy with the all-old companies and array themselves in battle form with the new ones. What then becomes of the palace of peace at Dayton?"

* * *

A discussion that followed the remarks of the exhibitor led to quite a spirited exchange of views as to what the term "exhibitor" means. It was stated that the term has become a misnomer in many respects and that it should be used only when referring to the small picture houses. Mr. Fox, for instance, is not really an exhibitor. He owns a rental exchange and is a theatrical man, using pictures only as an adjunct to his vaudeville acts. Marcus Loew is no longer an exhibitor. He, too, is a theatrical magnate. It was further contended that the owner or manager of any house that is not devoted solely to the exhibition of motion pictures is not an exhibitor, although he may be looked upon as such in his dealings with the film exchanges. A renter present said that from a technical standpoint the contention was correct.

* * *

"Well," said the exhibitor who had previously spoken, "taking that line of argument as well founded the natural conclusion is that the Board of Trade is not really an organization that should attract the exhibitors, but one offering advantages only to the big men in the field and the regular fellows should go ahead with their amalgamation. In going over the list of those who attended the meeting at the Hotel McAlpin and the officers elected I find, under your construction of the term 'exhibitor,' that there was not one present. Every name in the list of officers is that of either a film producer, a film renter, or a manager of a film renting exchange, although the charter states that the object of the organization is 'to foster trade and commerce, and the interests of those engaged as manufacturers, distributors and exhibitors of motion pictures.'"

"Understand me," continued the exhibitor. "I do not challenge the right of Mr. Fox, or any one else, to organize for the protection of their interests; but I do contend that although exhibitors are mentioned in the charter of the Board of Trade their best interests are not to be sought there. They can best serve themselves in an amalgamated association of their own and they have enough troubles of their own to look after without combining with the fellows higher up and seeking more litigation, especially when the affairs involved have little or no direct connection with their business. What they are concerned in, so far as manufacturers and exchanges figure, are good service and fair rates. This they can adjust themselves with proper organization. They, like some of the Board of Trade members, may not be in sympathy with some manufacturers and renters, but the exercise of those sympathies one way or the other do not bring box office receipts. I flatter myself as knowing the motion picture game as well as any one in the business and in all the years of my experience I have never seen anything launched under the flag of radicalism that met the expectations of the promoters. Exhibitors certainly cannot afford to rally under such a flag. There may be smooth sailing at first, but motion pictures, like politics, make queer bedfellows. I, for one, am in the exhibition business, and I am going to stick to it. Let those who have certain grievances pull their own chestnuts out of the fire."

Doings at Los Angeles

THAT this city is a moving picture fan's headquarters as well as a big center for production was proven this week when Mr. Tally, who owns several big houses here secured the Majestic theater for pictures for a period of time not mentioned, but probably permanent. The news was quite a surprise to theater row, and Mr. Tally's scoop was taken with much comment. He opened on the sixth with H. B. Warner in "The Lost Paradise." That will be followed by other big features. This house for several seasons has played the best companies, and is well known to theatrical people.

* * *

And still another playhouse was opened to this city this week when the new Symphony theater, overhauled and remodeled at a cost of $40,000, threw open its doors to the public. S. L. Boseley, who has been with Mr. Clune as manager, will run the new house, which is one of the best in the city.

* * *

Los Angeles people have finally been rewarded for their efforts to have film producers place "Made in Los Angeles" placed on the end of films taken here. The chamber of commerce was instrumental in having this done, and the people are delighted with the new scheme.

W. H. Clune, already well known as a moving picture theater manager of Southern California, accompanied by Lloyd Brown, his manager, has returned from a mountain fishing trip. Mr. Clune has a cameraman and when the beach bathers at Ocean Park danced the tango on the sands he snapped them and speedily showed some classy pictures to his patrons. He gets every event of local interest and shows it a short time after. Incidentally business is good here.

Laura Oakley is not a suffragette, but she believes in women having some hand in the carrying out of the law. She was not satisfied with being chief of police of the Universal city squad, but was presented with a real badge from the Chief of Police. The shield is number "99." Now that proud person has applied to the sheriff for a county badge so she will be able to pinch anyone anywhere. She will probably get it, too.

Max Asher, that jovial German comedian who has for so long a time been appreciated in Joker comedies, has been drafted to the Sterling forces and is playing a foolish part in a Ford comedy. He is a real funny man and in private life is nearly as funny. He drives a little car, not a Ford, and his trips around the state are numerous. He is quite a motorist.

Albert W. Hale is no slouch when it comes to taking good care of his players. He has given the whole studio a coat of white paint, cleaned up the yards, installed three new dressing rooms, one double shower bath house, and built an addition to the stage besides putting up better light facilities, and in every way bettering his studio. He even hired a boy to cut the lawn and cultivate the Kalem sunken gardens. He has inaugurated a regular system, and everything runs smoothly at that studio. Betty Teare, his leading lady, has been called "the Maude Adams of the movies" by one enthusiastic exhibitor who wrote to the Kalem Company complimenting the Western films.

Lorimer Johnston, who produced for the Santa Barbara M. P. Co., has left that concern and is in this city. He was replaced by Henry W. Otto, who left the American to work for the moneyed concern.

* * *

W. Roberts, a man of the camera, a free lancer, has returned from Mexico with several cans of film that he took on a 300-mile trip in that country. He is at the Norbig studios. He will exhibit the film and sell it, returning to the south for more pictures.

Frank C. Griffin, who produced for Lubin at Jacksonville, has arrived at the Sterling studio and will make pictures here, doing all comedy work. This is one of the busiest studios on the row and Fred Balshofer is one of the busiest managers ever.

It was proved a few days ago that the stars are not the only ones who do great stunts. Clarence Hodge, a sort of steady-extra man, returning from the beach with Henry McRae and his company, which had been doing scenes for "The Silent Peril," rescued two women in a runaway by standing on the running board of the machine and stopping the horses. The story was later told by one of the actors, who admired Hodge for his heroism.

George S. Best, a wealthy man of this country, is going on a round-the-world trip with A. Vallet the cameraman, who formerly was with the Vitagraph and U. S. companies. They leave San Francisco on the 15th, going to Japan and thence through the canal and on to Europe.

The Little theater starred Myrtle Stedman, featured in Bosworth films, recently when she played a week at that theater. Miss Stedman is a singer of some quality and her voice was appreciated when she appeared in connection with "The Valley of the Moon."

Karl Formes, Jr., one of the best-known old-man character actors, who was for so long a Vitaplayer, has started a real school for moving picture actors, in conjunction with the Frank Egan school of drama. His personality is one that will help him greatly in instructing players.

Can you imagine petite Margaret Gibson in a Vitagraph comedy. This popular player has for so many months been seen in drama that it will be quite an innovation to see her act funny. She has done it, and done it well. Miss Gibson is to be featured in several comedies that are now being written especially for her.

Our friend Mabel, her last name is too well known, won a loving cup at the Vernon country club dansant last week. She is quite a dancer of the late steps, and is a popular young lady when it comes to terpischorean execution.

An expedition to the South Seas, and islands along the coast has been planned by George Marshall, who has chartered a vessel to take the party. Moving pictures of island life will be made. They leave the fifteenth of October.

Mojonier, one of the most popular of Los Angeles photographers, told a good joke on himself the other day. He received a client who desired some pictures. The man seemed familiar, and Mr. Mojonier asked him if he had ever written a play. The subject replied that he had not, but that he had written several books. The pictures were so good that the subject later sent the photographer "The Eyes of the World," his latest book, with the following written on the fly leaf: "With all good wishes to Mr. A. Louis Mojonier, Harold Bell Wright." The surprised picture artist then remembered. Mr. Mojonier is a well-known man with picture players here.

The Optic theater on Main street is to be completely rebuilt at a cost of several thousand dollars by Seth D. Perkins. Many attractive decorations and electrical signs and effects are to be installed. A new lobby display system is to be put in which will give patrons life-size pictures of favorite Keystone and Mutual players.

A New Wrinkle In Posters

Cheltenham Press Turns Out Artistic and Novel Work for The Mutual—Novel and Eloquent Designs Shown.

By W. Stephen Bush.

EARNESTLY aiming at an artistic and ethical improvement of posters some of the producing companies connected with the Mutual Film Corporation have impressed the services of the Cheltenham Advertising Service. For the past few days one of the lower floors of 150 Fifth avenue has been devoted to the showing of samples of old posters and samples of the new style of paper. Only informal invitations were sent out, but they were generously responded to and all the exhibitors and other interested parties who came and saw were convinced that the new style has merit and is at least entitled to a trial. The old style paper was hung on the northern wall of the floor and was faced by the new style, specimens of which decorated the southern wall. The contrast was thus made very obvious. The plan of the new departure is to attract attention, to have the poster tell its story plainly so that he who runs may read and to make the picture emphatically artistic.

The man in charge of this important work is Scotson Clark, an Englishman who has had much experience in this line and who evidently has new and original ideas. He is full of his subject, and what he has to say will be read with interest by every producer, distributor and exhibitor, not to speak of the men directly interested in the lithographic end of things.

"I have been hammering the poster-nail on the head since 1894," said Mr. Clark to a representative of The Moving Picture World, "when the first art poster produced in this country was used for Edward 'Evangeline' Rice's production 'Little Christopher.' It was after this that the poster boom started and for years I designed posters for Charles Frohman, Klaw and Erlanger, Charles Dillingham and other first-class managers. Then the idea struck me: 'Why not the motion pictures'? Thus originated the newest mutual posters which I have just shown you downstairs.

"What posters are shown at too many of the motion picture houses? Blood and thunder, battle, murder and sudden death. There is already a movement afoot to protest against the incentive to crime displayed on the boards outside the picture palaces, and the time has come when the censorship must start before the lithographer has run up his bill instead of after the deed is done. The poster question will grow in importance as time goes on. Too much care cannot be given to this side of the selling end of the business. It is evident that the mission of the poster is to attract people. The poster must bring the people across the street. Secondly, having gotten them there, you must tell them in as few words as possible what they will see when they get inside. You must excite their curiosity sufficiently to make them part with their nickel, dime or quarter. Thirdly, you must appeal to their artistic sense, and managers are apt to underrate this quality of the general public's mind. The days of working down to the public are over at all events in America, and it has been proved from New York to San Francisco, from Chicago to New Orleans, that the artistic production gives better financial returns than does the old-fashioned hotch-potch that passed muster as a feature five years ago. It simply amounts to this: that an artistic rendering of a situation will arouse interest and create a deeper impression than will a more or less realistic rendering of a still.

"The posters I have gotten out under the direction of the Cheltenham Advertising Service have struck a distinctly new note. Instead of trying to show that the heroine has blue eyes and manicured fingernails and is dressed in a wonderful and terrible costume emanating from the brain of the German lithographer, the Cheltenham's idea is to present broad masses of color that make a decoration, an embellishment to the walls; to express a sentiment rather that an episode and to stimulate the imagination rather than stir the evil passions."

Mr. Clark called special attention to the paper for the picture called "For Those Unborn," which would appeal to any observer as unique, distinctive and characteristic. Opposite the wall hung a six-sheet depicting a stereotyped gambling scene in a perfect chaos of arbitrary colors. The contrast was marked, indeed.

"And now, from the cash point of view," continued Mr. Clark, "art is generally looked upon as an expensive luxury, and in a business like ours where profits are made out of savings it is not a commercial proposition to increase the first cost in poster production.

Robert Conness

ROBERT CONNESS was born on a farm in La Salle County, Illinois, but spent most of his boyhood days in the far West. He attended public school in Topeka, Kansas, and took part in the amateur school theatricals at the early age of seven. Upon graduating from school, he was given a position in the office of a railroad company in the West. But the theatrical seed had already taken root and Robert could find no contentment in wielding the pen. Mr. Conness made his debut on the stage in "Alabama," and later appeared in leading juvenile roles with James O'Neil. He has had engagements with the Frohmans, in the "Prisoner of Zenda," "Colonial Girl" and "The Bachelor's Baby," and he has starred with Mary Mannering, Blanche Walsh, Hedwig Richter and Louis Mann. Mr. Conness made his initial appearance before the motion picture camera about five years ago, in the Edison Studio, and gained many admirers by his clever performance in "His Daughter," "Children Who Labor," "Church and Country" and "Van Bibber's Experiment." He had been engaged in theatrical productions for two years, but has rejoined the Edison forces and will appear in leading roles in "Bootle's Baby," "The Blue Coyote Cherry Crop" and "The Long Way."

British Notes

THE order of the day in Great Britain is undoubtedly the film of military or naval interest. Of them there is no scarcity. The month that has elapsed since the outbreak of hostilities has given certain productive agencies sufficient time to meet the inevitable demand and, excepting a few good subjects already nearing release at the outbreak of the war, the film market appears to have been bombarded with a re-hash of second-hand stock. To a reasonable degree the revival of pictures of real military or naval interest at a time like this is permissible and can be considered enterprising on the part of the exhibitor or renter, but to dig up old films of Territorial camp scenes and palm them off by tricky advertising as actual war pictures is "gilding the pill" for the public too strongly and must only be to the detriment of the real war pictures when such do arrive.

Admittedly one of the finest collections of military pictures extant is that of the late Kinemacolor Company, comprising practically every incident and phase in the life of the British forces from an ordinary camp review to an event like the Durbar. Charles Urban intends to feature these at his London theater and possessing the additional quality of color it is safe to prophesy for them a lengthy and successful run.

Scarcely without a single exception the whole of the London agencies of United States film manufacturers announce to their customers this week the elimination of any chance of shortage in the supply of prints. The Vitagraph, Selig and Lubin companies have each laid in at their respective depots a heavy stock of negatives. The Selig Company in particular has been unusually busy in transferring stock from Paris to London. These operations have evidently delayed the return of "W. N." to New York.

Two American moving picture personalities, C. H. Cole and Max Levenson, are each engaged in film-hiring departures in Manchester.

S. S. Hutchinson, of the American Company, has been delayed in Switzerland, but is now safely out of the danger zone. He will return to New York at the end of September.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Educational Stuff.

RECENTLY we have told several persons of an educational to be released in six or eight reels. Each time they declared that the educational stuff was what they liked. Of course an eight-reel educational would have no place in a mixed program, but did it ever occur to you that some good educational half or even whole reels might make good as drawing cards for new business? Don't laugh. If you represent the mode of thought of the average exhibitor you probably think that educationals do not draw, because you have fostered in the minds of some of the patrons their own half formed thought that they do not like them, but right now is coming a time when you can enlarge your patronage by adding to your present clientele the persons who used to go to the high priced attractions. You do not know that they like an occasional educational because you never went after their business, but some good educational stuff will help a lot to lift the curse from some of the awful piffle that is put out as photoplay fiction. Why not do a little experimenting, and meanwhile try to educate your old patrons to an appreciation of what they are getting? Don't decry the educational stuff, praise it up, and you'll find that your patrons will like it, too.

Half the time the objection to educational stuff is largely due to your half apologetic mention of scenic and industrial material, and at best this objection exists only in the minds of a comparatively small percentage of the theatergoers. As a general thing the more intelligent a man is, the more money he can make and the more he makes the more he can spare for amusement. That is just another way of saying that the people who like this stuff are the people who will make your best and most lasting patrons. Right now is a good time to start in.

Kalem's Komplete Kalendar.

The Kalem Kalendar makes its appearance in a new form, a newspaper, size eight pages, with the releases for the month. It contains the full calendar of releases, synopses, casts, newspaper announcements for each subject, one or more illustrations, announcements of advertising helps and brief chats. It is vastly more helpful to the manager than the old form and it lacks only some gossip of the players to be absolutely complete.

One of their best advertising helps is a seventeen foot strip of film in which Miss Joyce appears through the curtains to announce that her series features are shown at the house. It is a novelty that makes business and costs so little that it is a waste of money not to use it. The Kalem company always has been helpful to the exhibitor but in the new form the Kalendar is better than ever.

Fact.

We can't get along without occasionally lifting from Brother Carpenter, of Real Reels. We only wish we had room for his weekly fables. But since we have not here is what we can tuck in:

> In Paris the prices at the moving picture theaters are generally higher than those charged in London—but the pictures are generally better. Do you get that?

Putting Sick Business on a Diet!

> When you are all run down, your body not responding to the call of your brain, your digestive organism out of whack and you feel that you are about at the end of your string—your family physician either sends you to another climate or puts you on a diet. Your food is wrong or your surroundings not conducive to your health.
>
> Your BUSINESS is just as susceptible to ailments as your body and responds to dieting just as rapidly.
>
> The most important organ in your business anatomy is THE BOX OFFICE, and when this is not performing its proper functions the balance of your business body is all out of whack. PUT YOUR BUSINESS ON A DIET. Cut out the portions of your program which do not agree with your box office's digestion.

Of course the answer is supposed to be to use Paramount films, but shoot whatever disagrees with your box office whether it is poor films or a grouchy door man.

Working Back.

The Academy of Music, Selma, Alabama, is working back to the advertising end and perhaps some day we'll get the Academian again. The first sign of new life is a gray mailing card printed in black, announcing the Biograph's reissues of Miss Pickford. In addition to being a well framed advertising it is a pretty piece of printing. The three lines, "Biograph," "Pickford" and "Every Thursday" are set in a simple gothic and they tell the entire story, for one can guess it's the Academy. There is one house that knows that good display type is not necessarily the type with the biggest bunch of curliques. It is better to have the type solidly dignified than to suggest that the letters got mixed up with a font of some floral border.

Can It Be?

Here's a man in a town all by himself and still he writes he is trying to give his patrons the very best. Probably that is why he IS left in possession of the town. There is no use trying to break in on a house like that. He is L. F. Guimond, of the Lyceum, Monticello, N. Y. He writes:

> I am inclosing herewith a few of our various advertising wrinkles which may, or may not, be of interest to you. Perhaps the point most to be emphasized as regards our theater here is that we are without opposition (this in a whisper), and we still do our little derndest to give 'em what they are paying for. Since securing the field to ourselves we have made many improvements. At present we are experimenting with aluminum paint and unglossed oilcloth for a screen. We have written directly to the manufacturers of aluminum paint and we expect to have a screen just to our liking soon. We are now using the Laemmle Meniscus Bi-Convex condenser lens and seem to be getting a far better picture than formerly with a considerable diminution in current consumed.
> It might be of interest to some of your advertisers to know that in the past month we have written for details of different products to exactly eleven of the various manufacturers using your columns, this in search of anything which will make for better projection. Your handbook is the operating room Bible and the employees take turns with the World. With best wishes, I am.

Not trying to help pay the high cost of gasoline for his much advertised motor, Mr. Richardson's handbook IS the Bible in most houses. In our travels we've been in a lot of projection rooms this summer and nine-tenths have that red covered job-saver right in the room where it is handy.

The house seems to be an old church or armory and uses the catchline "Behind the Cobble Wall" for it sets well within private grounds. There is a bowling alley in the basement and the dodger advertising divides the space with the alleys. It is not ambitious advertising, it does not have to be with no opposition, but the real advertisement is the best projection of good films that the management can procure. That's advertisement enough.

Small Towns Again.

Once more the small town man comes to the front. John A. Jerome sends in a newspaper advertisement of Home Sweet Home and writes in the margin:

> Rand-McNally's census figures show
> Orangeburg, S. C., 4,455,
> Atlanta, Ga., 154,839.
> And sad to say, the Orangeburg exhibitor took about 18 times as much pains to present the picture properly as the Atlanta exhibitor did. Verily the small towns are going to the front.

They are not going to the front, they have been there right along. The Reliance theater not only added vocal features (most important in a film of this sort), but announced that the film would be run in the time limit set by the producer, which is even more important. There never was a film printed on a transparent medium that could not be utterly ruined by being run too fast. And in that small town they are getting a quarter for it, too, because they do it right, and we'll gamble that people went away feeling they had had their quarter's worth. There must be a few men with brains in the larger towns, but they do not seem to be writing in, and we are still waiting to be shown.

Wants More Facts.

A licensed exhibitor, who asks that his name be not used, makes the suggestion that he is handicapped at times by a lack of full information from the manufacturers on the licensed side as to the coming subjects. The point is well taken. It is not a good plan to give the full details of every story to the patron in the house program, but surely the exhibitor is entitled to know just what he is getting, and this complaint is presented to the press men of the various companies. At best the exhibitor is going it blind. He is entitled to all the facts that can be handed him.

This writer says he gets all of the trade papers, but looks to the Moving Picture World for the unbiased facts, though he does not find all of the reviews he needs. The paper gives all the reviews that can be rounded up, but with the system of distribution obtaining, it is not possible to get them all.

That's the Trouble.

In sending in a copy of his program, Charles W. Gates, of the Lyric theater, Austin, Minn., asks us to keep in mind that he lives in a small town "where there is little demand for type stickers and where new fonts are unknown."

The program is a Hennegan cover in colors with a four-page insert. Each page is the simple advertisement of a feature reel and with a single exception they look "long waisted" for want of a better term.

In other words, the title of the story falls too far to the bottom of the advertisement. The text is so displayed that the title of the film is at least three-fourths of the way down the page where the title should be above the middle half of the space in order to get the proportions. This is largely due to the fact that in most cases someone "presents" someone in something. For example:

DANIEL FROHMAN
Presents
The Celebrated Film Favorite,
"LITTLE" MARY PICKFORD
In a delightful comedy drama of society, love and the great outdoors.
CAPRICE.

No one is going to stay away from a theater with Miss Pickford on the screen just because an advertisement is poorly set, but some persons might have their attention held by a more attractively displayed announcement. They do not realize that anything is the matter with the advertisement, but it does not attract them and they do not read it closely, and the aim is not only to inform the regular fans but to get, if possible, the new patron. This advertisement is five inches deep. The top of the "Caprice" line is three and a half inches from the rule at the top. By changing the copy to read.

The Celebrated Film Favorite
in
CAPRICE
Presented by Daniel Frohman and his Famous Players
etc., etc., etc.

the lines of greater importance would rise to the top, hold the attention and lead the eye to the remainder of the announcement.

An inexperienced compositor is not an excuse. That's the trouble. A manager says: "Oh, what's the use!" instead of making the printer do the thing right. He should either mark his copy or stand over the printer. If he cannot get new type faces, he at least can insist on getting the best of what there is.

Miss Pickford's is easily the most potent name in a list of six feature attractions for the week. Hers is the only name set in lower case and there is only one star name out of five set in smaller type. If Mr. Gates will get them to prove up the type lines or let him make his own sample sheet by naming the faces of various lines that he may paste on a card a sample of every face and size the printer has, he can mark his lines or whatever the face may be and get precisely what he wants instead of being at the mercy of some job man whose account with "the Dutchman's" down on the corner looks like a statement of the national debt. It can be done, but not if you are convinced that it cannot.

"Little Mary" Pickford—24 Point Cheltenham Oldstyle, Caps

If you deal with one printer get a pile of old programs. Cut out the attractive lines. Arrange them by size until you get about all the type faces they use. Now take this down to the shop. Let them name them for you. Take it back to the office and tack it up and you can call for type by name and know just what you are going to get.

Hangs His Frames.

E. M. Bannister, manager of the Airdome, Saugatuck, Mich., which is owned by A. Pfaff, writes:

> Inclosed please find a picture of the airdome, showing the movable frames that I use because the easel frames were constantly being blown over by the wind. This is the third season of the airdome, which seats 400 and cost $1,500 to fit up, as we had the best of everything, including weatherproof opera chairs and pitched floor. I trust the picture will be as useful to the Moving Picture World as the paper has been to me.

The picture shows the same scheme we advocated just before the opening of the season in that the "today" and "tomorrow" subjects are always in the same position. The frame inside the lobby is dated with a day instead of the usual "Coming," but patrons are never mixed as to the date of a subject because the evening program is always nearest the lobby and always in the same place. It's one of the little things that make friends without the fact becoming strongly apparent. When the little things are done in an orderly manner there is always the suggestion that the big things are equally well done. By the same token the unmounted print comes in a photo mailer instead of a limp envelope and is just the right sort for reproduction.

Making Pathe Pull.

J. W. Llewellyn, of the Vaudette theater, West Point, Ga., sends in a post card picture of his billing for the Pathe News. It will be seen that he has surrounded the company bill with American, Greek and Russian newspapers, a war map and the illustrated supplements. It makes a cheap three-sheet out of nothing in particular and pulls business even more strongly than a series film. It is the topic of the moment and this addition of newspapers, particularly those in odd type, will build up on the attractiveness of the poster. There is a lot that can be done with the various papers printed in foreign tongues and down on the East Side you can get French, Italian, Russian, Polish, Greek and other national prints. It is not enough to paste up whatever matter is sent you. Reach out for ideas that will make your boards more worthy of attention than the other fellow's. That is what management means.

One Old, One New.

The Vaudette theater, West Point, Ga., gives one old and one new idea in a recent throwaway. The old idea is offering ten dollars in gold for 1913 pennies. The new one is a clever way of explaining a boosted price. It runs

It cost the producers more to make it
It cost the Exchange more to buy it
It costs me more to show it
It will cost 10 and 20c. to see it
But it's worth it

It will be some time before the Georgia hustlers beat that coat hanger, but they keep going with something good.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Why He Won Out.

SEVERAL times lately we have spoken of a newly arrived writer who seems to have taken hold. The other day he was sent a hundred dollars for a two-reel script, the first three-figure check the work ever brought him. His letter was not intended for publication, but it so accurately represents the right spirit that we got permission to publish it, and here it goes. It should be understood that the writer is a former Railway Post Office Mail clerk:

> Of course, it is not what that extra $25 will buy that makes me so happy. Rather, it is what that extra $25 means. It means that I have not struck a rut; that I am improving. It means also, that this editor, at least, considers my work on a par with the good writers in the game or he wouldn't pay me the prices he pays them. You know that I don't get a nickel for my reputation, for I haven't any. So this price means that the quality was there.
> By the way, there is a little side-light on this story that I want to tell you about. It starts away back, several years ago in a big 50-foot mail car.
>
> One morning, instead of going into the hay 50 miles out of "Chi" my whole crew was struggling with a big bunch of Wis. and Ia. "circs." We had fought the things clear across Ohio and Indiana and they had worn us to a frazzle. Finally, I told the boys we would quit and unload the remainder onto the Round-table crew at "Chi" as "stuck" mail. We did.
>
> That morning, I dropped into the Chief Clerk's office. He was (and still is) a prince. He handed me a letter to read. It was from an old friend and former crew-mate of mine who was to be head-clerk of a big new R. P. O. that was being organized. This R. P. O. was to take over an immense quantity of mail and work it to the scratch. Every man on its crew was to be a picked man. Any of the boys would have been proud to have been included in the personnel of this crack aggregation. Imagine my feelings when I read, "Get ———— for the second case if you can. He never lies down and he never quits."
> I'll give you just five guesses what was the first thing that popped into my mind. Yes, you got it the first time. Those "circs" rose up before me like a ghost. I had lain down on those "circs" and I knew it and my friend's praise stung like the red-hot end of a hornet. For several reasons, I could not accept the run, but many times since I have recalled my friend's kind words and how little I deserved them. The memory of this sting has made me buck up more than once and the last case of this kind was when I was writing this story.
>
> It was a story with a natural punch. It could stand a good deal of crude work in development and still be a story. I wanted to answer the call of the bass and was in a hurry so I accepted a hastily formed development and pound out about two pages of action. Then I thought of those circs. I knew that I was not giving this story all I had. I was lying down. I tore up what I had written and went fishing. Not till six weeks later did I sit down to type that story. In the meantime, I had had my fling at the bass and had written two others, but all the time I was searching for development that would equal the natural strength of the story. Well, you see the result—a price that shows that I am going forward instead of staying in the rut. If any one ever tells you that it doesn't pay to take pains, hand him one for me.
> It doesn't seem possible that it can be true. A year ago, I was struggling and failing to make a little $15 or $20 sale. To-day, I am a $100 writer!

Suppose that you, too, when you feel like laying down on a job, think of those "circs" and quit loafing. You'll never be a top price man until you are a top price man, and if you are a top price man you'll get to the top without help. This writer is not the only man we might mention, there is John William Kellett, for example. But every time you name one of the toppers you name a man who has worked and fought for every last bit of his success. Think of those Wisconsin and Idaho circuits and keep on going.

And He Knows.

Of course we know we know it all, but we are glad to have this knowledge verified now and then by some one else. Here is a letter from a man who is in a position to know whereof he speaks. Probably he knows as well as we do that the purchase of scripts from a director is a direct incentive to the theft of ideas from unpurchased scripts. Perhaps he knows that to hire a director with the understanding that he writes his own scripts and then letting him see the scripts sent in is still worse. The worst stories are filmed by a company which short-sightedly supposes that it saves money by hiring directors who write their own scripts. Most of them are not even intelligent enough to make good use of what they steal and now and then they get caught with the goods and the company takes no action. This correspondent, who does not write anonymously, says:

> Most respectfully I offer to you my personal appreciation of your courage, wisdom and unerring aim in taking a shot in the edition of August 29 at the directors who write the scripts they produce. When you wrote that article you did so, I believe, in a more inspired mood than you were aware of.
> Scenario composition has certainly fallen into evil days when a score of men, the directors, declare by their own acts that they, out of the world's many thousands of writers, are alone talented enough to write moving picture dramas.
> All photoplay authors need not despair, however, as long as writers such as yourself shoot hot shot into the ranks of these egomaniacial directors. It seems to me that a revolution is coming in this movie game against the czar-like acts of these know-it-all directors and that in the not distant future the director who writes his own scripts will be a scarce individual.

We did not write the article in an inspired mood. We wrote it with a cool head and an Oliver typewriter and with the full knowledge of what we were saying. It is unjust, dishonest and—perhaps a more potent argument with the head of the company—expensive. Films sell abroad on the strength of story as well as acting. Few of the releases in this particular program have stories strong or otherwise.

Inquest Club Opens Season.

The New York Inquest Club will begin its fall meetings on Monday night, September 21, at the Savoy Theater, on 34th Street, just west of Broadway. Later the members will adjourn to Keen's Chop House, in West 36th Street, near Sixth Avenue, for discussion. John William Kellette will officiate as coroner. All photoplaywrights are welcome.

Read This Story.

If you have not already seen it, get the copy of the Saturday Evening Post dated Sept. 5 and read Will Irwin's story of the making of the Al Jennings reels. Mr. Irwin wrote the stuff for the Post and was invited to see the Thanhouser picture made. He has written the best description of the making of a film that has ever been printed on white paper, or tinted, either, for that matter.

Nuts.

There are various sorts of nuts. Some nuts grow on trees. They are opened with a hammer. Other nuts grow in machine shops and work with a wrench. The third sort write photoplays and write fool letters to the editor. Lawrence McCloskey sends in a gem. This is it:

> Many thanks for the return of my scenario, "Cupid on the Race Track."
> I made a bet with a number of the motion picture men to the effect that I could submit a scenario to all producers embracing two novel features, and that it would be returned marked "unavailable" and that the majority of producers would at some future time incorporate the features with another scenario written by their staff.
> Up to the present time, three of the largest licensed producers have swallowed the bait "hook, line and sinker," and the poor "boobs" are still buying the book, "How to Write a Motion Picture Play and Have It Accepted," and sending them in only to have them returned; later on, if they were clever enough to watch the releases they can see their scenario produced under an alias title. The situation is as "clear as a bell," and as soon as the Authors' League looks into the situation it will be better for all concerned. I saw your release of "The Laziest Man."

That last line is the gem of the collection. If you never saw the film of "The Laziest Man" you can't "get" it. It was written from memory by Romaine Fielding and is about the rottenest comedy that was ever put out, but McCloskey had nothing to do with this rupture of the Hague convention, so he did not weep over the sting. Setting that aside, the letter is densely stupid. "Cupid on the Race Track" suggests a story that will cost more to make than it is worth. No wonder it was turned down. That part of the bet the boob wins, but the chances are that there was little that was worth stealing in the work of a man with a mind like this. If the Authors' League (this is the A. L. and not the P. A. L.) ever gets busy, it will kill off a few hundred of its boob members that wave the seal all over the place.

This letter is put into print just to show some of you how your own stuff looks. Get the idea?

In Philadelphia.

Another effort is being made to start an Inquest Circle in Philadelphia. The original coroner simply went into one of these Philadelphia trances, but now there is a live wire on the job. Those who wrote before and heard only snores are invited to write again, enclosing a return envelope.

Be Specific.

Even at this late day a lot of writers tell what they mean to say rather than say what they mean. A photoplay is a story told in action. But a story is not told in action when you write that "John's father enters and tells him that he must either marry Muriel or go to work." That is not action—it's conversation. All the action you get is that two men hold a more or less heated conversation. You think you are writing action, and you are, but you are not writing the action that tells the story, and a photoplay is a story told in action—and leaders, and any time you cannot tell the story explicitly in action, you must have recourse to a leader.

Get out your last two or three scripts and see if the action as you have written it tells the story or whether you have fallen into this very common and very bad trick. It may be that at first you were careful to have your action fully explanatory, but have gradually grown careless. Lately we saw a script that was not one-tenth as clear as the same writer's earlier efforts, simply because he had not guarded against this gradual retrogression.

You can talk all you want and read all you want about synopsis only, but unless you tell your story in complete, comprehensive and consecutive action you stand a mighty poor show to sell it.

And while you are looking over the recent scripts for action, see what other faults you may have developed. It's surprising how you can fall back unless you are perpetually on your guard.

Not au Gratin.

It takes a woman to work up a cook book simile, but Miss Mayme Fickes covers the ground pretty well when she writes:

> My plots, when I first started out, could well have been likened to raw potatoes; then they got a little better, and were in a semi-cooked state, with raw lumps; now they have advanced a little further, and have gotten to a point where they appear to be thoroughly cooked and creamed, so as to look appetizing, but when you put in your fork and take a morsel out of the plot of action, you find there is no salt. Therefore, I am working hard and sending out little—and at the same time doing some wild prospecting around these parts for salt.

Miss Fickes is down in Texas and perhaps creamed potatoes is as far as they go down there, but let's think a little harder and imagine potatoe en bordure, all nicely squeezed out of a pastry bag and bordering a planked steak. We might even work up to potatoe souffle, but not au gratin, please.

The simile is a happy one. There is a vast difference between the raw "murphy" and the souffle just as there is an equally vast difference between the crude idea and the story of careful workmanship. Hundreds, possibly thousands of writers, do not see any difference between the bare facts and the complete development, but they would miss the salt from Miss Fickes' potatoes. In the same way the editor will miss the salt of development from the potatoes of plot and the plot alone will lack savor. It is not so much the story but the way the story is worked that really counts. Salt your stuff and add a little pepper where it is needed, too, but don't get into the ginger jar by mistake.

Planning That Campaign.

J. R. Murray writes: "Most valuable is your hint to put last on the list the firm that apparently does not want one's stories. Have been sending mine to Lubin first for some time because they were the nearest to home, but they do not seem to want my stuff, so they'll go to the bottom of the list."

That's the idea, exactly. Lubin was close to Mr. Murray's home town so he sent the stuff there first. He did not know that Lubin employs mostly staff writers and buys less than a third of the scripts in the open market. It was close to home, so he sent there first. He may find that one of the New York or Chicago companies will be his best buyers. That's what planning a campaign means, it means putting both your writing and your selling ends on a business basis.

And Mr. Murray wants the department printed on two separate sheets instead of back to back, for the convenience of his scrap book. The usual rule of making up is to have the headings on the right hand page where possible. If you have something on both sides of the sheet, cut the item with a margin and cut away the leaf of the book itself where it would otherwise cover the desired article. Any public librarian will explain the scheme.

Amateur and Professional Again.

Referring to an article in the issue of August 22, Arthur Reall, of Philadelphia, contributes this disquisition:

> An amateur is one who does a stunt with no right to take coin; he can take a watch, ring, etc., and negotiate for the coin later, but gets no coin for doing the thing, even if he wins. There are some amateurs in various branches that are better than professionals, but as soon as some good manager finds it out their status is changed.
>
> A novice is one who is a baby professional; he accepts coin, but not much. When he gets so the coin rings yellow, like gold, he is a professional. Don't be fooled by the chink of copper, it sounds good, but not like true gold.
> Is the above true? Well, then, an amateur works for sport, a novice from necessity, and a professional from the pleasure and profit it brings.

We like best that last line. A professional writer works for the pleasure as well as the profit it brings him. That line carries the whole story, and the more pleasure the writer derives from his work the greater his profit, for then he works with his whole heart. Then Arthur Pillsbury views it from another angle. He says:

> There are a lot of us fellows who have sense enough to know that we cannot arrive without a great deal of study and hard work. I am up against this proposition; I am trying to land, have written a lot of would-be photoplays and sent them in; now this troubles me. If I continue to send in scripts which are still found wanting, will I not become a bore to film companies, so that when the third to the thirtieth shows up, won't they assume that it is simply one more of the same variety? I'll admit this bothers me; I'd very much hate to keep pushing out what to me seems like "good stuff" and find I had simply become a regular worthless contributor, but how do I learn any other way? After plugging six months while my technique must be far from perfect, it must, assuming I am decently bright, be quite fair, and how the dickens can I find out about my plots and punch without submitting? I certainly have no intention of quitting the game, but I would like to play it under the proper rules. Just as I make a fair start, you withdrew your offer to criticise for a price, and I had lost that opportunity. I am honestly willing to put the hard, dry knocks into the game to win, but I wonder how I can know that I am getting anywhere unless I continue to send them into companies?
> I never tried the synopsis game, and never shall, in fact I could not write a good synopsis without writing the scenario, and why send only the synopsis after doing both?

There is a lot in what Mr. Pillsbury says about getting in bad before you are able to do good work. Regard your practice time as school time and do not expect to be paid while learning. It is very true that now and then a script can be sold, but the average of work is impossible, and long before a professional grade of work is reached the editors have connected the writer's name with poor work and shuns the product. Wait until you get out of the amateur class before you try to sell and the very fact that you probably can sell then will make you a professional.

One drawback to the working by oneself is the lack of good teachers. Most of those who profess to pass in judgment on scripts know nothing of the matter and their advice is worse than useless. This applies with double force to the man who is frankly a faker, and yet there are few men capable of writing plays who can afford to spend an hour or more over one script for the usual two-dollar fee. We had to give up the work simply because we could not afford to do it. The man who cannot earn more than two dollars an hour is seldom competent to teach, indeed we know but two men offering this service who are qualified by knowledge and experience, and one of the two regrets that the necessity for doing this work prevents the writing of original stuff. The one hope is that courses in photoplay will be added to high schools and colleges as is now sometimes done in the west.

A Company, But—

One of the recent submissions to the Feature Photoplay Company was sent in by the "Blank Novelty Picture Writer Company." A letter from the "Secreatory" accompanies the script and this also carries the name of the "President and Writer," evidently the "secreatory's" brother. She writes:

> We enclose a scenarios for $250. This scenarios is typewritten. Also on action form. When you send money send check. If you don't buy this scenarios we will sue you for $50,000. We never sold a scenarios. Not even one yet. Please let us hear from you within four days or we will sue you for $50,000.

This is pen written in a crabbed hand on a good grade of the cheap brown paper the corner grocer uses. The script is written on the same material but longer sheets, and at first glance it looks like a poem. It is no poem, however. There are no scene divisions, but the action moves something like this:

> John went down town.
> John got some ice cream.
> John come back home.
> Likly see John down street.
> Likly go and meet John.
> John see Likly coming.

It's a tragedy that people who know no better than this can get the idea from school advertisements that they can write scripts. It's funny, but there is the other side, the disappointments, the wasted time and postage and always the feeling that they are being discriminated against.

There ought to be some way of getting after these advertisers legally, but there does not seem to be—and the crop never grows any smaller.

Finding Princes.

One of the newly arrived successes in a recent letter speaks of several editors who have helped him to success because he deserved help and did not go around demanding it as his inherent right. He closes with "I sure have been the luckiest guy in the business in the matter of making friends of the right sort of men. A fellow can find princes in every line of business if only he will try hard enough and hunt long enough." But he forgot to add that the seeker after princes must be of the blood royal himself to find his fellows. He must be an author in the making and not merely a literary sponger if he wants the helping hand that truly helps. No man who has gone over the hurdles himself and has gotten some good falls and hard knocks learning to make the jumps, has much sympathy or fellow feeling for the rubber spined person who slumps down at the first jump and weeps piteously because he wants to be lifted over. They'll help the man who is trying, but they don't care for the weeper. Do your darndest and if you can't quite make it someone will come along by and by and give you a boost, but give a darned good imitation of a person making a try.

Ask This Question.

When you write a comedy ask yourself this question: "Will it look funny"?

When you write a drama ask: "Will this look dramatic"?

If the answer is "No," work over it some more and get it right. Your appeal to the brain is through the screened picture. Put it all on the screen.

Technique of the Photoplay

(Second Edition)

By EPES W. SARGENT

Not a line reprinted from the first edition, but an entirely new and exhaustive treatise of the Photoplay in its every aspect, together with a dictionary of technical terms and several sample scripts.

One hundred and seventy-six pages of actual text.

Special chapters on Developing the "Punch," Condensing the Script, Writing the Synopsis, Multiple Reel Stories, Talking Pictures, Copyrights, etc.

In cloth, two dollars. Full leather, three dollars.

By mail postpaid. Add ten cents if registration is desired.

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be indorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money, or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 51.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Suppose your manager comes to you and says: "John, the house feed wires are coming in at the rear of our new theater. Now, for certain reasons, I want to tap the operating room feeders off at the stage switchboard, carry them up over the auditorium ceiling and down to the operating room board. The distance will be 165 feet. What size wire ought it to be? What reply would you make? And show us how you would figure it, both for two-wire and three-wire feeders. Suppose he asked the same questions concerning feeds supplying current for incandescent circuits carrying a total consumption of 5,000 watts, voltage 110? Look out, now, gentlemen. Voltage drop is what I'm after. Tell us how you figure it.

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 45 consists of: Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada; A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington; John Mason, Toronto, Canada; Gordon V. Humphrey, New York City; Minneapolis, Minnesota, and one typewritten with purple ink from which the name and location of the contributor was omitted. I would request to contributors to put their names on their manuscripts rather than on a separate sheet or letter. If the letter is signed the question also should be. I have selected the reply of Minneapolis for publication.

Reply to Question No. 45.

By Minneapolis, Minnesota.

The Question:

What voltage generator would you recommend if it is to supply incandescent lighting only? If it is to supply projection current only? If it is to supply both? Give reasons for each reply. How low could the voltage of an ordinary compound wound generator be and still operate a projection arc successfully? How high could it be? Is resistance absolutely necessary in series with projection are supplied by ordinary compound wound, or shunt generator of large or small capacity. Give full details and reasons for your answer. Many things are involved here, so consider carefully.

The Answer:

I would recommend a 110-volt dynamo because it would be easier to obtain lamps, motors, etc., for that voltage and, moreover, a 110 incandescent lamp will stand a greater fluctuation in voltage than will the low voltage lamp, and it is more economical than lamps of higher voltage. I would also prefer this voltage because in case of trouble one could readily switch over to the city mains, which are almost invariably 110 volt pressure.

If the dynamo is to be used for projection current only I would recommend 70 volts, because 70 is more economical than 110, due to the waste in resistance in breaking down the higher voltage, and the difference between the arc voltage and the 70-volt generator voltage would be sufficient to form plenty of cushion for the arc, without excessive waste in the resistance. Sixty volts works very well also, but, personally, I think sixty is a little low to allow of the best possible handling of the light, especially with high amperage.

If the generator is to supply both projection and incandescent circuits the recommendation I would make would depend on circumstances. If the theater was a small one, and did not use many fans and comparatively few incandescents, I would recommend a 70-volt generator, notwithstanding the comparative difficulty of obtaining 70-volt lamps, motors and other equipment. If, on the other hand, the theater was a large one, in which there were several fans, motors and a large number of incandescent lights, I would recommend the installation of two generators, one a 70-volt d. c. machine for projection current, and one a 110-volt a. c. generator for incandescent and motor circuits. My reason for recommending an a. c. incandescent light generator is that alternating current motors operate, everything considered, more satisfactorily than d. c. motors, and the current being not less than 60 cycle, a. c. is equally as good as d. c. for incandescent service. This recommendation, however, would depend upon a. c. city mains being available for use in case of accident. If the only city supply available was d. c. then I would recommend a d. c. 110-volt generator. It would, of course, be quite practical to avoid the installation of the 70-volt generator by using a. c. through a mercury arc rectifier, or a motor generator set, but inasmuch as these devices give an efficiency of from 60 to 70 per cent, and the cost of their installation would be very nearly equal to the cost of the 70-volt generator, I think the 70-volt generator plan would be best. An ordinary compound wound 60-volt generator will operate a projection arc satisfactorily. It would not be practical to go below this unless the generator be just large enough to supply the arcs with current, in which case it is possible to operate a projection arc with a 50-volt generator. There is no limit as to how high the generator voltage could be. So far as the arc itself is concerned, above 70 volts it makes no difference what the voltage of the generator is because it has to be reduced to arc voltage anyhow.

It is absolutely necessary to use resistance in series with an arc supplied by an ordinary compound wound generator which has a capacity greater than the arc amperage, because when the carbons are brought in contact with each other to start the arc the generator would be short circuited, and there would be an enormous rush of current up to and far beyond the capacity of the wires, carbons, etc., and if you got the carbons separated before the fuses blew (you could not do it, but supposing you could) you would have to pull an arc of such abnormal length that the light would not be very good.

With a small generator it seems to be possible to operate a projection arc on a compound wound machine without resistance in series with the arc, but the performance would not be of the best, and the generator would probably be overloaded all the time. The only arc cushion you would then have would be the internal resistance of the arc itself and probably this would require the carrying of too long an arc for the best results. I have noticed correspondents of the projection department who claim to be running an arc from a small compound wound generator without resistance, and I therefore assume it can be done, though inasmuch as the voltage tends to rise with the load I would not have thought it possible to do this.

From Texas.

C. W. Epps, Mineola, Texas, contributes as answer to question 45 and remarks:

> Every issue of the World puts me thinking of new things, particularly when I read the questions you put in from week to week. I realize they are for our benefit, and we should all give them attention since they cover matters which come up in the every day life of the operator. I have been an operator in this neck of the woods ever since I have been big enough to crawl up into a booth. At one time in my life I thought I knew it all, but the more I read and study the more I find out I don't know. I am a fanatic on managers having their own light plants. About one year of my operating career was spent taking current from a brush 4 k. w. lighting set, and I have always said that was all the real operating I ever did. All you other operators who have not had this pleasure "ain't gone nowhere." I have certainly enjoyed your discussion of discolored condensers. I am enclosing my theory on question 45. I may not be altogether right in my answer. Keep up the good work.

One of the most gratifying features of my position as editor of the projection department and author of my various handbooks is by and through the fact that I have induced thousands of operators to study. Perhaps I have not directly helped them to any enormous extent, but I have caused them to help themselves, and that is the best possible kind of help after all. Some of them I have simply made ashamed of themselves, or of their ignorance of the technical side of their profession rather; some I have purposely made angry, and stirred them up that way, whereas others, and the great majority by the way, I have simply led into higher paths by pointing out the things they need to learn.

Handbook as Essential as Sleep.

H. R. Martin, Fort Collins, Colorado, encloses order for the question booklet and says:

> I find the Handbook is as essential as sleep, and I certainly never would be without one. However, I am in trouble. Am using a Powers Six A with a two-wing shutter, a 90-foot throw with a 4¾ Gundlach Manhattan lens. Mr. Flicker is the thing which is getting my goat. Could you, through the department, give me any suggestions as to the correction of this fault?

I have dealt with that particular matter so very often, Brother Martin, that I hate to go over it again, though it is, nevertheless, one of those things which have to be repeated many, many times, and I suppose it will have to be repeated for a long time to come. To begin with the ideal three-wing shutter—that is to say, a three-wing shutter which will give the less amount of flicker, is one that has three blades of equal width, and three light openings of equal width, and one in which the width of the blades is the same as the width of the light openings. Such a shutter will cut just exactly 50 per cent of the light. But it is impossible to use a shutter of this kind except on a very fast intermittent movement, meaning by fast, an intermittent movement of about six to one, and it is also impossible to use that kind of a shutter even with a six to one movement unless the objective lens be of reasonably long focal length so that the light ray is narrow at the point where the shutter cuts it. Also it is difficult to use that kind of shutter at all if the gears of the machine be worn to any considerable extent.

I think very likely you can improve your results as follows: remove the shutter blade from the hub, and, after selecting a piece of perfectly flat cardboard, cut a cardboard pattern of the shutter and clamp it into the hub in place of the sheet metal blade. Never mind about the rim around the outside; you don't need it. Now cut off just a little bit from each edge of the main blade and try it, and continue doing this until travel ghost appears, whereupon you have reached and passed the limit of the narrowness of blades. You can now, using your pasteboard shutter for a pattern, cut down the main blade of your sheet metal shutter, but leave it slightly wider than the pasteboard pattern, because you cut that away until you got some travel ghost. You may also be able to reduce the flicker somewhat by adding to the width of the flicker blade slightly, but whatever you add or take from one edge add to or take from the other edge also, the point being to get the three blades of the three light openings of equal width as nearly as possible. The nearer you can approach that condition without travel ghost, the better your flicker result will be. Travel ghost is flashes of white up or down from white objects in the picture.

Good Work.

Monday, Aug. 17, the editor dropped in at Marcus Loew's Herald Square theater, 35th street and Broadway. Charles Marentz was in charge of the projection, and it gives me pleasure to say that Mr. Marentz was delivering the goods. Light was brilliant, well handled, and with one exception there was nothing to criticise in the matter of speed. However, in the Hearst-Selig Weekly Pictorial News the Galveston automobile races were shown, and Marentz, I am sorry to say, was asleep at the switch. The projector, presumably motor driven, though I am not sure of that, pounded right along at the speed of some other event which preceded it, and which, while run at correct speed, required far less speed than the automobile races. The result was not exactly ridiculous, but it was anything but inspiring. Apparently those automobiles were jogging along at about the speed the editor drives his go-devil at ordinary travel. The obvious remedy, which should have applied, had the operator been "on the job" and alive to the possibilities of the scene, was to speed up the projector and put some life into that race. It is just these little things which mark the distinction between the union scale man and the man who gets thirty, thirty-five and forty dollars. Brother Marentz is, I believe, a good operator, but he will have to watch a little more closely if he wants to boost himself into above-the-scale class. Now, please understand this is not a roast, or it is not intended as such at least. I am glad to say that, outside of this one thing, the work was excellent. It was very good indeed, but there was that one fault, which, while it did not spoil the whole thing by any means, still it lowered friend Marentz out of the high class I had mentally placed him in before this scene came on, and brought him down to the "good operator" level. It is, of course, possible that Marentz was doing something else when this scene came on, but that is no valid excuse, because, harsh as it may seem, I make the unqualified assertion that the really high class man will refuse point blank to do anything else while a picture is being projected, if the doing of it is going to injure the result on the screen. The man who wishes to place himself in the high class, high salaried rank, must remember that he has a reputation which he has to build up and to maintain, and if he allows the manager to compel him to injure his work on the screen by trying to rewind films, or do other chores, while a picture is running, he is going to get some holes punched in that reputation pretty quickly.

Incidentally I want to mention the dissolving effect I saw used on the Lubin production, "The Old Army Coat." Many of the scenes in this film were dissolved into each other by stopping down and expanding the lens opening. This is no new stunt, but it is the first time I have seen it done in a way which was thoroughly pleasing. The effect in "The Old Army Coat" was, to my mind, very good indeed.

Another thing: while I was there the film, "When the Angelus is Ringing," was put on, accompanied by a singer, and the effect was simply splendid. It was roundly applauded by the audience, although at the end, where the words are thrown on the screen, the singer and the words were badly out of time. The manager claimed this was the fault of the operator, but he admitted he had a new singer. I disagree with him. The operator should not keep time with the singer, but the singer should keep time with the film instead. If the operator gauges his speed to the singer, then he cannot run the film in the best possible way. If the singer sings slowly the scenes will drag, and if he sings fast there will be trouble in the opposite direction.

Cannot Keep House Without It.

F. J. Wirtjes, Grand Junction, Iowa, encloses 25 cents for the question booklet and remarks:

> I have the latest Handbook and simply could not "keep house" without it.

All of which being entirely self-explanatory requires no comment from the editor.

Good Results.

Some time ago I described and illustrated an arc controller manufactured by the Speed Controller Company of New York City. Two of these devices have been installed in the Vitagraph theater on Broadway, where they have been operating for several months. I have been watching this proposition pretty closely and have several times talked with Max Burner, operator at the Vitagraph, who tells me that the machines are working perfectly, and that the results delivered are high class. Personally I can testify that the screen of the Vitagraph is free from shadows, and has a perfectly illuminated field at all times. In view of what I have seen at the Vitagraph I am prepared to make the unequivocal statement that these controllers are a success. No doubt they will come into popularity, and, particularly in the small towns, will prove their worth, because, by their use, screen illumination will undoubtedly be improved.

Friend Burner is pulling off a dissolving stunt which is excellent. On two or three occasions, in running multi-reel features, he dissolved one film into the next without the editor, who was seated in the balcony, knowing that the machines had been changed, and that is some stunt. Friend Burner says it is due mostly to the careful handling of the light, though, of course, the framing must be carefully attended to when threading.

License Laws.

Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada, says he bought a set of Hawkins' books and they are the best he has ever seen on matters electrical. He forwards a copy of "The Theaters and Cinematographs Act and the Act to Regulate the Means of Egress from Public Buildings and Rules and Regulations Thereunder." They start off with the usual piffle: "His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario, enacts as follows." It consumes twenty pages of matter about eight inches high by five inches wide in setting forth the regulations governing censorship and various other things relating to the moving picture industry in the Province of Ontario. As a matter of fact I don't believe "His Majesty" had one blooming thing to do with the framing of that law, or even knows there is such a law in existence. Wherefore the term piffle! But that has nothing to do with the excellence, or lack of excellence, of the regulations. That part of the law relating to operating matters consumes five pages of the aforesaid booklet, the really interesting parts being as follows:

> Every operator shall be of the full age of eighteen years. He shall examine his machine and lamp connections daily, and must devote his whole attention to the machine while operating. He shall not permit any person to enter or remain in the cabinet during any performance, except a Provincial or Municipal Police Officer, or the manager, the local fire chief, inspector, appointed under the provisions of the Act and such Municipal officer as is designated by the Council, or apprentice as hereinafter provided in these regulations. No operator shall be permitted to operate a moving picture machine or cinematograph machine while under the influence of liquor, and any operator operating a machine in violation of any of these regulations shall be held guilty of an offense under the Act, and any exhibitor permitting any operator to operate a moving picture, cinematograph or similar machine while the said operator is under the influence of liquor shall be held guilty of an offense under the Act. Every licensed operator may be accompanied in the cabinet by an apprentice. No such apprentice shall operate any moving picture machine, or cinematograph, except in the presence of a licensed operator, and any exhibitor, operator or user, within the meaning of these regulations, who permits any apprentice to operate any moving picture machine, cinematograph or similar apparatus, except under the foregoing conditions, shall be guilty of an offense within the meaning of the Act. 19. (a) An applicant for a moving picture operator's license shall have served as an apprentice to an operator for a length of time sufficient to satisfy the inspector, and shall submit to an examination by the inspector, who shall endeavor, through observation as well as questioning, to ascertain the candidate's competency, by testing his practical knowledge of the following subjects: (1) The handling of the lamp, appliances and wiring. (2) Wire sizes and insulations. (3) Testing for electrical defects in lamp and wiring. (4) The use of the various safety appliances, mechanical and electrical. (5) General precautions to be observed in operating moving picture apparatus and its connections. (b) No candidate who fails to pass an examination will be re-examined within one month of such examination. (c) A certificate shall be issued as promptly as practicable to each person who shall have passed the prescribed examination. (d) The Provincial Treasurer shall have the right to revoke or suspend a license for any of the following causes: (1) Failing to produce, on demand by proper official, operator's certificate where moving picture apparatus is being operated. (2) Smoking or permitting smoking in the booth at any time. (3) Reading while operating the machine, or having reading matter other than license and regulations in the operating cabinet. (4) Permitting an unlicensed person other than the manager or an authorized official or apprentice to be or remain in the booth while an audience is in the theater. (5) Having any film exposed in booth at any time, other than the one film in process of transfer to or from machine or from upper to lower magazine. (6) Allowing films to be rewound in booth while machine is being operated. (7) Over-fusing, or making improper electrical connections. (8) Lending a certificate to any other person, to enable the latter to operate. (9) Failing to test apparatus and connections prior to each performance. (10) Operating a defective machine. (11) Maintaining a dirty booth. (12) Latching door on inside, removing handle from outside of door or otherwise delaying access of authorized person. (13) Failing to report promptly to the Department the occurrence of any film fire, and the apparent cause thereof. 20. Any operator who shall operate or cause to be operated a machine which is not installed in accordance with the regulations, shall be deemed to have violated them.

There does not seem to be anything in the way of an innovation in this law. It has a sort of half-baked apprenticeship provision which does not make the serving of a stated period of apprenticeship necessary to the securing of a license. No doubt if the operators' union had taken the matter of apprentice up with "His Majesty," they would have secured a really efficient law, specifying, as the Massachusetts law does, a certain given period of time of apprenticeship as being necessary before the securing of a license. Section 6 of D Section 19 is good, in that it prohibits the rewinding of films in the operating room while a picture is being projected, since this will prevent the operator, at least to some extent, from trying to do two things at one and the same time, to the decided injury of one or both jobs. Failing to test apparatus before each performance is—well—is nonsense.

Section 3 prohibits having reading matter, other than license or regulations, in the operating cabinet, which means that machine instructions or books of instruction cannot be kept in the operating room—more nonsense. Had His Majesty excluded newspapers, magazines and books other than text books on operating, all right.

However, taken as a whole, the Ontario law is not bad. As least I do not see anything in it which equals some of the silly provisions of some of our United States laws, which gravely set forth the absolutely idiotic provision that observation ports must be not more than four inches wide by twelve inches high.

Whose Was It?

Williard Fait, Jr., Dixie theater, Baltimore, Maryland, wired the editor, and then wrote as follows:

> At the convention in Dayton there was an exhibit of a little device to attach to the jaws of the arc lamp, which enables one to burn the carbon to a very small piece. Can you give us the name of the manufacturer of this device?

I cannot. It has not been brought to the attention of the department, unless it is the device manufactured by a brother in New Orleans, La., and described in the department some time ago.

Machine Trouble.

P. D. Scott, manager Star theater, White Sulphur Springs, Montana, writes:

> I have a Powers Six A which I have used for two years without any trouble, other than supplying new belts. Recently, however, the governor of the automatic shutter has developed so much friction that one can hardly turn the crank, with the motor going also. Whether this is caused by the small springs becoming weak, or from some other cause I cannot say. I can find nothing in the Handbook as to how to reduce the friction, only how to increase it; nor have I noticed anything in the department on this point. I have remedied the trouble temporarily by plugging one brake shoe entirely, and the other partly, just so it will raise the shutter, but I do not consider this good practice. I wish you would also inform me, if you can, whether the Cameron projector is on the market as yet, or when it will be; also what will be its price?

With regard to the automatic shutter, undoubtedly the little coil springs which hold the shoe back have become weakened through long use. New springs ought to remedy the trouble, and I have taken the liberty of requesting the Nicholas Power Company to send you two springs C. O. D. parcel post, with instructions how to put them on. As to the Cameron, it is not yet on the market, though I had supposed it would be by this time. In fact, when the descriptive matter was written I understood it would be marketed immediately. I do not know what its price will be.

Has It His Own Way.

Earle H. Potter, Corona, California, writes:

> This is to let you know there is a little town away out here which sails under the name of Corona. I am a reader of the Moving Picture World, and the department is all to the good, except that you are too hard on some of the crankers that "don't know." For one thing I do not see the use of giving so much space to the way to setting the shutter. I think any man who cannot set the shutter of an up-to-date projector should get out of the business. I am operating at the La Corona theater (meaning Crown), and have been on the job for five years. Have installed three new projectors in that time, not that the old ones were worn out, but because my manager says we must keep up to date. Also, state secret, I am city electrician and have things pretty much my own way on the theater question in this town. However, joking aside, I believe every operator should be an electrician, and for that reason should read and study the department. Business is good here and (whisper) projection is of the best. Corona is in the greatest lemon growing colony in the world.

Your idea that the man who cannot set the shutter of a modern projector ought to get out of the business is quite correct, as applied to the cities, and even to the larger towns where operators can be and are employed. However, you lose sight of the fact, as many others do, that, first: there are an enormous number of little bits of villages where the owner must do his own operating or shut up shop, and, second: there are constantly new men entering the field, and unfortunately there is no law, so far as I know, with the single exception of the state of Massachusetts, requiring that the embryo operator serve an apprenticeship. Some day I hope we will get to the point where there will be no necessity of explaining and re-explaining simple fundamental matters, but that time has not yet come; and while I am on this subject let me say to you, Brother Potter, there is not one operator in fifty, take 'em as they come, who thoroughly understands the optical problems involved in the revolving shutter of a cinematograph. Your manager evidently is of the right sort.

Regarding Shock.

C. B. Stear, South Vancouver, British Columbia, contributes answers to questions 37 and 44 (the first came too late for consideration) and the following:

> Regarding "Shocking Discussion," issue August 8, a greater shock would be received across the terminals of the arc than across the terminals of the rheostat. If you touch the two carbons of an arc lamp when they are not in contact, or touch the binder posts of the lamp, you will get the full benefit of the entire voltage, whereas if the carbons be closed you won't receive much, if any, shock, since the resistance of the carbons will be so low as compared to that of the body that little or no current will pass through your arms. In the case of the rheostat, however, if you place the fingers of one hand across the rheostat terminals the current will divide in direct proportion to the conductivity of your hand as compared to the conductivity of the coils of the rheostat. So that, if the rheostatic resistance be higher than the resistance offered by your hand the latter will take most of the current, but if the condition be opposite you won't feel much, and perhaps no shock at all. Of course, no effect would be felt unless the arc was burning, or the carbons were frozen. Certainly you might get a shock when the carbons were separated and no current flowing, but it would then be a ground shock. In the case of the arc lamp terminals, however, with the carbons separated and the arc not burning you get it all, and when you break away an arc will form between your hand and the terminal, and you will, of course, get a burn.

Friend Stear (C. B. does not sign his name very plainly, but as nearly as I can make it out, "Stear" is it) has the right idea. In the case of the rheostat you might, or might not get a shock by touching the terminals, according to how much resistance the rheostat offers. Or you might get a shock by wetting the thumb and finger of one hand and touching the terminals with these fingers, and not get any shock at all by touching the terminals with either hand—one terminal with each hand—because the hand itself would offer considerable less resistance than would the two arms and the body. On the other hand if you close the switch of the projection lamp, leaving the carbons open, and then touch both terminals, you will get yours, and get it good and plenty too, because of the fact that you are forming a dead short circuit between two electrodes of opposite polarity, whereas by touching the poles of the rheostat you simply form a shunt circuit, and one having, ordinarily, resistance which is equal to or greater than that of the rheostat. Should you touch the carbons of the binding posts of an arc lamp when the arc is burning I do not think you would get any shock, since the rheostat is, under those conditions, reducing the voltage to such low value that it probably would not force any current through your hand: that is to say when the arc is adjusted to operating value. There are really quite a number of angles to this particular question.

He Sought a Position.

E. R. Hardwick of the Progressive Amusement Company, Clovis, New Mexico, contributes the following laugh. He writes:

> Greetings, First aid to operators! It is not often that I have anything that would particularly interest you or your readers. However, I guess here is one which will hold your honorable self and tickle the boys. Some sucker, cotton or pea picker came along this very evening. He had just arrived from Louisiana and wanted a position as operator. I was not needing an operator, having F. J. McCarty, who has had correspondence both with yourself and the department, and who is placing the finest picture in the state on my screen, bar none (that's saying a lot, but I know it is the truth), but I questioned him to find out something concerning Louisiana shows and operators. Question 1. What kind of a machine have you been running? Answer: I don't just remember. Question 2. Was it an optiograph? Answer: No, I don't think it was. Name some of 'em and I'll tell you which one it was. Question 3. Was it a Hallberg? Answer: No. But a man in my town had a Hallberg and I seen it. Question 3. Was it a complex? Answer: Yes, that's it. Some machine. Next. What kind of current were you using? Answer: I don't jes remembah, but I think it was mutual. Take him out!
> These are a few of the actual replies made, and we had fun with the boy for about thirty minutes. There should be a law restraining this sort of haphazard men who go into an operating room and practically steal the public's money. I say steal the public's money because the public pays to see a show, not, as you have so often set forth, a bunch of shadows.
> I have been working on and think I have succeeded in making a condenser mount which will do away with the breakage of that delicate piece of furniture. Have been trying it with success for several weeks and have not had a broken condenser in that time, where before they broke quite often. As soon as I have time to go to the lathe again will make another and send to you for approval. I would like, however, to ask this question. Do you think a man would be justified in patenting such a holder where there are already two on the market that are advertised as a success? I shall appreciate your opinion. When anything interesting occurs I shall be glad to correspond with the department which certainly is a boon to operators.

I think some fireworks will be due from that grand old state of Louisiana. However, it would be unfair to assume that this particular boob is a fair sample of Louisiana operator. As to the lens holder: No, Brother Hardwick, I do not think it would pay you to patent it, mainly by reason of the fact that as soon as the department got busy telling you about the San Francisco mount, machine manufacturers, or most of them, at once proceeded to get busy, and I believe that in new models of projectors the matter will be thoroughly taken care of, so that you could only hope to supply your mount to machines already in use, and with two excellent devices already on the market I doubt if the returns would pay the cost of patenting and marketing, to say nothing of producing a profit.

Sample Condenser Lenses.

That thoroughly reliable institution, the Kleine Optical Company, Chicago, Ill., has submitted to the department two of their plano-convex and one meniscus lens for examination. In the first place let me say that through years of right dealing the Kleine Optical Company has established a reputation for handling high class goods, and anything coming as a sample of Kleine Optical Company's goods has a strong recommendation before the package is opened. I know this is quite a bunch of roses to hand a dealer, but facts are facts, and the above company has earned kind words by years of straightforward business methods.

The lenses submitted are known as the Kleine White Label Condenser. The finish of these lenses is excellent indeed, the surface presenting a thoroughly polished appearance, and, so far as can be ascertained without actual measurements, a perfect curvature, two exceedingly important items. When the lens is looked through edgewise there is no trace of color, the glass being perfectly transparent. Presumably this grade of lens would have at least a fairly even density and have very little stratification. They should therefore produce a minimum of spherical aberration. The tendency, or lack of tendency of these lens to discolor could only be proven by actual test, of course, but I have no reason to suppose they will develop this fault.

The Kleine Optical Company also forwards its catalog, a very complete 174-page book, containing a full list of repair parts for Powers, Motiograph, Edison, Simplex and Edengraph machines, as well as lenses, rheostats, conductors, motor generator sets, stereopticons, seats, and other accessories in which the company deals.

Wants the "Bible."

M. F. Elliott, Ashtabula, O., says:

> Am inclosing money order for $2.50, for which please send me the "Bible," meaning, of course, the Handbook. I am getting a good picture, using two Powers Six A machines, projecting a 13-foot picture at 80 feet on an alabastine curtain, using 20 to 24 amperes, 110-volt a. c. through a G. E. rectifier. Use a. c. through an a. c. economizer to heat up the carbons and start the picture on the other machine on the change-over. This method works very well, and it is hard to tell when the change is made from a. c. to d. c., or vice versa. All equipment is new and working well, but I am positive that with the aid of the Handbook I can improve. Have operated before, and learned all I know by the hard school of practical experience and from an old operator who was a contributor to the department. By the way, I will enclose 25 cents in the money order for a copy of the questions. Some operators with whom I have talked claim that driving the Powers Six motor attachment is harder on the gears than driving off the fly wheel. How about it? I would also like to know how the film trap is fixed on the upper magazine if it, the magazine, is turned around so that the film can be inserted from the left side of the machine, as described on page 254, July 11th issue. In closing I wish to thank you for the department stepping stones toward perfect projection.

With regard to driving from the fly wheel, it is possible that the operators in question are correct, though I do not see any reason why that should be true, but regardless whether it is or not, when it comes to results on the screen I would very much prefer to have the gears worn than to have excessive wear on the cam-shaft bearing, and that is precisely what takes place when you drive the Powers Six from the fly wheel. My advice is to, by all means use the drive, and never belt from the fly wheel. As to the film trap, why you simply take it off, rivet a piece of metal over the hole in the magazine, and cut a new hole and install the trap in the proper place.

Wagon Advertising.

C. H. Glasser, Birmingham, Alabama, writes:

> It is desired to show stereopticon views from a vehicle moving slowly through the streets, throwing a picture on each of the canvas sides of the wagon, with the stereopticon located inside. Do you know whether or not this can be done? It would appear to be difficult to secure sufficient distance between the screen and lens, but it occurred to us that it may be done by some arrangement of mirrors. Please give me full instructions by mail. Enclosed find stamps for reply.

In other words Brother Glasser coolly asks me to put in an hour or so doping this proposition out, making measurements and drawings, and then consume the time of a stenographer taking dictation and all for the sum of 4 cents, two of which must go for postage. If Brother Glasser was the only one who asked this, all right. I could stand for it once, but I cannot stand for it 'steen times a day, therefore those wanting things of this kind will do exceedingly well to enclose $1.00. The 4 cents only brings a carbon copy of my reply on such matters as I can use or reply to in the department.

I do not think it would be possible to do what you propose, except that your wagon be a very small one or a very wide one. You could, of course, set two stereopticons side by side in the front end of the wagon, with two mirrors at the rear end angling forward to the center at 45 degrees, and if you have sufficient space to get in a mirror large enough, I presume the thing would work. However, I do not believe it would prove to be anything faintly resembling a huge success, and unless the streets be rather dark most certainly the pictures would not show up very well.

Works Like Magic.

Some weeks ago R. G. Kittel, Weaubleau, Missouri, told us how he went to a lime quarry and cut out his own limes. I suggested to him that he try the Guil Pastil, and he now writes:

> I wish to thank you for the information regarding the Guil pastil for calcium light. It works like magic. I don't see how it does it, but it makes the light very, very much better; in fact it makes a round spot on the film gate almost equal to electric light, and it has the electric light color, though it is not so strong as electric, of course. It is however, brilliant enough for any ordinary size picture, provided a brilliant screen, such as the mirror screen, be used, or one coated with silver or gold dust. Even though I had the best of limes this Guil Pastil is very much ahead of them.

All of which requires no comment, except to say that it will probably make Brother Lindall, who sells Guil Pastils, exceedingly angry—we don't think.

Setting the Lower Loop.

Tony Guglielmo, Union, New Jersey, says:

> In New York the operator is forbidden to rewind film in the operating room, and as the operator cannot leave the room there is a boy to rewind and do the patching. Now as a rule the aforesaid boy does not understand how to make good patches (And does not care two whoops in the New Jerusalem either.—Ed.) and therefore many splices are wrongly made, which will cause the operator who uses the film next more or less trouble. I will, therefore, try to tell those running the Simplex machine how to regain his lost loop and avoid a stop when the same is lost by reason of a poorly made splice. When the film runs off the sprocket, as quickly as possible place the left hand on the handle of the lower sprocket idler bracket, and place the knee against the lower reel so as to stop it. The film will shoot up, and quick as a flash pull up the lower sprocket idler, and the film will hit the crank shaft and come over the sprocket, whereupon drop the idler. All this must be done very quickly.

I have given Brother Guglielmo's letter space not because I agree with any such procedure, but for two reasons. First: because the brother wrote in good faith and tried to help his fellow operators. Second: because it gives me an opportunity to moralize a little.

In the first place, assuming that the above scheme will work, and I suppose it would, the operator would have to open the casing of the machine while the machine is in operation, a thing which would be absolutely against the rules in New York City, and would be absolutely wrong in any event, since during the time the casing is open all the precautions the Simplex Company have taken to prevent fire are nullified and made of no account. In the second place there is always a fine, large, juicy chance of injuring the film when performing a stunt of this kind. Of course, as the brother says, it is very bad to have to stop the machine in the middle of a show to reset the lower loop, but if the machine were equipped with a loop setter, stopping would be unnecessary. However, if there is any considerable amount of lower loop losing, even when running bad film, it is evidence there is something wrong besides the bad patches, probably too tight a tension on the take-up. Films ought not to be run at all when in bad condition, and the manager who allows them to be run is doing himself, the operator and his patrons an injustice. Of course it is quite difficult to avoid running reels that have bad patches, but it can be done just the same, in two ways; either by refusing to accept such reels from the exchange, and by having them inspected and repaired at the theater before they are run, in which case it would of course be only right and just to pay the operator extra for the time thus expended, since it is not up to the operator to repair reels of film which are received from the exchange in bad condition.

All Over Hades.

B. I. Williams, Fairmont, Minnesota, writes:

> In recent department notes I have seen mention of the Baird Projector, and have looked all over hades and part of North America for some dope on that particular machine. Can you furnish me the manufacturer's address? Also is it the same Baird who makes a specialty of parts? I try always to keep up-to-date, but some times it is a pretty hard job. Where is that $500 machine you promised us some time ago?

I guess by the time this is printed, Brother Williams, your search will be at an end, and your desire for up-to-datedness (a most laudable one) will, in so far, at least, as the Baird projector is concerned, be thoroughly satisfied. Yes, it is the same Baird, and the address is 24 East 23d street, New York City. The $500 machine I promised you is not ready yet, but the Baird is a $450 article, so I partly make good anyhow. The $500 article will be ready later.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

BILL'S BOY (Essanay), September 8.—This is a picture play that contains much of interest, illustrating that it is possible to be a real man, even though the person is a convict. Richard C. Travers and Gerda Holmes ably handle the leading characters. Harry Mainhall is the director and plays the part of Bill's Boy in manhood. Little Tommy Harper played the role in youth. There are several intense scenes occurring, through which a scientific theme permeates. It is a well-made picture in every respect.

A MOTHER'S ATONEMENT (Kalem), September 8.—In this picture Irene Boyle is featured in a dual role, that of a mother and daughter. The plot of this picture hinges onto a family mix-up, in which there is a tragedy averted by accidential circumstances. There is a suspense which holds the interest of the spectator to more than an ordinary degree. Isabelle Evesson and Robert Ellis are the leading supports. Acting and photography are adequate.

THE BLIND FIDDLER (Edison), September 8.—A very well constructed and excellent pictureplay. The plot is a fairy tale, concerning a blind fiddler. His beautiful playing charms all who hear it. The queen of the fairies is so entranced she promises to fulfil his greatest wish, which, of course, was to be endowed with sight. Dissatisfied with the conditions he views, he asks to be restored to his old condition. A good offering.

HEN FRUIT (Melies), September 8.—A boob, as a surprise to his wife, decides to whitewash the chicken coop while she is away from home. During the operation he steps into a steel trap set for thieves. The wife returns and, thinking he has gone fishing, goes in search of him. Not finding him, she imagines he has been drowned and is frantic. After doing several foolish things, through his vocal efforts, she is acquainted with his whereabouts. It makes laughs.

A TYPOGRAPHICAL ERROR (Selig), September 8.—A man almost makes a bigamist of himself through an item in a newspaper in which there is a typographical error. The word "divorced" being substituted for "devoted." Thinking he is really divorced he almost marfies another, but escapes by the skin of his teeth. This is a sort of modern "Comedy of Errors," labelled a drama.

THE BELLE OF BREWERYVILLE (Lubin), September 8.—The mayor of Breweryville's anger is aroused when he discovers an anarchist kissing the village belle. After a long chase the anarchist succeeds in dragging him into the lake which furnishes the water to the brewery that gives the town its name. This comedy is greeted with roars of laughter.

THE BAND LEADER (Vitagraph), September 9.—A rattling comedy in which Wally Van plays the part of the band leader, who is the rival for the affections of a pretty country girl (Lillian Herbert), with the owner of the pie factory, Hughie Mack. There is a laughable chase between the members of the band and employes of the pie factory, Wally wins the girl in a desperate sort of fashion, which brings out the fire brigade and police force, to say nothing of the ambulance. This is a howling comedy.

THE MAN IN BLACK (Selig), September 9.—This story tells of a girl who belongs to a refined family and who enjoys a social position. Unfortunately she is a kleptomaniac, and this fact is taken advantage of by a burglar, "The Man in Black," discovers her purloining articles from a department store. He plans a robbery and she, in assisting him, is struck on the head by the butler. The blow cures her of kleptomania. Her social position saves her, while the burglar meets his Waterloo.

THE FABLE OF THE HONEYMOON THAT TRIED TO COME BACK (Essanay), September 9.—This is another of George's Ade's funny ones, directed, as usual, by R. F. Baker. It starts off with a married couple who are enjoying themselves as some married couples do, peacefully as would a couple of wildcats. Hubby receives a book through the mail, "How to Make Your Home Happy." He starts to follow its teachings, with clothes, hats, candy and flowers, but she cannot see it that way, and beats it for home and mother, telling her that such things meant he loved another. Hubby follows and starts a fracas and finds that "bawling" beats the "soft stuff." This is greeted with great laughter.

GETTING ANDY'S GOAT (Edison), September 9.—Tenth of the "Adventures of Andy" series, by Mark Swan, directed by Charles H. France. The usual cast help Andrew J. Clark (Andy) along with the fun. Andy was lucky, or rather unlucky enough, to win a goat at a raffle, which he takes home to display to his mother. She makes objections; so does the goat. Andy can not convince anyone that he is a prize goat, but the much maligned pet redeems himself by accidentally finding a valuable lost package. It is a very laughable release.

BELLA'S ELOPEMENT (Vitagraph), September 10.—The author of this pictureplay is W. A. Tremayne and the directors are Robert Gaillord and Maurice Costello, the latter playing the leading part. The plot of this play develops a misunderstanding that causes an elopement, through the suspicion and jealousy of a wife, which almost leads to terrible consequences. Luckily she discovers her mistake, and by a death-defying ride in an auto, saves herself and husband from much sorrow.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 56 (Selig), September 10.—A pictorial review of topical happenings of a superior nature, including many martial scenes.

SNAKEVILLE'S MOST POPULAR LADY (Essanay), September 10.—Produced by R. S. Clements. This is a comedy in which Victor Potel, Harry Todd and Margaret Joslin figure in a popularity contest, which is held for the benefit of the Snakeville church. Slim buys votes for Sophie and Mustang champions a Spanish beauty. They both go broke and the prize goes to another girl. Sophie and the Senorita shake Slim and Mustang, blaming them for their defeat.

THE NEW REPORTER (Biograph), September 10.—A newspaper story concerning politics. The owner of the newspaper is a candidate for mayor, defies the political boss and proclaims for a clean city. When the paper runs short of reporters, the editor's sweetheart, daughter of the owner, covers the assignment, bringing victory to the paper and confusion to the political boss. Claire McDowell, Charles West, W. J. Butler and Frank Evans play the leading parts. The punch is a fire scene. A good offering.

A STUDY IN FEET (Vitagraph), September 11.—Here is something that is worth seeing. It was manufactured by Edward Montague and Captain Harry Lambert put in the expression. Darwin Karr, Edwina Robbins and Marion Henry furnish the feet. Of course, you have to guess who's is which. It is certainly well done and causes continuous laughter. It is hardly believeable that so much expression can be got out of "just feet."

OH LOOK WHO'S HERE! (Selig), September 11.—A married couple, who have become dissatisfied with their condition in life, decide to separate and change occupations. He obtains work on a farm, to plough and sow, and reap and mow, whether he likes it or not. The wife succeeds in gaining a position on the police force. Each decides, after a strenuous trial, that they will try it all over again together, and conclude that after all there is no place like home. A good lesson in this.

SQUARING THE TRIANGLE (Lubin), September 11.—A young eastener goes West to take charge of the ranch which he has inherited. Under an assumed name he obtains a position as stable boy, then he discovers plenty of evidence that the foreman is a grafter. Eventually he marries the foreman's daughter and fires him off the place. The acting is adequate and the many ranch scenes are brightly photographed.

HAM, THE LINEMAN (Kalem), September 11.—A comedy by Marshal Neilan and Ruth Roland. Lloyd V. Hamilton has the title role, with Ruth Roland playing opposite. Ham was a telephone lineman inclined to be flirtatious, he gets into trouble of all sorts through his bad habit. He flirts with a married woman and outdistances the bullets fired at him by the husband. Later, while repairing the telephone, he saves the house from robbery but his presence is misunderstood by the husband, who shot at him before. Explanations occur and the husband offers to shake hands, but Ham takes no chances. A funny and well-acted comedy.

DICK POTTER'S WIFE (Edison), September 12.—A modern fairy story, by Frank Hart, Ashley Miller director. This is a fantastic story, but many wives, if they look closely, will find a real lesson hidden in it. A wife makes her husband unhappy over continual worries, she does not realize that she has almost driven him to distraction over petty trifles. When he tries to smoke she opens the window, if he puts his feet on a chair, she places a piece of paper under them. Finally he tells her that worrying is making lines on her face. Thinking she is ageing, she buys a philter from an old gypsy, takes an overdose and becomes a little girl. The experiences she meets with before she is cured are something wonderful.

BRONCHO BILLY, A FRIEND IN NEED (Essanay), September 12.—A western drama, showing how Broncho Billy saves a girl from being robbed by a gang of criminals. Written and produced by G. M. Anderson. A girl is left alone in a store by her father and is custodian of quite a sum of money. Broncho Billy enters the store and she mistakes him for an outlaw. He finally proves to her that she is deluded, saves her and the money and captures the real outlaw.

THE SECRET NEST (Biograph), September 12.—It is only natural for a young couple to spend their honeymoon in their own sweet way; uninterrupted by jollying friends and disgruntled parents. So they steal a march on everyone, innocently, but their actions are misconstrued as sinister. The bride's father takes it upon himself to mix up matters, and the result is shown in an absorbing and amusing manner.

THE PATH TO RUIN (Kalem), September 12.—This is quite an absorbing drama, featuring Irene Boyle, supported by Robert Ellis and Cecil Ryan. This is a rather conventional plot and has been used numberless times, the theme being two lovers and one girl. She marries the worthless one, of course. Fate brings them all together in after years and the discarded lover proves his worth. This picture is identical with another produced not so long ago. It is well made and acted and contains a good brokerage scene.

HE NEARLY WON OUT (Lubin), September 12.—The comedy in this story gains considerable laughter. A henpecked and discouraged husband attempts to commit suicide, but finds the water too cold. He leaves his coat by the lake and his wife mourns her loss. The latter part is rather illogical, but the husband "comes out of the big end of the horn." On the same reel with "Too Many Aunts."

TOO MANY AUNTS (Lubin), September 12.—On the same reel with "He Nearly Won Out." Auntie writes she is coming to visit her nephew and he invites his sweetheart to come over to meet her, then receives word that she is not coming. He writes a note to a friend to impersonate his aunt. The note is read by his sweetheart and her father. They put up a job on him, and when auntie arrives there are four of her.

THE MISSING PAGE (Selig), September 12.—A missing page in a letter is responsible for the trouble that occurs in the working out of the plot of this story. A physician's wife adopts the stage. He becomes famous in his profession. Time passes and he believes his wife dead. On the eve of his marriage to a nurse, his wife arrives and spoils the plans. The picture is well done, but lacks conviction.

THE MAN WHO KNEW (Vitagraph), September 14.—This picture-play was written by Margaret Strickland and produced by William Humphrey, who plays the leading character. Leah Baird plays opposite Mr. Humphrey. There is a peculiar admixture of scenes, interesting and logical and those contrary to sound reasoning. A girl cannot resist the temptation of retaining a valuable pendant which accidently falls into her possession. Her conscience forces her to return it. "The Man Who Knew" that she took it discovers that she has returned it. The circumstances pertaining gains his love, and he makes her his wife.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 57 (Selig), September 14.—Many interesting events are shown, such as military target shooting by the N. J. National Guards, the passing of the Honolulan (first vessel) through the Panama Canal, bound from Los Angeles for New York; departure of the "Red Cross" with the surgeons and nurses for aid in the European war, Big Sneeze Congress of hay fever sufferers, at Bethelem, N. H.; Working Girls Frolic at Camp Bluefields, scenes in London showing the mobolization of troops, etc.

THE JOBLOT RECRUITS (Essanay), September 14.—A really funny slapstick comedy with the scenes laid in the studio. The Essanay Company advertises for recruits to appear in a comedy police department. They must qualify by agreeing to do as they are told to do, fall down stairs, jump out of windows, be slammed with eggs, pies, etc. One recruit draws the line on eggs and is fired; to avenge himself he floors the director with a huge mallet. It gains many laughs.

BUSTER BROWN ON THE CARE AND TREATMENT OF GOATS (Edison), September 12.—From the famous cartoons by R. F. Outcault. This is another of the funny ones in which Buster and his pals, Mary Jane and Tige, also the goat, figure. A piece of flypaper placed on his father's chair at the breakfast table creates a lot of comedy, in which his father and mother are mixed up. In the latter scenes the goat plays the leading part, and Buster decides there are some things about goats that he has yet to learn.

GENERALS OF THE FUTURE (Edison), September 14.—A visualization of graduation week at the U. S. Military Academy, West Point, New York. Numerous interesting views are shown which are calculated to give one a thrill of patriotism. Scenes showing the review of the cadet battallion by the Hon. Lindley A. Garrison, Secretary of War. Dress parade, cavalry drill, artillery drill and infantry drill illustrate the extraordinary precision acquired. The closing scenes show the calisthenic exercises, the raising of shelter tents and backing into them as the bugal sounds "Taps."

THE BACKSLIDER (Biograph), September 14.—A picture drama that is cram full of human nature and heart interest. It fully illustrates the comparison between hypocrisy and unpretentious sympathy displayed by one who is looked upon as a grouchy recluse. The acting of all in the cast is exceptionally fine, including a chubby little baby. The author is to be complimented for producing a most appealing plot.

THE CRICKET ON THE HEARTH (Biograph), September 8.—This two-part pictureplay was reviewed at length by Louis Reeves Harrison in the Moving Picture World, and will be found on page 1216, issue of August 29, 1914.

AS WE FORGIVE THOSE (Lubin), September 9.—A two-part drama with a plot out of the ordinary, but it contains little of wholesomeness. It is the story of a runaway wife, and the husband searches for the man whom he thinks enticed her away, but who, in reality, has used every endeavor to prevent her elopement with another. The complications are very interesting and his vengeance is stayed at the critical moment.

THE FUSE OF DEATH (Kalem), September 9.—A two-part western drama featuring Princess Mona Darkfeather, directed by Frank E. Montgomery. It is the story of the west located in the gold mines, discovered upon land owned by the Hopi Indians. It is full of intrigue, treachery, etc., concocted by a white man. There are hazardous escapes. The scenery and photography are exceptional. The blowing up of a cabin in the last scene is a meritorious feature.

ON LONESOME MOUNTAIN (Lubin), September 10.—A pretentious two-part drama which starts off in a rather conventional way, with a wild son whose father repudiates him as a good-for-nothing. A dishonest butler robs the safe and plants evidence that incriminates the son. The only friend he has left is his mother, who owns a tract of timber land in the Kentucky mountains, and she sends him there to take charge of the land. The scenes then shift to the moonshine country. The natives, having occupied the land for a number of years for their illicit stills, rebel at his intrusion. A love affair occurs between the boy and the daughter of the chief clansman, and many strenuous scenes take place. For a melodrama of this order it is rather superior in all respects.

THE DEVIL'S SIGNATURE (Essanay), September 11.—A two-part picture drama that contains a plot, that bears the stamp of originality. It is adapted from a story published in the Munsey Magazine. It is a really great mystery drama—a story that is full of realism, thrills and shudders, especially in the last reel. The mystery part of it puzzles the spectator and keeps him guessing as to how it is all going to end. It is a picture that is well acted and the photography deserves mention.

FACE VALUE (Edison), September 11.—An adaption of the story which appeared in the Popular Magazine, by W. B. M. Ferguson. It is in two parts. George A. Lessey is the director. Ben Wilson is featured, supported by a strong cast, which is large in numbers. The plot develops the fact that one man takes up the identity of another to save a legacy. Shortly after the agreement, the legal legatee dies. There are many complications occur in this picture, which vamp around, after involving most of the characters, into an entirely unexpected outcome. The suspense exists to the closing of the last scene, which develops pleasingly.

HE DANCED HIMSELF TO DEATH (Vitagraph), September 12.—This two-part release was reviewed at length by Hanford C. Judson in the Moving Picture World, and can be found on page 1082, issue of August 22, 1914.

YE VENGEFUL VAGABONDS (Selig), September 14.—A spectacular dramatic tragedy of Pilgrim days, written by James Oliver Curwood, featuring Stella Razeto and Guy Oliver. This picture deserves to be placed in the same category with far more heralded and pretentious releases. Its historical value is paramount, saying nothing of its splendid direction. A scene showing the ducking of the village vagabond and a supposed witch, was well executed and impressive. The stockade scenes, where an immense tribe of Indians makes an attack on the settlers, who, at the critical moment, are assisted by a friendly contingent of another tribe rival to the former one, is a thrilling feature. At least three or four hundred people were utilized in this conflict. This can be recommended as a superior release.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SLEEPING DEATH (Kalem), September 14.—This two-part pictureplay was reviewed at length by Hanford C. Judson in the Moving Picture World, and can be found on page 1487, issue of September 12, 1914.

Independent

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, Series No. 34 (Reliance), August 24.—This begins a new episode, written by Carolyn Wells, which promises to be quite entertaining. Margaret finds a baby girl in her auto, the mother having abandoned it because of poverty. The girl now undertakes the problem of caring for it.

HIS NEW PROFESSION (Keystone), August 31.—Chas. Chaplain entertains the observer in this number with a lot of new eccentric comedy. The plot is only sufficient to hang a number of amusing antics on. Some of the situations are very funny and this will please admirers of slapstick fun.

THE BAGGAGE SMASHER (Keystone), September 3.—This low comedy number concerns the efforts of two men to get into the room of the young wife. One arrives inside the trunk and the other carrying it. The husband appears and some knockabout scenes occur. This is a fair offering.

A BRAND-NEW HERO (Keystone), September 5.—Roscie Arbuckle, the Fat Boy, appears in this number as a tramp. He saves a girl from drowning in a pond and is given a job on the police force. A jealous officer dopes him and he sleeps during a robbedy, but afterwards wakes up and captures the miscreants. Rapid-fire eccentric comedy of an amusing sort.

LITTLE MISCHIEF (Thanhouser), September 6.—A pretty little film story taken from the well-known poem of the same title. The Thanhouser Kidlet spends the day at home alone and has a high time breaking ornaments, eating jam, bathing in the tub and the like. The cook arrives and finishes the bath for her. A very attractive child picture.

ROUNDERS (Keystone), September 7.—A picture of a "glorious" drunk and of two wives who try to mend matters. There is plenty of funny action and, though it is of the kind that one can't help laughing at, one is, nevertheless, not flattered by it. It's a rough picture for rough people, that people, whether rough or gentle, will probably have to laugh over while it is on the screen.

ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 131, September 9.—Shipping grain from this country to Great Britain, the wireless station at Sayville, the recent Women's Peace Parade, the first warship passing through Panama Canal; these are a few items in this very interesting number.

SIS (Princess), September 11.—"Sis" is a clown, rube girl, who inherits a fortune and is taken by cultured relatives who make a "real lady" of her. The picture aims at sentiment. The girl finds that in her good clothes she isn't "Sis" any more to the old people on the farm. When she and her husband visit the old place she puts on her old clothes and plays the gawk again to show the old folks that she loves them. But the players caricature their parts and this keeps it from being convincing, while all that it gets in return is rough, broad humor for the gallery.

THE PRODIGAL HUSBAND (Royal), September 12.—This is the story of a farmer who goes to town, sells his produce and gets on a jag. He has some varied experiences and arrives home supposedly sick. The doctor is called. The plot of this offering is rather thin and the humor not very effective.

BILL GOES INTO BUSINESS FOR HIMSELF (Komic), September 13.—This sixth of the "Bill" series shows the office boy and the gum-chewing stenographer set up a quick lunch counter at noon. The boss and janitor put an end to the plan. Some amusement in this, though the plot is not so strong as in several previous offerings of the series.

THE EMPEROR'S SPY (Thanhouser), September 13.—This features a girl in the part of a spy attempting to obtain certain information for a foreign country. She makes love to a young army captain and steals the papers and restores them in the same way. The plot of this is a mere incident" and none too convincing at the close. The girl's motive for restoring the papers was not brought out strongly. The photography is acceptable.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO 33, September 14.—The script by Carolyn Wells offers in the present number little real action. Norma meets

John Hayes Hammond and his son Jack, both of whom have wonderful inventions to show her and incidentally us. The girl who makes kewpies is also shown in this number.

THE ONLY WAY (Beauty), September 15.—There is a certain boldness required to develop to the situation which closes this picture and surely no one will call the story trite. It is one of those pictures that are surely out of the beaten path and the action is not impossible, but it is rather bald and startling though, having real substance, it might, perhaps, be worked up in a two-reel film to be tremendously effective with the punch of convincing truth in it. Girl refuses elderly lover. Her sailor sweetheart, who was to marry her as soon as the voyage was done, is wrecked. She, a prospective mother, goes to the elderly man who loves her and tells him all. He marries her. In a few months, after the child is born, the first man comes back.

THE DANGER LINE (Nestor), September 16.—Written and produced by Henry McRay, this picture tells of a white slave house from which a too confiding girl is given a chance to escape while the inmates, all of them, are in a tremendous row. The row and free-for-all fight is the one thing in the picture. The ending is too weak to be truly acceptable after the lively action that the scrap affords.

THE MIRROR (American), September 16.—A detective story with a mysterious veiled woman who burglarizes houses and baffles the police for a time. The picture fools us by making us think that the woman is a certain character, played by Winnifred Greenwood, while really it is an entirely different person. It interests, but there is not much punch in it.

THE GIRL AND THE SMUGGLER (Victor), September 18.—Irene Wallace and Walter Miller appear in this story with a lighthouse setting. The hero is a revenue officer who has trouble with smugglers; at the close the girl saves him from death on the burning dock. The photography is very uneven in this and the story only fairly interesting.

THE MASTER HAND (Princess), September 18.—The story of a well-dressed crook, who is first seen stealing jewels in a man's house. The young detective meets Betty, the crook's daughter, who, of course, does not know her father's profession. This plot has been used before and is here handled only fairly well. The photography is good.

THE HORSE TRADER (Royal), September 19.—The story of a balky horse and a rival courtship between the buyer and another old fellow. The buyer of the horse takes Mrs. Jones for a ride, but the horse balks. The rival drives up and takes her with him; after that there are frequent exchanges. This is a homely type of humor and has been worked over pretty well in other productions. It is fairly entertaining.

THE METTLE OF A MAN (Thanhouser), September 20.—Harry Benham in this number portrays the secretary of a corrupt political boss, whom he holds in deadly fear. But his nerve comes up when he learns how the boss has railroaded the girl's father to the penitentiary. This makes quite a pleasing offering. The photography is good.

THE CROSS (Rex), September 20.—This story, based on a poem by Minnie M. Rasmus, from which extracts serve as subtitles, shows Pauline Bush in the part of a nun. She has worn a cross on the floor of her cell in repenting for the death of a child whose life she could have saved. Later she dies upon this cross. This has a mournful touch, though it fortunately escapes being morbid. It is beautifully pictured and sincerely handled throughout.

A ROSE OF YESTERDAY (Frontier), September 20.—The opening scene in this, where the young Easterner accidentally shoots the girl's rose from its stem, is pleasing. Later the girl shoots her lover by mistake. This scene contains big dramatic interest, but was handled too quickly to get the most out of it. The plot of this is good for a tragic story, but it was not very skillfully presented.

SON (Eclair), September 20.—This is not a powerful story, but it is to be particularly commended for its manner of presentation. The story might have been entirely obvious, but the scenes are so arranged as to keep the observer wondering just what is going to happen next. This gives an air of freshness to the plot, which, in fact, has a familiar theme. Alec Francis, Belle Adair and Chester Barnett are among those in the cast.

HE LOVED THE LADIES (Keystone), September 21.—The husband pretends to go to New York, but really remains in town and goes to a restaurant with a companion and some girls. Later his wife appears with a man. They find each other and a scene ensues. This is well photographed, but it is not very novel in plot and the humor is not very strong.

IN AND OUT (Sterling), September 21.—A number in which Max Asher appears as a grocer at war with his neighbor, the butcher. Real stores are used in the settings. They get into a quarrel and their wives follow suit. Egg throwing is the chief diversion. This is fairly humorous.

THE DEER HUNTER (Universal Ike), September 22.—This is the familiar story of the English gentleman on a ranch in new form. The boys dress Shorty up as a deer and play a joke on the visitor while hunting, but with the aid of the girl the tables are turned. Louise Glaum and Ray Gallagher play the leads. For an old idea this is presented in an entertaining way and has quite a lot of humor in it. The photography is good.

EAST LYNNE IN BUGVILLE (Crystal), September 22.—A comedy reel in which the well-known play, "East Lynne," is burlesqued. There are some funny characterizations in this, but the plot was not given a very good start; this is usually necessary, even in a burlesque, in order to hold the attention. Some of the latter scenes are quite funny.

JANE'S LOVERS (Joker), September 23.—A rube character story, with Ernest Shields and company appearing. Jane is a hired girl and her lovers mix it with pitchforks and croquet mallets. The photography is good and the situations amusing from the standpoint of low comedy.

FOR THE HAND OF JANE (Joker), September 23.—Ernest Shields and company appear in another "rube" stunt. Instead of slapsticks he uses a croquet mallet for laying out the protesting relatives of the girl and afterward brings them to with a hose. This is just as funny as low comedy can be made, and will bring roars of laughter from lovers of that class of films.

THE HALF-BREED (Nestor), September 23.—An old-time Western Indian story, with plenty of action and fighting scenes. Sherman Bainbridge plays the scheming half-breed. There are some thrills in the war scenes and later when the house is fired and the wife and child are in peril. No particular novelty about this, but it is lively and consistent.

LITTLE SISTER (Rex), September 24.—A number featuring Robert Leonard, Ella Hall and Harry Carter. Leonard plays the part of a dissolute brother who finally rises to the occasion when his sister's honor is assailed. The settings in this picture portray low life, and we have seen the principals in much more attractive scenes. The story is well constructed, however.

THE NEW JANITOR (Keystone), September 24.—A ripping good comedy number, with Chas. Chapman playing the part of the janitor. He interpolates a lot of his inimitable funny business and the plot is better than usual. It contains a mixture of suspense and humor. A very good offering.

BE NEUTRAL (Powers), Sept. 25.—A timely picture based on President Wilson's admonition to refrain from war arguments. The members of the Universal companies, assisted by the police and fire departments of Los Angeles, have shown here a whole neighborhood in a general row because somebody started war talk. The story is slight but has a good idea back of it.

THE ACTRESS (Powers), September 25.—A film story by James Dayton, with Edna Maison in the leading part. She appears as an actress who hires out as a maid in order to get herself locked in jail and have other experiences of the sort. More suspense could have been achieved in many of the scenes, as the plot is quite clever. The photography is good, but the situations were handled too mechanically.

FATTY'S DEBUT (Keystone), September 26.—Fatty comes home in a mild state of intoxication. He takes a bath, with considerable difficulty, and goes to the theater with his wife and her mother. Here he butts into the play, saves the heroine from the villain, and cleans up the entire company. This is well photographed and has some amusing business in it.

FATE'S FINGER (Eclair), September 27.—In this number the wife of a physician fancies herself neglected and plans to elope with another man. A friend interferes and she returns home believing her husband has found the note of farewell she left him. Mildred Bright, as the wife, does some very good emotional work in the scenes following her return. The photography is good and the story holds the interest.

Independent Specials

A RURAL ROMANCE (Princess) August 14.—A two-reel number, written jointly by T. H. Ince and R. V. Spencer. This tells the perennial story of the young man who leaves his country sweetheart for the city, marries an actress who proves untrue, is injured and taken home, where the old love returns. The story is well constructed and splendidly photographed. The cast is also a good one. The country scenes are idyllic. These things all tend to make the production a success in spite of the familiar theme.

THE COCOON AND THE BUTTERFLY (American), September 9.—A two-reel picture telling a likeable story with quite a "pipe-dream" taste. Young man (Harry Von Meter) gets a job incognito in drygoods department store that he has just inherited and sees how goatishly his manager conducts business. There's a romance, of course, and it is plain that the author is a tender-hearted person, with a good touch of sentiment and romance in his or her makeup. The girl is played by Vivian Rich.

BROKEN-NOSE BAILEY (Reliance), September 12.—This two-reel crook story is a companion picture to "Blue Pete's Escape," though its own story is complete. Eugene Pallette appears as a young rough, whose nose becomes broken in an effort to escape from Burton, the detective. Later he and his gang capture the detective's wife and he threatens to burn her face with acid for revenge. Billie West plays the part of the wife. This story, as will be seen, has no very strong motive back of it, yet it is well constructed, well photographed and runs along in an entertaining way. It deals with the seamy side of life without being too gloomy.

OUR ENEMY'S SPY (101 Bison), September 12.—This is a strong three-part picture drama with a military flavor. Working upon the weakness of an American officer, a foreign spy almost succeeds in obtaining valuable papers, which he thinks the man's rival is carrying. In the end right triumphs, and, jumping over the cliff, the traitor commits suicide. The acting is well done and the many scenes finely photographed. The director deserves credit for his exceptional work.

THE FINAL VERDICT (Majestic), September 13.—A two-reel Western offering, dealing with the early days of the West when lynch law reigned. Joe is first seen committing a cold-blooded murder in a saloon. Later he commits a series of good and bad acts, the motives being so intermingled that the observer is puzzled. It is not till he is urged to tell his story when the cowboys are about to hang him that a reason for the shooting is given. The story goes a long way to justify the crime. This is finely photographed. The story itself is of a familiar type, but has been constructed in a way that gives it quite a novel effect. It makes a fairly strong offering.

GOLD (Thanhouser), September 15.—A two-reel offering of the made-up type which does not get over very strongly, and yet proves quite entertaining in its way. The old mountaineer, fearing the bank is not safe, draws his fortune out in gold. A renegade learns of this and goes to the mountaineer's home after pushing him down a high cliff. The placing of the gun, with string attached, before the girl, was melodramatic and not very convincing business. The young surveyor comes and saves the girl. The gun then goes off and kills the renegade and exposes the hiding place of the gold at the same time. The photography is good and the offering fairly strong.

MOCK ROSE (Gold Seal), September 22.—This eighth number of the 'Trey o' Hearts" series continues the very complicated tangle of events. Considering the double impersonations and mixed trend of the story, the director, Wilfred Lucas, has succeeded in making the story surprisingly clear to one who follows it constantly. This number is fairly bursting with improbabilities, but holds the attention. The two girls become interchanged and Judith succeeds in marrying Law before he discovers she is not Rose. The rescue from the burning house was a good feature.

THE AZTEC TREASURER (Eclair), September 23.—This two-reel number with a Mexican setting is brilliantly pictured and has a fine historical flavor. It pictures the adventures of an American soldier of fortune, portrayed by Robert W. Frazer. Edna Payne is the girl. She is the daughter of Juan, guardian of the Montezuma treasure. The story concerns the efforts of the heartless governor to get hold of both the girl and the treasure. In the end the hero gets the girl and the gold reverts to the people. This is a strong offering.

KID REAGAN'S HANDS (Rex), September 24.—This is a very good two-reel story of the prize ring, written by Harry Carr. Herbert Rawlinson appears as the young boxer, who knocks out his adversary in a lively two-round bout. Anna Little appears as the young widow, with whom he is in love. The atmosphere of the production is particularly commendable; it tells a brisk sporting story without the usual offensive scenes. Besides this, the plot is genuinely interesting. After the fight The Kid is not so particular with his hands and proceeds to take vengeance on his enemies, bare-handed. A good sporting yarn.

THE TEST OF THE FLAME (Domino), September 24.—This is a pretty story of an old man who loved his violin and grandchild almost equally well, but when the fire occurs his heart turns to the child. The fore part of the story is conventional, showing how the daughter married against the old man's wishes, but in the later scenes this gets quite a strong hold on the hearts of observers. The fire scene was well staged and the appearance of the child with the violin after its supposed death was very effective. In spite of its formal opening this rises to a fine climax and has a touch of real heart interest in it.

THE DEATH MASK (Kay Bee), September 24.—A fine two-reel offering of tribal lore, brilliantly handled by Tsuri Aoki and two bands of Indians. The settings are familiar, but the story enters so perfectly into the spirit of Indian legends that it is unusually interesting. It shows how Running Wolf, dreaming always of his love in the Far North, goes forth to meet the strange band of the three brothers. He slays two of the brothers in hand-to-hand conflict, but the wearer of the death mask turns out to be the girl herself. We think this is an adaptation from an old fairy tale. The storm scene in this is splendidly shown and the whole production is alive with interest.

ELSIE'S UNCLE (Victor), September 25.—A two-reel girls' school story, in which the hero impersonates the heroine's uncle in order to get her away from the institution. The plan succeeds, but later the real uncle appears and all land in the police station. The plot of this seemed too light and too obvious for a two-reel offering. Even if told in one reel the story would not be a very strong one.

BUNGLING BUNK'S BUNKO (Eclectic).—This is a three-reel animal comedy made by the American Pathe Company. It is a story of a man who, to win a woman, poses to her as a mighty hunter, as one who would emulate, or rather had emulated, the exploits of a famous American, which he proved by photograph showing him in hunting costume standing over a very dead lion. The skeptical young woman wanted to see the lion. The fun begins here. The picture will make good entertainment throughout.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY, Series No. 14 (Thanhouser).—In this two-reel instalment the conspirators plant some counterfeit money in Florence's home. A pretended arrest is then made, so quickly they enter the house and search for the million. The closing scene, where the police are slid down a fake stairway, was a good one. The number is not exceptional in any way, but continues the interest in the story.

MOTHER (World Film).—A three-part special from the play of same name by Jules Eckert Goodman and featuring Emma Dunn in the titular role, a part she made famous on the stage and fills with distinction in the picture. The story is of a family, once rich and burdened with expensive habits, that has, on the death of the father, become poor. The central interest is the strenuous fight the mother makes before her family truly realizes its position and gets down to commonsense's hard pan. The mother wins. It is a big theme and has been handled effectively and makes a good offering. Many of the characters give good support to the leading woman, but not all. The old cook, the adventuresses with whom the older boys become infatuated, the elderly lawyer and the sisters and twins are distinct assets and are nearly the whole cast. The older son is a good actor, but this is not a perfect role for him. Many of the lesser figures are also good.

THE PHANTOM OF THE VIOLIN (Universal).—A four-reel production of a wierd, uncanny sort, written by Grace Cunard and produced by Francis Ford, who also play the leading roles. The opening scenes picture the manner in which Rosa falls in love with the young violinist and comes to live with him, the scene being Paris. He plays in a cabaret and she gradually is lured into the gay night life. Two reels are devoted to these opening scenes, which could readily have been shown in one The story begins after the girl leaves the violinist. He finds a secret passageway into the cellar of the cabaret. Here he goes mad and plays the air he composed. He drags the girl and her lover into his lair and they, in turn, go mad. These scenes do not possess much genuine feeling and the tone of the production is not the best.

DINNER FOR DANIEL GILFETHER.

Major Daniel Gilfether, approaching his sixtieth year, of which forty years has been spent on the stage, is to be tendered a dinner by his friends among the Balboa players at Long Beach, Cal. The Major appeared first with Frank Mayo in "Davy Crockett" and he has been all along the line. He is a member of Elk's Lodge No. 1 of New York.

Lubin Has a Train Wreck

Trains Crash Head-On to Make a "Movie" Scene—Freight and Passenger Come Together with Roar, Smashing Cars and Engines.

Two trains, one of them an engine and three passenger coaches, and the other an engine and seven freight cars, both running at a rate of 35 miles an hour, collided, as planned, on the Pittsburgh & Susquehanna Railroad on Wednesday afternoon, Sept. 9, and furnished the star attraction of Phillipsburgh's (Pa.) three-day celebration as well as a moving picture film which was promoted by the Lubin Film Company.

Between 6,000 and 7,000 spectators witnessed the novel sight, and there were 600 automobiles lined up outside the roped-off collision grounds. Considerable delay was caused by the difficulty in getting the engines both speeded so that they would meet at the desired point, and it was 5 o'clock before both engines were started for the last time.

The crash came at the point designated, and the engines met in a mighty roar, reared in the air and then for a minute escaping steam enveloped the wreck. Both engines were a tangle of twisted iron and splintered wood. One passenger coach was squeezed up like a closed accordian, the car seats being thrown to the east side of the track. Part of the frame of the car had crawled over the passenger engine. Three of the freight cars were also badly wrecked.

Cameramen of the Lubin Company, which staged and directed the collision as the climax of a railroad drama, say the conditions were right for obtaining a perfect film.

Max Figman in "What's His Name"

SAMUEL GOLDFISH, head of the Lasky Feature Play Company, announced recently that he and Mr. Lasky would, when the season was in full swing, make a stage production of George Barr McCutcheon's "What's His Name," which Max Figman and Lolita Robertson just completed as a motion picture. This is the first time a book has been done in motion pictures before the legitimate production.

Max Figman.

Max Figman and Lolita Robertson, who were featured by the Lasky people in "The Man On the Box," have been engaged by Mr. Goldfish for the stage production and will be co-stars in that production.

"What's His Name" is a stage romance and was picturized by Cecil B. De Mille from McCutcheon's novel, which, as the best seller of its period, enjoyed even wider popularity than "Brewster's Millions," by the same author. Miss Robertson was a prominent member of the all-star cast of "Fine Feathers" and before that, appeared in "The Man On the Box," in which Mr. Figman also starred.

"What's His Name" will be released by the Lasky Company October 12 through the Paramount Pictures Corporation and rehearsals on the stage production will begin immediately upon the return of Mr. Figman and Miss Robertson from the Lasky studios at Hollywood.

George Barr McCutcheon, the novelist, will aid in the writing of the manuscript of "What's His Name" and Mr. Lasky will aid in the staging of the piece.

Broadway Rose Gardens Open

A New and Unique Place of Entertainment on Broadway—It was One of the Favored Projects of the Late President of the Thanhouser Corporation—Opening Night a Succession of Splendors.

NEW YORK was introduced to a novel entertainment on the night of Tuesday, September 14. New York abounds in novel entertainments, but the programme furnished by the Broadway Rose Gardens and Theater are surely entitled to a new record. The character of the entertainment is unique, the environments of the show are unique and the degree of comfort provided for the patrons is unique.

The Broadway Rose Gardens and Theater are located at 1680-1684 Broadway and 810-814 Seventh avenue. New Yorkers who remember the place as a skating rink with a modest and narrow exterior would scarcely recognize it in its glorious transmutation. A very pretty and dressy lobby, elegant in its studied simplicity, leads into the first section of this unique place of entertainment, which consists of one of the daintiest and cosiest of motion picture theaters. The prevailing light effect is that of amber, judiciously distributed by an artist in light effects. It helps materially in creating the atmosphere of refinement and restfulness which meets you as you enter. There are six hundred seats, so you see the theater is small, but this only adds to its manifest charm of exclusiveness. One of the features of the theater is the ceiling, a network of lattice most artistically arranged, giving one a pleasant and charming impression. It fits in wonderfully with the general atmosphere of daintiness and refinement, suggesting in its decorative effects the harbor and the park, with its cool evening breezes. Art here goes hand in hand with usefulness, for this cleverly contrived lattice effect incidentally secures a perfect ventilation. You feel that the place will be extremely comfortable at all seasons of the year, and that in the stress of a hot wave in New York there will be one place of cooling shelter right on Broadway. In the upper tier of seats a veritable haven of comfort and elegance is provided for the patrons. Gilt chairs with plenty of space between them and railings which secure privacy and exclusiveness are the dominating characteristics. It is an ideal place for men and women of breeding and refinement to see a high-class entertainment. The upper tier has been aptly named, by the way: "The Golden Horseshoe." The "Golden Horseshoe" will become a much sought after spot when New York gets acquainted with all the charms which lie treasured here.

The entertainment itself of the great feature, "Thirty Leagues Under the Sea." It is, as all will testify who were fortunate enough to see it, much more than a "great feature." It is the conquest of a new field in kinematography; it shows the camera at work in the depths of the sea and shows with what ingenuity and with what clever devices and with what marvelous daring this camera did its work among the mysteries and beauties of the unknown deep, now unknown no longer. The pictures have been described with a wealth of detail in these columns, and it is scarcely necessary to enter into a very full description of them; but the report would be incomplete if it failed to record the enthusiastic reception which some of the "numbers" on the film programme received from the large and delighted audience. The shark fishing was watched with keenest interest, of course, but the piece de resistance was the scene showing the combat between shark and man. This is indeed a genuine triumph of submarine photography, and will probably stand unequalled for many a day to come. There were bursts of applause all through this scene, but the climax, "The Man Wins," brought down the house. The perils of deep sea diving, the wonders of the life beneath the wave, the revelations which the camera gave us of the life of plants and animals "thirty thousand leagues under the sea" will never fail with any audience.

If you have come for an evening's entertainment which provides all the pleasures of a modern metropolis in addition to motion pictures, there is much in store for you after you have watched the marvels of the screen to your heart's content. A short step brings you into a magic bower of perpetual roses. Set in this bower of roses is a modern dancing floor flanked on its four sides by small tables where the best is provided for the comfort and delight of the inner man. The sight which meets you as you gaze about you is impressive and overpowering in its superb beauty. You feel that decoration is indeed a fine art. Leaves of dark green are there in profusion wound into and about the lattice work in natural grace and beauty. And amid this artistic profusion of green are the flowers which have always appealed to the human imagination with a peculiar charm: Roses. The tint is perfect, no rose ever grew on any stalk with a lovelier pink. The roses seem everywhere, and yet they have been distributed with a cunning hand. All through the room close to the ceiling are huge garlands of roses, or at least magnificent imitations of the rose and its glorious color. Darken the house but for a moment and the effect is like a scene in fairyland. A myriad of fireflies seem to be swarming about between the green leaves and the glowing roses; the pale familiar sphere of the moon appears above and she comes accompanied by her eternal satellites. There is nothing prettier in the fabled gardens of Arabia. Two orchestras are discoursing such music as one would expect to hear in such surroundings. One of the orchestras is that of Frank McKee, playing a dreamy waltz, something about the "Million Dollar Mystery." Frank McKee's orchestra is fresh from the Castle House, and very popular. The other orchestra is the Imperial Russian Balaika Orchestra. Its members are dressed in rose-colored costumes, and add much to the attractiveness of the floor.

Work on this wonderful new creation, which was one of the favored projects of the late Charles J. Hite, had been begun as early as last February, and had been going steadily up to the night of the informal opening. The Broadway Rose Gardens and Theater are under the control and management of the Delta Theater Corporation. Dr. Wilbert Shallenberger is the president, George F. Kerr the vice-president and general manager. W. R. Johnston is the treasurer.

The Great White Way has been much enriched since the opening of the Broadway Rose Gardens and Theater.

Infringing Titles

The Famous Players Film Company Obtains Injunctions Against Picture Concerns Imitating Its Titles.

THE Famous Players Film Co. have been granted an injunction on all further exhibitions of the American Film Co.'s subject, "Aftermath," by Judge Dever, of the Superior Court of Illinois. The Famous Players claim that this is an infringement of their title "Aftermath," the play written by Prof. William Addison Hervey of Columbia University, and recently released by the Famous Players.

The Famous Players have also succeeded in causing the Apex Film Co. to abandon the name of "Saints and Sinners," a title scheduled for forthcoming release. As is commonly known, the film rights of the world-famous play, "Saints and Sinners," written by Sir Henry Arthur Jones, are controlled by the Famous Players Film Co.

Similar action is also being taken against the Lubin Co. for their release of "A Fatal Card," which the Famous Players contend is an infringement on the title of "The Fatal Card," the famous Charles Frohman play, controlled by them, and also "The Better Man," the title of the Cyrus Townsend Brady story which the Famous Players Co. recently filmed; against the American Film Co. for their release of "The Crucible," also the title of the celebrated novel by Mark Lee Luther, the film rights of which the Famous Players control; against the Kalem Co. for their filming "The Brand," which, it is claimed, was also borrowed from the plot of "The Crucible," and against the Worlds Special Film Co. for their release of "Tess of the Mountain Country," a palpable imitation of the Famous Players' sensational success, "Tess of the Storm Country."

Since the earliest days of the motion picture, the evil of utilizing the titles and plots of copyrighted subjects without acquiring the necessary rights, has been a common one; however, no concern has heretofore made a decisive campaign to remedy or effect the elimination of this troublesome condition.

The Famous Players Film Co., with its long list of copyrighted plays and books, felt it necessary to take drastic and earnest measures with a view of obtaining exemplary results, and a greater degree of protection for its titles than it has heretofore been possible to receive.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS' ANNUAL BALL.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York has hired the four floors of Grand Central Palace for the Fourth Annual Entertainment and Ball to be held on Monday night, December 7, 1914.

No program will be issued for this ball, and therefore we ask all manufacturers to co-operate in the abolishment of this form of levying for "ads" on the manufacturers.

This ball is being held for the usual purpose of getting together the manufacturers, the photoplayers, the exhibitors and 50,000 photoplay fans, and one gala time is assured.

Two Strong Eclectics from Germany

"When Honor Calls" and "The Colonel's Wife" Feature Miss Henny Porten in Well-Staged Productions.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Eclectic Company is releasing two subjects that entirely apart from their strong dramatic value have interest in the fact that they are German productions, the making of which has now been cut off by the European war. In "When Honor Calls" and "The Colonel's Wife" Miss Henny Porten is featured. This splendid actress has the advantage of a charming personality—a magnetism that engages the attention and sympathy from her initial appearance in a story. She has keen dramatic instinct and is good looking—wholesome in aspect, as she is plump in figure and young in years—a fine type of German wife. Miss Porten is well supported. The productions are richly staged and well photographed.

"When Honor Calls" is a four-part subject from the pen of Richard Voss. It is a story of a woman who marries a bankrupt manufacturer when her first love proves fickle. Her father had encouraged Hartwig to recommend to his employes the purchase of stock in the Eva mine, knowing it to be in financial distress. When the smash comes, Hartwig, without hesitation, tells his men that he will repay them. Brown, Eva's fiance, leaves for parts unknown. Eva in admiration of Hartwig's manliness, marries him. Years later—a half dozen perhaps—Brown returns and seeks Eva. Her old love is rekindled, and she frankly tells her husband. A divorce follows. A cast-off love of Brown reveals to Eva the character of the man now paying attention to her, When she taxes him with insincerity he calmly admits it and throws her over. She shoots and kills him. In prison Eva is attended by the woman whose revelations had led to the tragedy. At the expiration of the sentence—four years—the nurse sends for Hartwig. He comes to his former wife and brings forgiveness. She dies in his arms.

The story is strong and a human one. It is a skillfully directed mob that storms the doors of the promoter's home, following the disaster, and there are stirring scenes as Hartwig braves its wrath and makes reparation to his own undoing. The later home life of the man who is successfully fighting to get back on his feet—with the contented wife, the sweet-faced mother-in-law and the child—is ideal. The rupture of this happiness by the entrance of Brown is dramatic, as are the ensuing scenes of the separation and the later shooting of Brown. The ending contains a depth of pathos. The conclusion is not a happy one, but surely it is appealing.

"The Colonel's Wife."

"The Colonel's Wife" is a three-part story in which Miss Porten, as the wife, shares the honors with the man portraying the colonel. The colonel in middle life marries a woman about the age of his son. When the son discovers the attempt of a former lover to annoy his step-mother he takes measures to protect the wife of his father, without, however, revealing to the colonel the nature of the confidence existing between himself and his step-mother. There is a scene when the colonel discovers his son at his wife's knee; the son declines to furnish an explanation. Everything turns out most happily, nevertheless, following a duel between the son and the disturber, in which the latter is the loser. One of the features of the story is the character of the colonel—a fine type; his portrayal may call to the mind of some the many like him now desperately engaged in battle and also possibly soften the asperities of those who may have taken verbal sides against the flag under which he is fighting—for most men have decided opinions one way or another.

The portrayals of the colonel, his son, his mother and the wife, and the former lover are of the best, and the same remark goes as to the settings, the direction and the photography.

John Keane and "Money"

WHEN "Money," the big multiple reel feature just completed by the United Keanograph Film Company of Fairfax, Cal., is put upon the screen a number of his friends will say: "That's the big idea that James Keane, president and director general, has been nurturing in his brain for twelve months and more."

"Money" does stand for a big idea, an idea that began big and developed bigger. It epitomizes the theme which agitates America—Capital versus Labor. Not content with merely making a strong drama on the subject was James Keane. He wanted bigness of scene and ensemble to set forth the breadth of the conception. And thus he took dollars by the thousand and put them into "Money." The investment was good.

James Keane.

Novelty bizarre marked its production. Realism there is in it aplenty. When Keane hired 2,000 "roughnecks" to storm the palace of Croesus, at which was being held the Million Dollar Dinner, he wanted the consequent battle between them and the police to look like a battle. As though the thought was parent to the deed, one of Keane's jokeful friends "tipped off" the police that an attack in all sincerity was being made. The effect of a hundred coppers wielding clubs on 2,000 underworldlings in battering sincerity can be imagined. No "fake" jewels were worn by the women at the Million Dollar Dinner either. They were of the real first water kind and they adorned the fingers and necks of San Francisco society women, invited to participate, and to whom the occasion was a lark. In this way did Keane achieve richness and bigness of effect.

Not only has the "Money" scenario been the child of Keane's brain, but he has also been the motive power of its production and exploitation. He directed the picture with consummate skill in daylight, and at night knitted his brows over the problems of the business department. When you see "Money" you see James Keane.

Miss Carlotta de Felice, late leading woman of the Vitagraph forces, played the leading part in "Money" and incidentally plays the leading part in Mr. Keane's affections—she is his wife.

UNIVERSAL PARIS OFFICE HAS CLOSE CALL.

One of the bombs which was dropped from a German aeroplane at about 6 o'clock on the evening of September 2 nearly wrecked the Paris headquarters of the Universal Film Company. It fell in the rue de Hanovre, damaging a house adjacent to the Universal company's offices.

James Downie and William Macarthy announce their intention of stopping in Paris "no matter what happens." They are preparing to take pictures.

Half an hour before the order prohibiting private automobiles from leaving the city was issued, Joseph Menchen and his wife left in their seven seater, "Sunbeam," en route for Havre. They will have an adventurous journey. Menchen took with him many miles of valuable negative.

JOHN CHER.

Deagan in Hold-Up

Maker of Deagan Bells and Family Victims of Yellowstone Park Bandit.

J. C. Deagan of Chicago, manufacturer of the world-famous Deagan Bells, has just returned from an extended trip throughout the West and was visited at the magnificent Deagan factory in Ravenswood. The objective point of his trip was a visit through Yellowstone Park and while there he had an experience which is a vivid reminder of the Frank and Jesse James and Cole Younger days.

His party, consisting of eight people, together with a few others, was placidly bowling along in a coach and four when, upon rounding a sharp curve in the roadway beside Lake Shoshone they heard a sharp "halt," and found themselves staring at the rifle barrel of a lone but very determined highwayman.

The startled coachman instantly drew rein and the robber's command was followed by a peremptory "Get down." This was supplemented by curses for those among the party who, petrified by fright, failed to move with the required alacrity.

When the entire party had disembarked they were ordered to "shell out," which all proceeded to do. As another coach was following and the highwayman's time was becoming short, all were instructed that only money and no "Junk"—jewelry and watches were not wanted. This was welcome news, as nearly all in the party wore diamonds, one lady in particular wearing several thousand dollars' worth of wedding finery. Her hysteria later became a mixture of fright and joy—the latter because she had saved her cherished jewelry.

The bravest in the party was Mrs. Deagan, who threatened to do the robber violence if her children were molested. Further, under the impression that Mr. Deagan had turned over his watch which is prized intrinsically, she asked the robber to return it, as it was of no value to him. He politely replied: "If there's anything in this loot I don't want I'll send it to the Yellowstone Hotel. You can go there and identify your property."

This daring "hold-up" was made easy through the withdrawal of many of the soldiery to Vera Cruz and the Mexican border—leaving the national reserve inadequately protected. It was carefully planned, for the robber was recognized as a man who had been travelling with the party for several days and had evidently sized it up as "good picking." He also had a confederate in the coach, who, like the others, humbly yielded his purse, while promptly and earnestly admonishing all to do just as told as otherwise the desperado would "certainly shoot into the crowd and a number of the ladies be killed."

The experience left most of the older ladies in the party hysterical, though the younger women look upon the adventure rather in the light of a joke. Among these are Miss Vita Deagan and her travelling companion, Miss Florence Wittenberg, who laughingly remarked that they had no money to lose and that though previously no one cared to hear about the wonders of Yellowstone Park they now have no trouble finding audiences.

Mr. Deagan refuses to say how much he donated to the highwayman but remarks that it will take the proceeds of a number of sales of his new Unaphones, Nabimbas, Xylophones, Cathedral Chimes, Orchestra Bells, and other musical specialties to get even. He tartly suggests that he went West for a change and a rest; that the robber got the change and the hotel men got the rest.

Studio of the Peerless Company

Located at Ft. Lee, N. J., a Model in Point of Construction and Efficiency.

THOSE who appreciate the superiority of well taken daylight interiors over those taken by artificial light for motion pictures, have reason to rejoice at the completion of one of the largest and most practical motion picture studios in America, built adjoining the old Eclair premises, for the Peerless Features Producing Company at Fort Lee, N. J., by Edward Barnard Kinsila, architect and technical expert. It is two hundred feet long by one hundred and twenty feet wide.

The Peerless Studio was projected by President Charles Jourjon of the Eclair Film Company to extensively produce photoplays of well-known theater successes. The output will mainly consist of plays and stars made famous on the stage by the Shuberts, Wm. A. Brady and Charles Blaney, and is controlled by the World Film Company.

The immense glass studio enclosure itself is one hundred and twenty feet long with a postless width of eighty feet. All the sides are composed of sash that swing on pivots, and the roof is equipped with a large sprinkler pipe along the outside ridge for flooding and cooling the roof on hot days. The interior contains a thirty-foot water pool for photographic purposes. The ground glass used in this studio was especially imported from France because of its superior merit in freely admitting the actinic rays of light. The roof trusses contain no members over six inches in width, and cast no shadows. No diffusing curtains are necessary, in fact, darkening curtains are employed on bright days to lessen the light, and upon dark days the studio contains fifteen per cent. more daylight than exists outside. For emergency an over-head trolley system of Cooper-Hewitt lights are used in combination with Kleig portable sidelights.

The adjoining accessory building annexed to the studio floor contains a triple-decked spacious property room and a motor hoist to raise properties to the desired floor level, a scene dock one hundred feet long by forty feet in width, and a postless and roomy carpenter shop equipped with all kinds of modern wood-making machinery for turning out the largest properties. There are no intervening walls between these departments and the studio floor to impede swift setting or striking of scenery. A one-third section of the main floor is taken up with stage directors and scenario writers' private rooms, a large projection room and the administration offices, and the upper floors are occupied with actors' dressing rooms, toilets, shower baths and a large wardrobe room. Everything appears to have been provided to make the building complete in every particular.

WORLD FILM TO SHOW "AMERICA."

The World Film Corporation is to handle, as a special feature release, the Shubert picture of the Hippodrome spectacle, "America." It will be offered to exhibitors before the end of the month.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Big Suffrage Production Under Way.

FOR the past six weeks I have been aware that a great suffrage photoplay production was under way at Selig's Chicago studio, but refrained from publishing the fact or particulars because of a request not to do so. Seeing that some particulars have leaked out at the New York end, through the Liebler office, through which firm several notable dramatic players were secured for the photoplay, the facts are now given.

This great suffrage picture will be eight reels in length. The scenario, I have been told by a competent critic, is unusually well constructed, the story being a powerful presentation of the arguments for equal suffrage, these arguments being convincingly brought out in the action. The name of the author has not yet been revealed, but it is understood that she is a prominent suffragist of national fame.

The production is being made under the direction of Giles Warren, formerly connected with Lubin, the Imp, and other manufacturers, who was specially selected by Wm. N. Selig for the work, before sailing for Europe.

Over 300 people are used in the cast. No expense has been spared to secure the very best possible talent for the principal roles. Some of them have been engaged at salaries that run into four figures per week. Olive Windom was brought specially from the Little Theater, New York City, to take the leading part, while Katherine Kellard, the leading woman of "Joseph and His Brethren," was secured for the leading heavy character. Grace Normand plays the spirit of Equal Suffrage. H. B. Warner, who played the lead in "The Lost Paradise" for the Famous Players Film Co., has a minor part. A number of other celebrities among the principals, whose names I have not learned at present, will be given later.

This photoplay is being produced by Mr. Selig, in co-operation with the Congressional Committee of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association, of which Mrs. Medill McCormick, of Chicago, is chairwoman. Other members of the committee are: Jane Addams (of Hull House fame), vice-president of the association, and Dr. Anna Shaw, president of the association. These women passed on the manuscript of the scenario and approved it highly, being enthusisatic over the dramatic strength of the story.

About two weeks ago Dr. Anna Shaw came out to the Selig studio here and appeared in several of the scenes. One of these scenes showed a theater in which Dr. Shaw addressed the multitude. The audience, comprised of many supers, was addressed in dead earnest by Dr. Shaw on three separate occasions, and the effect of her telling speeches have been caught in admirable manner by the cameraman.

Mrs. Medill McCormick is the leading spirit among the suffragists in this novel movement. Ever since work was begun she has given her strong personal interest to the production. She personally engaged some of the leading members of the cast, bringing them on from New York or elsewhere. She is tireless in her work to make the big suffrage photoplay a success, and can be found almost daily at the Selig studio, in conference with Director Warren.

Mrs. McCormick is one of the most prominent members of Chicago's 400, and her deep interest in equal suffrage has given the movement a powerful momentum in Illinois.

It is understood that the suffrage feature will be handled by the National American Woman's Suffrage Association along original lines. The plan has not been ascertained, but it is known that it will be of such nature as to insure that the pictures will be viewed by women of every station in life throughout the entire country.

The New Saxe Theater, Minneapolis.

The new Saxe Theater, in Minneapolis, the tenth in the chain of theaters controlled by the Saxe Bros., of Milwaukee, was opened Saturday, Sept. 5, the event being considered a very important one in the history of entertainment in the Minnesota metropolis. The new Saxe is situated on Seventh street, between Nicolette and Hennepin avenues, and is built on a lot 50 by 157 feet, the total expense, exclusive of the site, being $150,000. The theater was designed especially as a moving picture house, and judging from the glowing press accounts given the opening by local papers, it is not only beautiful architecturally and decoratively, but the provision made for patrons to view the pictures is about the best that could have been designed. In a later issue of the World a full description of the new Saxe Theater, with illustrations, will be given.

Just before the program was begun, Mayor W. G. Nye made a speech in which he praised the Saxe Bros. for their enterprise, and a great future was bespoken for the handsome theater.

The program consisted of "Woman Against Woman" and "My Friend from India," six reels in all. The accompanying music was furnished by a new $10,000 organ, played by Miss Anita DeWitte Cooke, of Minneapolis, and by the Saxe Theater orchestra, under the leadership of Eric Sjolander. Vocal numbers were also sung by Miss Valerie Veck, a well-known and talented soprano.

The program will be changed twice weekly. The policy to be pursued by the Saxe Bros. in the management of this house will be to offer the best and latest pictures in the market, regardless of price. The Saxe Bros. feel that with the combined buying power of their ten theaters they are in a position to get first selections of the latest releases. They announce that they are tied up to no single producing service, and that the new Saxe will be made the home of the highest grade picture productions it is possible to secure.

Popular prices will prevail at the new Saxe, 10 cents being charged for any seat in the house. The entertainments will be continuous, from 11 a. m. to 11 p. m., daily.

Request Patents on Chemicals to be Annulled.

The Chicago section of the American Chemical Society held another meeting last week, during which it was decided that resolutions be drafted requesting that Congress enact a law annulling all foreign patents pertaining to the manufacture of chemicals in this country, the said resolutions to be submitted and passed at the next meeting of the members, which will be held in the near future.

As England recently decided to declare all foreign patents open to the world, it was the sense of all present at the meeting that the United States should take advantage at once of the conditions and enable American chemists and chemical manufacturers to begin operations.

Peculiar Pruning by Ohio Censors.

A recent dispatch from Cleveland, O., states that the Ohio state board of censors has eliminated the drinking and murder scenes from "Ten Nights in a Bar-room," thereby calling down on the board the wrath of the Ohio Anti-Saloon League.

The Anti-Saloon League is now in the thick of strenuous battle to make all Ohio dry. The voters are to ballot on the prohibition amendment at the general elections early in November, and the League has planned to use the film as one of the main arguments in gaining votes. Now, according to dry workers, the censors have spoiled it all.

"All the punches have been taken out of the film," said Wayne B. Wheeler, state superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League. "A saloon scene which teaches that drunkenness brings crime, disorder and inefficiency has a good result. We feel that the film should be shown as the book was written."

Meanwhile the censors—Messrs. Wilson, Vestal, et al—smile and stand pat.

Chicago Film Brevities.

"The Adventures of Kathlyn" is making a great success in all parts of Great Britain and Ireland. Even the war scare failed to distract interest in the big serial.

* * *

George H. Hines, who has now leased the Oliver Theater in South Bend, in addition to the Auditorium, was in the city last week. He stated that "One Wonderful Night" played to $398 in one day, at the Auditorium recently.

Tom Nash, of the Nash Motion Picture Co., Los Angeles, spent several days in the city last week on his way from New York City to the Coast. Tom spent most of the time in visiting a large circle of friends and in looking after some personal business. He left for the Coast on Tuesday, Sept. 15th.

Charles G. Rosher, a British subject, who has just returned to this country from England, states that it is impossible to travel to England from the continent with a motion picture camera. Mr. Rosher is an expert cameraman and had letters of introduction to persons of influence abroad, but was unable to get anywhere near the firing line. It is just probable that few, if any, genuine pictures of battles of the present war will ever be seen on the screen. It is said that several persevering men, taking their lives in their hands, are on the heels of the various armies, hoping against hope that opportunity will come to take a picture. If Alexander Powell, the only war correspondent who has been able to send back here news right from the firing line, and the Kansas photographer, Thompson, had a camera along, what thrilling, living scenes they could give us of the battles in which the Germans and Belgians engaged!

Alfred Hamburger has added another legitimate house to his list of moving picture theaters. This is the old Whitney, now named the Comedy Theater. It was recently opened with "Traffic in Souls," the Universal white-slave feature.

* * *

Paul Henson, formerly owner of the Spectatorium Theater, Cape May Courthouse, N. J., called at the World office last week and renewed his subscription. Mr. Henson stated that he sold the Spectatorium about five months ago to Robert Miller and George Garretson. The house seats 325 people, and an admission of 10 cents is charged for a mixed program of five reels. Mr. Henson will make his home in Chicago, and expects to engage in the mercantile business.

Claude Erby, who had charge of the booking department at George Kleine's general office in this city, has been appointed manager of George Kleine's branch office in Dallas, Tex. He left for that point Saturday, Sept. 12. Mr. Erby is a young man of fine promise and carries with him the best wishes of a host of friends for his success and advancement.

Robert R. Levy easily won the nomination on the Republivan ticket for clerk of the Criminal Court at the recent primaries. The same hearty support will make him an easy winner at the coming election.

The admission at the Alhambra, Milwaukee, the Saxe Bros.' greatest theater, has been changed from 10 cents to 10 cents and 20 cents, the latter price being charged for the entire lower floor. The Saxe Bros. contracted for the Paramount service, beginning Monday, Sept. 7. They report that the success of the new service is very gratifying.

Ludwig Schindler, owner of the Schindler Theater, this city, has returned from Europe after a long stay. His numerous friends were alarmed at his long silence, as he had been in the war zone for a considerable time and nothing was heard from him. He had a number of exciting experiences during his trip.

Walter R. Early, one of the organizers of the Consumers Film Corporation, and its general manager, has sold his interests in that company and severed his connection with the firm. Mr. Early retains the best wishes of his former associates in the company.

I dropped in at the Eclectic offices in the Mallers Building last week and saw my old friends, John Hardin, local manager, and W. R. Scates, district manager for the Middle West. Mr. Hardin informed me that "The Perils of Pauline" is still in good demand throughout the city and nearby points. The smaller towns in Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana and Illinois are booking it steadily. Mr. Hardin stated that his business shows a decided improvement since the cool weather set in, and he looks forward for increased business from now on. "The Last Volunteer," Eclectic's big five-reel war feature, is in good demand. Mr. Hardin also informed me that, since Sept. 1, all Pathe productions have been released by Eclectic, and that a program averaging from 12 to 14 reels per week is being offered. On Monday morning, Sept. 14, Mr. Hardin advised me that he had received copies of a motion picture of about 1,000 feet in length of scenes in and around Louvain, Belgium, from Pathe Freres in Paris, direct. This film, which I had not time to view, shows the German army advancing on that city and the Belgium defenders. Mr. Hardin advised me that these pictures were authentic, and that the cameraman had secured them with a small camera concealed under his mackintosh. "They are, we believe, absolutely the first genuine motion pictures received in this country taken at the seat of war," said Mr. Hardin. This film was released to the moving picture theaters in Chicago on Tuesday, Sept. 15. W. R. Scates had just returned from a trip on which he had visited Omaha, Denver, Kansas City and St. Louis. He told me that the branch managers of the Eclectic at those points have worked up a good paying business. Owing to the extremely hot weather, business throughout the Middle West during the summer months was very weak, Mr. Scates said.

"When Youth Meets Youth"

Kleine Picture in Two Parts, of Powerful Emotions, That Are Strongly Acted—The Scenes Are Full of Beauty.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

MORE distinctly a picture of emotions than even the average motion picture which is dedicated to feeling rather than to abstract truth, strong as it may be in that field, this two-part Kleine offering, "When Youth Meets Youth," is purely and simply a love story. The players put more into it than the author; for the plot, though consistent, logical and gracefully put together, furnishes but a frail outline which the director and his cast have filled in. It is good filling-in, let us hasten to add. It is artistic and convincing and will be liked best by the spectators who can best appreciate artistic acting and perceive and sympathize with finely drawn shades of human feeling as the facial expression and general demeanor of a player portrays them. It is, in other words, a much finer offering than rough-and-tumble or chase melodramas; but perhaps it will not fit so well the sprocket of a rough-and-tumble or chase-loving mind as it will fit those whose minds have felt something beside roughly blocked out emotions such as come to a man falling from the roof of a house, for instance.

As the story begins, we find that the son of a banker has been gambling and is deeply in debt. His father feels the disgrace keenly and after giving the son a check, orders him from the house. Sometime later, the banker, a widower, meets a very pretty young woman and in time becomes engaged to her. A month before the wedding she goes for a short trip to the south of France. There she becomes interested in a man of about her own age, the banker's son, who has taken an assumed name. She really falls in love with him, and persuades him to give up gambling. The banker comes to spend a few days with his fiance. The son meets him in the hotel corridor; but the banker won't shake his hand. The son has been told by the girl that she is engaged to another and that although she loves him they must never meet again. An acquaintance of the young man, trying to console him, says the girl is not worth worrying over and there is a duel in consequence. The father hearing that his son has been grievously wonded in this, comes to his bed-side and makes up with him. The woman hears of his wound and she too comes. It is a little later and the old man returning finds her there. The son never sees that his father is in the room. The woman slowly turning, finds herself in a very trying situation. She is the more astonished to learn that the youth is the banker's son. It is worked out to the parental forgiveness in a pleasing and most commendable way. But, as we have already pointed out, the things that the players show of states of heart and mind, make it a much more substantial and commendable offering that any telling of the story without such good acting could be. The photography and the stage sets are perfect. It is a picture to please the discriminating.

PICTURES BOOM PANAMA FAIR.

The Great Exposition of 1915 to Depend Upon Moving Pictures for its Success.

THE life of trade is publicity-advertising; the soul of advertising is in illustrations, the perfection of illustrative work is the moving picture. The commercial world has long ago allowed itself to become educated by the moving picture to do its best work. It has been well said that "Advertising was born in the word of mouth, grew to childhood with the advent of printing, matured phenomenally with the addition of illustrations, growing to perfection in the moving, living picture." This has given birth to a new industry—an industry within an industry—that of manufacturing moving picture films solely for advertising purposes. In addition to portraying industries and salesmanship with its kindred possibilities, these special film makers have their editors who write interesting little plays working out the value of that which they wish to advertise; quite a corps of actors are maintained to enact them in elaborate studios, and quite a circuit has been worked up for the purpose of exhibiting these semi-photoplays, semi-ads.

Such methods as these are self recommending and coupled with the fact that America's largest industries and manufactories are using them, with the suggestion that they will also prove just what is required to give universal publicity to what the great exposition is intended to be, there is no doubt that a nation-wide and, as far as the war will permit, a world-wide advertising scheme will undoubtedly give the exposition that impetus which is always needed for so great an enterprise. Never before has it been possible to carry the objects and attractions of an exhibition in every part of the country. Now, however, the omnipresent picture house will advertise the 1915 exposition so that every inhabitant of the land will be thoroughly acquainted with it, causing its educative as well as its commercial influence to be universally felt. In addition to this the advantage to the exposition exhibitors will be more widespread than has ever before been experienced, and so on in like measure greater good and profit will accrue to all concerned. In the exposition itself the newest and greatest forces of the moving pictures will undoubtedly be exploited, not only in the capacities of entertaining and educative possibilities, but also in their multitudinous uses in the applied sciences and arts.

SPECIALIZING THE EDUCATIONALS.

Talking recently with several suppliers of educational pictures only, it was pleasing to find that the demand for these films is steadily increasing. The users of educational pictures in schools, institutions and religious social work also call upon those who supply them with subjects to advise and direct them in the selection of other suitable subjects in drama, comedy and kindred lines.

The Young Men's Christian Association, also the Young Women's Christian Association, and those of the Hebrew people, together with other social and fraternal organizations are systematically planning for regular and continuous courses through the coming fall and winter months. At a recent meeting of Y. M. C. A. leaders the reports of the uses of the moving picture were an added part of the official programme. It was reported that not only successful use had been made of the pictures, but that they were now a necessary part of their most attractive and holding features. When speaking of the "holding features" of the pictures this means those which are particularly instructive, not only in the fundamentals of their educational courses, but in the technical, business and industrial courses; still further, they were of supreme importance in the religious work and in the social service bureau.

Now that the business is large enough and important enough to allow of specializing in the educative films, it is gratifying to know that there are those more than ready to meet all requirements and the educator will be glad to place any enquirers in touch with those able to meet any peculiar demands made of them. Another great advantage in this new line is found in the fact that those now devoting themselves to educational films are able to intelligently and profitably advise the manufacturers just what is required of them, thus filling what hitherto had proved a great gap between the supply and demand. As a result the development will now be so rapid that the systematic requirements of schools will before long be fully met because of the gradual way in which the requirements of the text book are being met. A little while ago we recorded the occasional installation of moving picture equipments in this school or that church, or a certain institution. This can no longer be done, for their number is now almost legion. The day has come when wherever there is anything educational there also is the moving picture machine, no longer as a luxury, but as an imperative necessity.

Notes

It is interesting to notice that the current issue list of Pathe's releases are all educational. This is quite unusual; not a film but may find its way into some one of the many educational features. Many of the subjects have already been reviewed on this page, but the interested exhibitor, or the educational film users will find very valuable and helpful additions in this last lot of varied subjects.

The various topical or illustrated "two a week" news pictures continue to maintain an interest in the war preparation scenes. To become familiar with the noted leaders, the varied troops, the methods of transportation, together with the effects in all parts of the world is an education in itself and one calculated to intelligently enlighten everyone. History, geography, manners and customs of nations, the science and arts of both war and peace are all blended in these pictures in a larger measure than many people have stopped to imagine; to closely and consecutively follow them will well repay anyone.

Judging from the number and nature of the enquiries constantly being received in the educational department of this paper, there is a growing tendency in the direction of a "higher education" in both practical and applied kinematography which is extremely gratifying, showing how great a grip the work of extensive educational moving pictures is taking upon all those who rightly might be expected to recognize and foster the work. There is a temporary lull in the call for many pictures caused by a momentary idea that the war may cause a break in the foreign series. In some cases this may prove true, but we are assured that no great inconvenience need be occasioned on that account, as the makers are so far ahead of the requirements that they feel capable of filling all calls which may reasonably be expected.

Elaborate plans are being carried out for the beautifying of the Horticultural and Zoological Exposition which will be permanently maintained at Eastlake, Los Angeles, Cal., by William N. Selig, head of the Selig Polyscope Co. Mr. Selig has made arrangements with a prominent sculptor, who is building large animal groups for architectural decorative purposes, with the idea of making a permanent as well as educational place. It is said that Mr. Selig has an idea of devising and maintaining an establishment which bids fair to outrival that of Carl Hagenbeck in Germany. It is well known how profitably the Selig animals have been used in many of their productions, and educational kinematography is indebted to the Selig Co. for many of their splendid films. Whatever is done to ensure a continuation of them is most cordially welcomed.

Where films are made. Many years ago the standard of perfection in certain lines of hardware and kindred goods for the English markets required that they be "Made in Birmingham." We are now told that this title is to be revived in many English demands, including moving picture films. There is no doubt that this is "Quite English, you know," but we are also told that the war has brought to the front the demand for American films to such an extent that "Made in America" is the assurance of both a profitable business and a good programme. The demand for these films is also naturally growing on the continent. America is not so selfish as to wish for all the European trade, yet at the same time it is opportune that she can so well fill the present requirements.

The Educational Picture

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

The House that Went Crazy.

Selig, 4 Sep., is a neat and clever trick picture exceptionally well conceived and developed. It is one of the kinds of picture that school teachers and children's librarians are asking for all the time and it is to be hoped that its appearance marks the beginning of a revival of the old trick picture and the fairy tale that were so common and met with so much success several years ago.

Some Answers.

From time to time we have been receiving queries about various things connected with the field of educational pictures. Sometimes these queries have been accompanied by self-addressed and stamped envelopes for the reply, but just as often they have not even contained a loose postage stamp. Hitherto we have answered every such query that has come to us by mail, even when we had to pay the postage, although it would seem that the dictates of common courtesy would tell a man, certainly the class of men from whom most of the queries come, that when he asks a favor the only nice thing he can do is to see that the granting of it does not put the person he is asking to any needless trouble or expense. We are only too glad to help any one who wants or needs help, especially in the use of the educational picture—that is what we are in the business for—but like everybody else except multimillionaires and "bloated bondholders" we must make our living by the occupations to which we devote our time and energies, and, especially in these chilled-steel times we are forced to count the pennies. A two cent stamp and an envelope seems an insignificant expense, and the writing of a single address a trifle too small to be considered; but when the man who answers the queries has to pay for forty or fifty two cent stamps and the same number of envelopes as well as write the addresses on every one of them the expense and the labor mounts up. Count it up and experiment and think it over. Hereafter we shall be very glad to return a personal answer by mail to every one who sends us therefor a self-addressed and stamped envelope for the reply, and we will answer all others in the columns of this paper. As there is no time like the present for a beginning, we append the answers to the queries that have come in to us this week without the aforesaid postage and envelopes.

J. W. Ford.—"Pigs is pigs," the story by Ellis Parker Butler, was first produced by Edison and released Dec. 14, 1910. It was also, as you say, made and released by Vitagraph July 17, 1914. But this was not, as you infer, an infringement of another manufacturer's rights as the Vitagraph distinctly stated at the time that the picture was made "through the courtesy of Thomas A. Edison, Inc.," which means that they not only asked but also obtained the permission of the Edison company to make the picture. We do not know whether they paid anything for the permission or not.

Wisconsin.—We call you this because you say, "Please don't use my name if you quote any of this letter in your paper." We must request every querist to put his or her own proper name to their communications as an evidence of good faith, but we will hold such names as confidential and refer to them by noms de plume unless we have their owners' permission to use them. What you say about the "vapidity" and "flatness" and "absolute uselessness" of the great majority of the present releases, both regular and feature, from an educational standpoint is quite true. But the trouble is not wholly with the mnufacturers. There was a time, and not so very long ago at that, when the manufacturers were only too glad to cater to the educator and serious worker; but the moving picture business is a business and not a charitable institution and it costs money to make pictures. Consequently to make the kind of pictures the educators want, the manufacturers must have at least some reasonable return in cash, and that can only be given by a large enough demand for such pictures as will reimburse them for the cost of making. This demand can only come from the educators themselves and so far it has been lacking. It is quite true that the actual educators who want to use pictures of this kind have a limited amount of money to spend, but they manage to raise the money they need for other things when they want it hard enough and it is only fair that they should do the same in the present case. Quit howling about a "duty of every manufacturer" that does not exist except in your own brain and get busy doing your duty of getting ready to give them a quid pro quo for what you ask of them, by raising the money to pay for it, and you will find that the manufacturers will be only too ready to meet you more than half way by giving you a great deal more than you ask. They have done it in the past and they are more than inclined to do it now. It is for you and the other educators to say whether they will continue to do so in the future.

Latin Teacher.—A very good picture to illustrate the Catiline orations of Cicero is Cines "Conspiracy of Catiline," released through the General Film Company Sept. 10, 1912. It is a little old, but you may be able to obtain it. Query your nearest licensed film exchange. The synopsis was published in the Moving Picture World 13:996, and the comment of the reviewer 13:1276.

Nicholas Dunaew

NICHOLAS DUNAEW, one of the members of the Vitagraph Stock Company, was born in Moscow, Russia, on May 26, 1884. He is an author, actor and producer, well known not only in his own country but all over Continental Europe. Mr. Dunaew's father, Alexander Dunaew, descendant of a long line of Russian noblemen, was also born in Moscow. His mother, whose maiden name was Feodosia Bagrowa, claims St. Petersburg, Russia, as her birthplace. She came of a literary family, and it is from his mother Mr. Dunaew inherits his ability as a writer.

Mr. Dunaew received his education as a pupil in the Moscow High School and as a student in college at St. Petersburg, where he received a degree in literature. He also studied two years in law school, but did not graduate.

Nicholas Dunaew.

Mr. Dunaew, in his writings, favored dramatic work, and quite naturally interested himself in professional people, studying their methods and gradually acquiring a desire to act himself. On January 16, 1904, he received his first offer to appear in public as a professional, accepting an engagement with Alexander Bilief to appear as Franc Moore in Robert Schiller's drama, "The Ribbers." His success was immediate, and after a season with Bilief he organized a company of his own and toured Continental Europe in a repertoire of plays, including Ibsen's "Ghosts," Tolstoy's "The Power of Darkness," in which he played Nikita, "Trilby," appearing as Svengali, and his own plays, "The Spider," "The Vampire," "The Terrible God" and "Two Nationalities." Mr. Dunaew has also appeared in New York at Daly's and Jacob P. Adler's Theater on the East Side, playing in dramas by Tolstoy, Gorkey, Ibsen and Andreef.

It was during one of his visits to this country that Mr. Dunaew became interested in moving pictures. Blanche Walsh, appearing in a visualization of "Resurrection," required a man who knew Russian topography and conditions to give the necessary atmosphere to the picture, and Mr. Dunaew was selected as the best fitted. Picture work attracted him, and after his engagement with Miss Walsh he sought an engagement with the Vitagraph Company, becoming a stock member.

Becoming thoroughly acquainted with the requirements of the screen story, Mr. Dunaew has taken up scenario writing in addition to his posing and, receiving permission from Mme. Tolstoy to picturize the dramatic works of her late husband, has in completed manuscript form "The Power of Darkness" and "War and Peace," two of Tolstoy's most wonderful works.

Since joining the Vitagraph Company, Mr. Dunaew has appeared in a number of pictures, the most important being "My Official Wife," "The Call of the Past," "The Win(k)some Widow," etc., his characterizations ranging from comedy to heavy tragic roles.

Charles Kessel Talks

The Usually Silent Member of the New York Motion Picture Corporation Tells of New Plans.

SAID to be the least known yet quite important member of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, it is generally believed that Charles Kessel, secretary of the company, can hold his tongue in more languages than any other man in the motion picture business. He is a brother of the popular Ad. Kessel and has been in the picture business quite as long, but he has always kept in the background and has been too busy to talk. For a long time his activities were confined to the exchange end of the business, but since the Mutual Film Corporation took over the exchanges owned by the New York Motion Picture Corporation he has devoted his attention to the manufacturing end of the game until he has become proficient in the management of the numerous details associated with a big producing plant.

Charles Kessel.

Having occasion to make some inquiries regarding the future plans of the New York Motion Picture Corporation a Moving Picture World representative succeeded in getting Charles Kessel to do a little talking and, though it was mighty little and handed out in staccato sentences, what he did say was right to the point and gave the information sought.

"You know that we have signed the Mutual contract and that our directors, Ince and Sennett, are hard at work lining things up in Santa Monica? Well, everything is lovely and running smoothly. The Keystone output will be increased; in addition to the regular three single reels every week there will be one two-reel subject every two weeks. Sidney Chaplin, a brother of Charles Chaplin, one of our comedy players, sailed on September 12 from London and will join the Keystone players. Charles Chaplin says his brother is a better comedian than himself.

"The Broncho, Domino and Kay Bee will continue as before, with this difference: that each brand will feature an individual star. We have not yet decided who they are to be, but they will be good. There will also be a multiple-reel feature produced every month by the New York Motion Picture Corporation and marketed independent of the Mutual Film Corporation. We have four complete pictures already on hand, but definite arrangements for their disposition have not been concluded.

"I neglected to mention that the Keystone will produce three or four multiple-reel features annually with some well-known Broadway dramatic star in the leading part. Keystone has a brand new studio. We have now eight directors at work beside Ince and Sennett; so you can imagine that we are busy."

Then Charles ambled back to his desk and got busy himself, which indicated that he was all talked out; but he had said something, and we take pleasure in passing it along.

"NOTHING ON LOUISIANA," SAYS CORNELIUS.

D. L. Cornelius, general manager of the Hippodrome Theater Company, operating five picture theaters in Shreveport, La., called at the Moving Picture World office last week during a few days' visit in New York. Mr. Cornelius lays claim to the fact that Louisiana exhibitors have it "all over" the New York exhibitors, with but one or two exceptions, for beautiful houses and perfect projection, and especially in his new theater, The Hippodrome, for which they get a straight admission price of ten cents. The house represents an investment of $25,000. All of the houses of this corporation are equipped with Powers No. 6 A cameragraphs and use the Mutual and Paramount service exclusively.

Edwin August a Manufacturer

In Partnership with Edward E. Anderson, a Brother of Gilbert M., He Will Produce Eaco Films.

EACO FILMS are among the latest to make a bid for the approval of the public. Back of the new company are Edwin August and Edward E. Anderson. Mr. August is one of the best-known screen players. Mr. Anderson, who, by the way, is the brother of the Essanay star, Gilbert M. Anderson ("Broncho Billy"), has had experience in film making. The offices of the company are in Suite 1402, World's Tower Building, and will be in charge of Mr. Anderson. Mr. August will have supervision of the production of the company's output. This means that in those pictures in which he personally may not appear he will give close attention to the essential preliminaries. It is intended to make three releases a week—one two-reel subject, in which Mr. August will have the lead. This will be a drama, and it is designed to use themes with a surprise element, with strong climaxes. The two remaining releases will be single reels. One of these will be a comedy, in which Hal August will be featured, and the other will be a Western drama, in which the lead will be taken by Edward Piel, a well-known player, who has been appearing in Lubin leads. As to the medium through which Eaco subjects will reach the market, it is said that two propositions are under consideration, and that a decision will probably be reached this week.

Edwin August.

Two double-reel stories have been produced already. These are dramas, "Below the Dead Line" and "The Spider and the Fly." The first, as its title indicates, is a story of those without the law. It deals with counterfeiters, and Mr. August has taken great pains in obtaining his data for the technical side of his play. These pictures have been produced in the Pathe studios in Jersey City, where full advantage has been taken of the elaborate facilities of that most complete establishment. Mr. August intends shortly to sail for Bermuda, where he will stage several dramatic subjects. Following this he expects to locate in Florida. It is the intention to have a permanent studio for Eaco.

Among the players who will appear in Eaco pictures are Ann Derson, an Irish actress Mr. August saw in England and whose work impressed him. When she walked into the local office of the new company and announced that she was seeking an engagement, Mr. August recognized her, remembered her work, and immediately made her a member of his company. Others will be Charles Ross, Etta Raynor, an experienced emotional actress; Alice Learn, a sister of Bessie Learn of the Edison Company, who has had, for her years, much experience both before the camera and on the stage. She appeared as a child in Edison releases. E. L. Pape, an English actor, and Mabel Janot are also appearing in Eaco productions.

The camera and laboratory work will be under the direction of David Santarelli, late of the Pathe studio. Mr. Santarelli not only is an expert cameraman, but he is also a laboratory technician. He will give particular attention to the tinting of his films, and promises something worth while.

Mr. August has had wide experience as stage player, as screen actor and also as director. He was for seven months in Edison pictures, for two years with Biograph, and afterward with Lubin, where his work with Ormi Hawley was most favorably received by exhibitors and the public. For nearly two years he was with the Universal, writing his own stories a good part of the time, playing leads and directing his company. Eaco should be a winner.

MR. AND MRS. KLEINE IN TOWN.

Mr. and Mrs. George Kleine of Chicago are in the city. They are stopping at the Hotel Biltmore.

Films by Parcel Post

Exchangemen Confer With Congressman For Passage of Films Through Mails.

AN effort is again to be made to have moving picture films included in the list of merchandise admitted to the parcel post, and a meeting in which several exchange men and the Washington correspondent of the Moving Picture World participated was held in the office of Congressman Alfred G. Allen, of Cincinnati, Ohio, who is a member of the Committee on Post Office and Post Roads, with a view to furnishing that gentleman with information necessary for presentation to the Postmaster General. It was claimed that the service rendered by the express companies in the territory of Washington, D. C., was not always of the best and that often serious delays ensued because of their not operating on a sufficient number of trains. Further, it is believed that the use of the parcel post will result in great savings to exhibitors and exchangemen, while on the other hand the revenues of the parcel post would be greatly increased.

Hon. Alfred G. Allen.

Mr. Allen stated that he had called several times upon the officials of the Post Office Department and had taken up the matter of the revocation of the order which prohibited the use of the mails in transmitting films. He stated further than the Department is investigating this matter, as it was desirous of securing the business, and that chemists of the Department of Agriculture were figuring out a mode of safe transmission. The fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has prescribed a new case within which films must be packed after October 1 for shipment by express was called to Mr. Allen's attention and he could see no reason why, if the Commission and the fire insurance officials had conceded that the risk was minimized by the use of these cases, the Post Office Department would not be willing to vacate its order.

Mr. Allen was assured by John J. Noonan, of the Virginia Theatre, Washington, D. C., and Lieut. "Jim" Anderson, of the Greater New York Film Rental Company, also of that city, that the manufacturers and film exchanges throughout the country would be glad to comply with such regulations as would govern the transmission of films through the mails along the lines laid down by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that "Moving picture films must be packed in tightly closed metal cases inclosed in a strong, spark-proof wooden box; or in spark-proof cases made of sheet iron not less than 0.02 inch thick (No. 25 U. S. standard gauge) and lined throughout with fiber board at least one-eighth inch thick, or some other equivalent insulating material. The covers of these cases must fit tightly and must lap over the body at least five-eighths inch on the sides, forming a tight joint." Congressman Allen has been indirectly connected with the moving picture business for some time and has taken a great interest in it. He promised his visitors that he would do everything possible to aid them and they in turn expressed themselves well satisfied with their conference.

Film Shipping Concessions

Inter-State Commerce Commission Grants Extension of Order on Metallic Cases Until March 1, 1915.

ON account of the fact that many manufacturers of motion pictures have on hand large quantities of film containers for shipping by express that do not conform to the recent regulation governing express shipments of film, but which were authorized by the previous regulations governing such shipments, the Interstate Commerce Commission, on Tuesday, September 15, granted an extension of time on paragraph 43 of the regulations. The modification of the rule reads as follows:

"43—Note: Strong, spark-proof vulcanized hard fibre cases made of fibre not less than .070 of an inch in thickness, reinforced by metal at the corners, purchased prior to October 1, 1914, may be used until March 1, 1915, for the shipment of moving picture films enclosed in interior spark-proof metal cases."

PRESIDENT PEARCE OPPOSES WAR TAX ON PICTURES.

The suggestion that a war tax be imposed upon amusement tickets brings forth a protest from President Pearce of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League in the form of a request to the presidents of all state leagues requesting them to urge representatives in Congress to oppose the measure should it be offered. President Pearce's letter reads as follows:

> "I thought it well to write you at this time regarding the fact that Congress is now considering placing a war tax on amusement tickets, and as you realize that at the present time the exhibitors have a greater burden than they can bear without this additional taxation, and if you will get in touch with every member possible of your branch and request them to write their representatives at Washington, opposing this taxation in as strong terms as possible, it will be a big help in preventing same from being included in the taxation list.
> "I have every reason to believe that if this tax is placed upon the moving picture exhibitor it will be a long time before it will be removed and I cannot urge you too strongly to get every member possible in your state to act on this matter promptly."

Stella Razeto

STELLA RAZETO, of the Selig Polyscope Company, was born at San Diego, California, and is therefore a "native daughter." Her family moved to San Francisco when she was six years old, and she was educated there at the Girls' High School. Whilst there she took a course of elocution. Her father is Italian and her mother American, and she is dark, petite and has bright dark eyes. She wanted to go on the stage as a child and acted in a number of child characters in San Francisco and appeared at a number of entertainments and charity performances.

Stella Razeto.

Application to the manager of the Alcazar secured her a trial and she made good immediately in the stock company located there. She then applied to Florence Roberts for a position in her company and appeared on the first night in the crowd where she attracted Miss Robert's attention, and thus had a small part the second night with that lady. She remained with Florence Roberts for three seasons and took a number of good parts and then went with the company to Honolulu where Louis Morrison joined the company to play "Richelieu," "Merchant of Venice" and "Faust." Stella Razeto playing the ingenue parts.

Miss Razeto became quite sick and had to abandon the stage for a time, and this led to the motion pictures and a meeting with David Miles led to an engagement with the Majestic Company when she played in a company with Mabel Trunelle and Herbert Prior for nine months, Owen Moore and Mary Pickford being in the other company at the time. She went with Miles to the Kinemacolor, with which company she was with for ten months. Part of this time she was under the direction of Edward J. Le Saint, and she went with him to the Selig Polyscope Company, where she has played leads for over a year now.

She is married to Le Saint and lives in a beautiful bungalow, near Edendale, where she spends a lot of time amongst her flowers and in entertaining and teasing her good-natured husband.

Paul Kimberley Makes Flying Visit

Hustling European Manager of Thanhouser Films Says Picture Houses Will Be Last to Feel Effects of War.

PAUL KIMBERLEY is a sure-enough Englishman—his speech indicates it; but his notable characteristics are of the keen, hustling Yankee—in appearance spare as opposed to the John Bull type; in manner alert, quick to shoot a question at you and as ready with a terse reply to a question of yours. Mr. Kimberley has for the past year been the managing director of Thanhouser Films, Limited, which concern has jurisdiction of Thanhouser productions in the European market, with head offices at 100 Charing Cross Road, London. He was picked for the position by the late Charles J. Hite from among a host of applicants—and Mr. Hite's ability in selecting winners was well known.

Paul Kimberley.

Mr. Kimberley at present is in New York on a flying business trip. He sails for home Wednesday morning. He will resume his duties with the knowledge that he enjoys the confidence of the new heads of the Thanhouser Company even as he did of its late president and prepared still further to extend the field of his company's interests. The European manager of the Thanhouser forces has a wide knowledge of the Continental film market. For years Mr. Kimberley was associated with J. Frank Brockliss. Then he branched out for himself as the head of the Imp Film Company, Limited, representing in Europe the releases of the Imp Company in this country. Mr. Kimberley holds the English record for sale on one production. This was "Ivanhoe," the 3,500-foot Imp feature. There were sold 109 prints, or a total of 381,000 feet. Mr. Kimberley retained this contract until the taking over of all its European business by the Universal Company.

Talking the other day with a World man, Mr. Kimberley said the English market was quite normal at least, in spite of the war. "Of course," he said, "all fresh Continental supplies are cut off, as factories are closed. Anything coming from Europe is from the stock that has been on the shelves. As to the exhibiting end the war has affected only garrison and coast towns. In the latter case, of course, all lights have to be extinguished. When I left London the feeling in the trade was that in the larger centers the picture houses would be absolutely the last to feel the effects of the war—the last to close down, if it came to that. The idea is that the pictures will serve as safety valves for men and women wrought up over conditions in Europe, that the theaters will give them a chance to forget for the time their troubles. You know during the great coal strike the picture theaters in the towns affected did a big business. The grocer and the baker may have been compelled to do business 'on tick,' but the people would see the pictures, and, of course, for cash.

"The Thanhouser films are doing a fine business, as letters I have just received from my office point out. I have had a most pleasant trip here, meeting old friends, visiting with the boys of the Screen Club, of which you know I am the second foreign member, and I shall go back to England with the most pleasant memories."

SCREEN CLUB DOINGS.

The political pot is beginning to boil at the home of the Screen Club in Forty-seventh street. The annual election of officers will be held on October 3. King Baggot has been nominated for president by the stated committee, but it is understood he will decline. Mr. Baggot, who is also known as the founder of the club, has been at its head since its organization, two years ago. His administration has been markedly successful and his candidacy for president, had he decided to accept the nomination, in all likelihood would have been unopposed, as was the case last year. The polls will be opened in the Longacre Hotel's smaller dining room, which for the time being will serve as an annex to the club grillroom.

The club will hold a dinner at the Hotel Astor in October, at which the incoming officers will be formally installed. Vice-President Joe Farnham has been delegated to arrange the preliminaries.

In all probability the annual ball of the Screen Club will be held in the fall rather than in the winter or spring. A suggestion has been made that the club's big function be held at one of the leading hotels, if suitable accommodations can be secured. It has even been intimated that the size of the organization and the importance of the industry which it represents may justify placing the tickets at $5 each.

"BILL" ALDRIDGE INTERESTS SCREENERS.

William Aldridge aroused much curiosity among a group of fellow-Screeners one noon this week when he displayed what he described as a perfectly good five-dollar bill and defied any one to point out anything wrong with it. Several examined the piece of currency. "It looks good to me," dolefully remarked one actor just now looking for an engagement; "what's the answer, Bill?" "The answer is that it's a misprint," said Mr. Aldridge as he turned over the bill. "You will observe that on the reverse side the top of the note is opposite the bottom of the obverse. The blunder got away from innumerable Government inspectors. The three other notes that were printed on the same sheet have been rounded up, but this one is not on its way to Washington—not by a jugful. It's worth a thousand dollars if it's worth a cent."

Kalem Forms Comedy Companies

Proposes to Meet the Demand for Comedies of All Kinds with an Adequate Supply.

AN ever-present problem which confronts the motion picture exhibitor is the difficulty encountered in securing sufficient comedies to balance his programmes. With the output of dramatic subjects increasing every day, this problem constantly grows more serious since the all-dramatic programme is too heavy for the majority of audiences.

The exhibitors' cry of "Give us more comedies," was echoed in an editorial published in the September 12th issue of The World. To quote from this editorial, "There has never been a surplus of them (comedies), and there is not likely to be. At times the dearth of them becomes a serious problem to the conscientious and progressive exhibitor."

Exhibitors will be interested to learn that Kalem Company, appreciating this demand for good farces, has organized two all-star comedy companies and, commencing with October, will issue two comedies every week.

These companies are the Kalem Hollywood comedy company, located at Hollywood, Cal., and the Santa Monica comedy company, located at Santa Monica, Cal. The players who appear in the new Kalem farces have won recognition in their peculiar lines. Among the stars in the Hollywood Company are Ruth Roland, Lloyd V. Hamilton, Marshal Neilan and Victor Rottman while the Santa Monica players include such stars as Carrie C. Ward, Ethel and Betty Teare, and Fred Hornby.

The new Kalem comedies will range from the "straight" variety to the burlesque slapstick. According to an advertisement published elsewhere in this issue of the "World," nine comedies are to be issued during October. These are, "The Slavery of Foxicus," October 2; "For the Love of Mike," October 6; "The Tattered Duke," October 9; "Percy Pimpernickel—Soubrette," October 13; "Si's Wonderful Mineral Spring," October 16; "A Wise Rube," October 20; "Micky Flynn's Escapade," October 23; "The No-Account Count," October 27, and "Ham, and the Villain Factory," October 30.

STANLEY TWIST TO TAKE UP NEW WORK.

Stanley Twist announces that, preparatory to accepting an important position with the producers of one of the large programs, he has resigned from the several organizations with which he has been associated—viz: Progressive Motion Picture Company, Standard Film Corporation, Interocean Sales Company and Panama-Pacific Motion Picture Concession—and disposed of his interests.

"MOTHER" (World Film).

Emma Dunn plays her well known part, the mother, in this picture of Jules Eckert Goodman's play, "Mother," which is offered by the World Film Corporation. It is a picture of a mother and her family. They had been rich, but the father had died and now, with all their acquired expensive habits, they are poor. The mother, a role which Emma Dunn plays with sincerity and truth, has a long and heart-breaking battle on her hands to keep the family ship from wreck. Both her older boys fall in love with adventuresses and come to grief through this weakness. She has two daughters who are a good help to her and there are twin boys of about twelve in the family who made a great hit in the play and furnish pleasant, humorous relief in the picture.

Emma Dunn as "Mother."

It is the oldest son who is the greatest cause of trouble to her. At the time of her husband's death, he has just graduated from college and is of the age when he might do good work if he would; but has more ability to get into trouble and straightway does so to the limit. He is in love with a soubrette, but now lacks money—his mother has discharged her servants and can give him no more till the next quarter day. The girl plays on his poor foolish heart's jealousy. He steals his mother's necklace; the soubrette thinks him still rich, and, both being full of champagne, she marries him. The mother reads about it in the papers and calls on the girl. While the picture is full of excellent scenes that show the genius of Emma Dunn, her exit from the apartment of her son's wife is a bit of dramatic work that is fine. The oldest son has completely made a fool of himself and now the younger son needs must fall in love with the chorus girl sister of his brother's wife. The older son to pay his extravagant wife's old debts steals from the bank, is found out, and forges his mother's name to keep out of prison. The mother says it is her signature and poor as she is pays the debt. Both her boys become wanderers and have a very hard lesson; but it is salutary and in the end the mother wins her battle. It is a strong picture of real conditions and is an offering that many will be glad to see.

MARGARET JOSLIN AN EXPERT COOK.

Margaret Joslin, better known in filmdom as "Sophie Clutts," in "Snakeville" comedies, where she became a star overnight, is the magnet for members of the Western Essanay company, whose favorite breakfast dish is waffles.

"Sophie" in private life is Mrs. Harry Todd. The Todd bungalow in Niles has always been known for the home cooking rule, and many a pleasant dinner has been enjoyed there with Harry Todd and his wife playing host and hostess.

Someone discovered that Mrs. Todd was an expert at waffle making, and now almost every morning extra portions have to be made, not only from the fact that Harry eats his share, but the Todd waffles are in great demand and members of the company drop in "frequently" just so the food "won't go to waste." Ask Victor Potel about it.

HORTZMAN VISITS WORLD OFFICE.

E. Horstman, president of the Massachusetts State League, with headquarters in Boston, Mass., paid a hurried visit to the office of the Moving Picture World, New York City, just before taking the train back to the Hub on the afternoon of Friday, September 11. Mr. Horstman reports that everything is going along nicely with the Massachusetts exhibitors, and that he has at least 50 per cent of the exhibitors enrolled as members of the League, which is probably, if not, more in ratio to the size of the State of Massachusetts and the number of exhibitors therein than any other state. Incidentally it may be noted that Massachusetts is the only state in the Union without adverse picture legislation, all of which may be accredited to the dynamic energy of President Horstman and the assistance of his co-workers.

"Dr. Fenton's Ordeal."

Two-Reel Hepworth Dramatic Subject Contains Many Good Situations and Is Well Played.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THERE is a series of good situations running through the second and final reel of "Dr. Fenton's Ordeal," a Hepworth production now being released by Albert Blinkhorn. They are situations that stir the emotions—perceptibly at times, markedly at other points. It is a good picture, and it is interpreted by good players. Stewart Rome has the role of Guy Fenton, a doctor who in his youth has committed a robbery and escapes, to return to his native land later, famous in his profession, where he faces the predicament of operating to restore the sight of the only man who can identify him as a thief. It is a strong portrayal Mr. Rome gives us. Tom Powers, one time Vitagraph player, finely plays the part of Robert, the young man who loses his sight. Chrissie White is Sybil, Rupert's sister, with whom the returned specialist is in love. Henry Vibart is Mr. Harding, the uncle of the brother and sister; it is a lovable character.

Scene from "Dr. Fenton's Ordeal (Hepworth).

The story is fast; the action is sharp and holds the interest from the beginning. The struggle in the house of Mr. Harding, where the desperate medical student has entered in the hope of getting money to pay his gambling debts, is well shown. The fight is in a well-lighted room; each clearly sees the other. When in later years Dr. Fenton is called by his sweetheart to operate on her brother, who has been blinded in a chemical experiment, he recognizes the man he had attacked following the robbery. He is in a dilemma. If he restores the man's sight he will be denounced; he will lose the woman he loves. On the other hand, the sister is certain that he will be successful, and her love for her brother is of the strongest. Fenton does the manly thing and goes ahead, but he dodges the removal of the bandages, leaving that to others. Yet he must see Sibyl; he fights it out with himself and decides to meet his fate.

In the meantime Rupert, his eyes again normal, recognizes in a photograph the man who had struck him down and robbed his uncle. He, too, is in a quandary. He knows that this man loves his sister; that he has brought him back to the seeing as well as living; that he has atoned for his crime by his manliness. When the doctor arrives he is dumbfounded by seeing an extended hand as well as a look of recognition. It is a fine ending.

NEW FAVORITE PLAYER PRODUCTION.

The members of the Favorite Players Film Company are now back in Los Angeles from Tucson, Arizona, where they have been for the last two weeks taking the revolutionary scenes of the "Key to Yesterday," which was directed by Carlyle Blackwell, and is the first production of the Favorite Players. Considerable interest has been manifested in this picture because of the fact that it is Mr. Blackwell's first appearance on the screen, since leaving the Famous Players which company starred him in "The Spitfire."

By a contract recently closed with Richard Harding Davis, the Favorite Players have secured the rights to produce his world famous story called "The Man Who Could Not Lose," and work on this production has now started.

Eclectic Shows "War Stricken Louvain"

An Interesting Single Reel of Views of the Belgian City Taken by Captain Cherry Kearton.

THE Eclectic Company is showing a single reel of pictures taken by Captain Cherry Kearton, heretofore known to fame as a hunter of wild and domestic animals and birds with a motion picture camera. Captain Kearton is a friend of ex-President Roosevelt, who appeared on the platform of the Lyceum Theater a year ago last spring when the captain's African pictures were shown and praised the work of the explorer. Mr. Roosevelt said that he had met the captain in the wilds of Africa and knew him to be a man of his word. It may be of interest to point out that Captain Kearton uses a small camera—it weighs but fourteen pounds—with a gyroscopic attachment and propelled either by an ordinary crank or, if desired, by compressed air.

"War Stricken Louvain" is composed of a series of scenes showing sidelights on conditions in the stricken Belgian city during hostilities and before its destruction by the Germans. Some of the pictures are said to have been taken by Captain Kearton with his camera concealed under his raincoat, which conceivably well may have been the case. One of the most tragic of these, one of the most striking and one of the most dramatic in its revelation of the manner in which the innocent non-combatants suffer is the view of the peasants fleeing from the zone of battle. It is life as we read of it in the dispatches. The victims travel along the road on foot and in all sorts of farm vehicles. They are unconscious of the camera; they have left behind practically all of their earthly possessions, and they plod dully over the highway seeking only to save their lives.

There are about twenty-five scenes. In one there can be plainly noted in the distance smoke arising from burning buildings. In the opening picture there is a view of Belgian troops at Tirlemont, a suburb of Louvain, where their determined resistance retarded the advance of the Germans. Other scenes indicate the many grades of society making up the Red Cross division, soldiers awaiting instructions as the tide of battle flows, serving mess on the march, Belgians fortified behind brushwood awaiting attack, advance of cavalry, typical street scene during hostilities, artillery bivouacked for the night, cavalry going into action, dog-drawn rapid-fire guns which have played so important a part, a large number of carrier pigeons for message carrying, the canine hero which carried the now famous order to retreat—and he enjoys petting just as do his fighting masters—a massed regiment of laughing and cheering Belgians, stern work for the moment forgotten, and of terror-stricken groups at the railroad station hoping for transportation.

"MONEY'S" INITIAL SHOWING.

Before a distinguished invited audience, "Money," the massive multiple reel production of the United Keanograph Film Co., of Fairfax, Cal., was given its first official presentation in San Francisco, September 2.

D. J. Grauman and Sid Grauman, proprietors of the Savoy Theater in that city, placed the theater at Mr. Keane's disposal for the morning exhibition.

The spectators were composed of representative people, including Judge William P. Lawlor, the famous jurist who conducted the San Francisco graft trials; Andrew J. Gallagher, president of the San Francisco Labor Council, who said that "Money" is the greatest labor picture ever made and that every union man should see it; Ned Simmons, painter of the mural panels at the World's Fair, who declared that the tinting and light effects are an artistic triumph, and Sol Lesser, the widely known exchange man, who affirms that few pictures can even compare with it.

CAVALIERI A WAR NURSE.

Mme. Lina Cavalieri, the Manon in the six-part feature of the Playgoers Film Company, which met with such a brilliant success during its six-weeks' presentation at the Republic Theater during the summer months, immediately upon the outbreak of the European war, volunteered her services as a nurse and was accepted by the French Government. She was at once sent to Amiens and by a somewhat remarkable coincidence this is where many of the beautiful exterior scenes of the Manon Lescaut presentation were made by the Playgoers. She is still at this station, which has proven to be the scene of some of the most terrific battles of both the German advance and retreat, and is now administering to the wounded of both armies, where but a few short weeks ago she was enacting the role of Abbe Prevost's heroine in Manon Lescaut.

Death of Edwin Barbour

Well-Known Playwright and Stage and Screen Actor Passes Away at His Home in Philadelphia.

EDWIN BARBOUR, eminent playwright and actor, passed away Monday, September 14, at his home in Philadelphia. Mr. Barbour had been ill for a long time. He was well known to the picture-going public, having for the last three years been connected with the Lubin studio in Philadelphia.

The Late Edwin Barbour.

Edwin Barbour was one of the pioneers of the western show route, playing companies between Chicago and the Pacific Coast. As a playwright he was particularly successful. Older theater-goers will recall the hits registered by "Northern Lights," "Antietam," "The White Squadron," and "The Land of the Midnight Sun." Mr. Barbour's dramatization of Rider Haggard's "She" was played thirty years ago in the best theaters of the country. In the Lubin studio Mr. Barbour did not confine his work to acting, but followed his own bent for authorship and contributed many good scenarios, among the more notable of which was the five-reel production of "When the Earth Trembled."

Mr. Barbour was known to his associates as "Uncle Ned." One of his specialties was "old-man" parts; his friends say that if his characterizations were lovable and remarkably human they were but a reflex of his own self. It was but two weeks ago that the Moving Picture World in a sketch of Mr. Barbour's busy career quoted the actor-playwright as saying:

"I became spoken of as the 'old man' of the company before I had passed my twenty-sixth birthday." His modesty was revealed in his closing sentence: "About three years ago I drifted into Lubin's haven of rest, where I have been kindly permitted to remain ever since."

Meets Death Under Water

Noted Swimmer, Performing Before a Submarine Camera, Succumbs to Heart Failure Following Shark Fight.

FOLLOWING a performance before a submarine camera in the waters of Long Island Sound on the morning of Wednesday, September 16, A. Montano died from heart-failure. Montano, a Barbados mulatto diving boy, was recently brought to New York by the Progressive Motion Picture Corporation to do a sensational fight with a shark. The company had arranged to have the scene taken with the aid of the new submarine apparatus.

When everything was ready, the sharks were released, and Montano, with a knife between his teeth, dove overboard to give combat. The scene was performed successfully and Montano came to the surface for air. A few minutes afterward he again dove overboard, but this time failed to come to the surface again. The cameraman, beneath the water in an inclosed glass tube, saw him stand for a second upon the ocean bed, many feet under the water, and then suddenly fall over backward and lie still.

The cameraman gave the signal that something was wrong and was quickly drawn to the surface. Advising Harry Carey, the director in charge, of his fears regarding Montano, Mr. Carey himself plunged into the water, followed by "Dare Devil" Murphy, who also is appearing in the production and who gained notoriety a few years ago by diving from the Brooklyn bridge.

After some little delay Murphy succeeded in raising the drowning man to the surface. He was quickly taken into a lifeboat and every known means were used to restore respiration, but without success. Montano's body was taken to High Island and a physician summoned, but life was extinct. The coroner was notified, and after an inquest it was found that death was caused by heart-failure.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

THRILLS IN "BELOVED ADVENTURER" SERIES.

Because "The Beloved Adventurer" has been described as a character study—which it is—it should not be thought to be lacking in thrilling situations. On the contrary there are a dozen incidents that will cause the most hardened spectator to hold his breath in suspense or gasp with astonishment. This is not merely by reason of the exciting "business," but because the thrills are legitimate and are logical developments from reasonable situations, not mere "stunts" dragged in for the sake of spectacular effect, and because these incidents have been so introduced as to obtain dramatic contrasts of startling yet artistic abruptness.

Instead of following the not unusual course of writing his stories around some big mechanical effects or twisting machine-made plots to embrace them, the author of "The Beloved Adventurer" has made the sensational and spectacular scenes incident to and not the basis of the fifteen unit-plots contained within the one master-plot of the series. Usually the photoplaywright is hampered and limited by the consideration of expense, but it was not so in this case, the Lubin Company being determined that nothing should stand in the way of a perfect production and giving the author a free hand. There are, as a consequence, some effects which ordinarily would have been considered as "big" enough to serve as feature scenes in multiple reel productions, but which in "The Beloved Adventurer" are only incidents in the single-reel units—as, for instance, a head-on collision and the wrecking and burning of two railway trains and the burning and blowing up of a ship. Arthur Johnson is called on to display skill and daring in many ways, and Miss Briscoe performs a unique feat of lassoing, from the top of a hundred-foot cliff, a man standing at its base, and then dragging him up the sheer face of the rock like a fish at the end of a line.

Merely to read the book, the complete story of "The Beloved Adventurer," which Emmett Campbell Hall has written and which is published by the Lubin Company coincidently with the release of the film, is enough to cause one's pulse to quicken perceptibly, and to force the conclusion that "adventure" is a mild term to apply to the experiences of Lord Cecil.

Incidentally, it may be remarked that the novel idea of publishing the complete story in the form of a handsome book, to be sold by picture theaters, has already proven a complete success, the first announcement bringing a flood of orders for from five hundred to five thousand copies.

ANOTHER THANHOUSER MYSTERY SERIAL.

The decks were cleared for action at the Thanhouser studio when "Zudora," a forty-reel masterpiece of film construction, was started under the general supervision of Lloyd F. Lonergan, director of productions; Frederick Richard Sullivan, director, and Daniel Carson Goodman, author of the story. It is said to be bigger and better than the "The Million Dollar Mystery," with a touch of the wizardry of the Orient in it. Dr. Goodman, it will be remembered, is the author of "Hagar Revelly," the book that won its way through the Supreme Court. With Sullivan and Lonergan as collaborators, the production cannot help but be the best serial yet produced. In addition to this masterful trio, "Peggie" Snow, the incomparable; "Handsome Harry" Benham, as the juvenile lead, and Jimmy Cruze, as the heavy, will bring the theme before the public as only these artists can. All that could be hoped for in mystery will be found in "Zudora."

"THE AZTEC TREASURE" (Eclair).

A most interesting Eclair-Universal drama to be released by the Eclair Film Company, Inc., on Wednesday, Sept. 23, is "The Aztec Treasure," in two reels. This story features the popular Bob Frazer and winsome Edna Payne, and is filled with the atmosphere of adventure and romance. The stirring situations and tender love scenes will make the blood tingle and appeal to the hearts of young and old alike. The exciting experience of a young American in Mexico furnishes a story of much interest and power.

CLARA KIMBALL YOUNG WINS POPULARITY PRIZE.

The first prize for women in the popularity contest that the Motion Picture Story Magazine has been carrying on since January has been won by Clara Kimball Young, whose fortunes are now being directed by the Peerless Features Producing Company, and who will soon be seen in an adaptation of the Owen Davis play, "Lola," which is scheduled as one of the October releases of the World Film Corporation.

Clara Kimball Young is entitled to the congratulations of everyone of her admirers. Her total vote was 442,340. Her nearest competitor was Mary Pickford, who polled 437,670. The Young partisans claim that she is now the "queen of the screen."

"GOLF CHAMPION 'CHICK' EVANS LINKS WITH SWEEDIE."

"Chick" Evans, Western amateur champion and known all over the world as an expert golfer, takes the leading role in his first motion picture play in the Essanay comedy, "Golf Champion 'Chick' Evans Links with Sweedie," which is released by the Essanay Company October 2.

Although this is Mr. Evans' first attempt in film work, the young champion performed like a veteran and never once did he look into the camera nor do the other numerous things for which a screen neophyte is noted. He played real golf during the scenes, which were taken at the Edgewater Country Club, and otherwise distinguished himself in his first histrionical venture.

"Chick" Evans in Essanay Golf Comedy.

The announcement that Mr. Evans would play a part in an Essanay picture drew one of the largest crowds seen at the country club in several years. All of the big golfers in the city were in attendance, together with the most prominent club members, who watched the young champion do his first acting.

The story, which was written especially for Mr. Evans, opens with the young golf champion playing with his sister. "Sweedie" is the cook for a family of the "nouveau riche" and gets into the golf game after she receives a letter telling her that her uncle has left her an immense fortune.

The family of "nouveau riche," hoping to be in on "Sweedie's fortune, take her out to the country club as their guest. Here "Sweedie" meets young Evans and he proceeds to try and teach her the game. He has very little success, as "Sweedie" breaks all the clubs and insists on swinging on the ball as though she were knocking a "home run." Finally a riot call is sent in and the comedy police force appears on the scene and a terrific fight takes place between "Sweedie" and the blue coats.

In the meantime "Sweedie" has ordered her fortune delivered at the golf club. The fortune arrives just as she is putting the police force "hors du combat."

Wallace Beery as "Sweedie" is a laugh from start to finish, and through many of the scenes it is evident that "Chick" Evans is having much difficulty in restraining his mirth.

"A SHOT FROM AMBUSH." (Kleine).

A young girl's middle-aged guardian attempts to force his unwelcome attentions upon her; suddenly a shot rings out, and the man falls to the ground, seriously wounded. The police find a rifle near the scene of the shooting and on the stock they see the initials of the girl's fiance. The boy is arrested and forced to stand trial. This is the interesting situation presented in George Kleine's two-part feature film, "A Shot from Ambush," to be released through the General Film Company Tuesday, September 29. How the girl wages an apparently hopeless fight for her lover's liberty, finds her guardian's real assailant and tears down the wall of circumstantial evidence built about the man of her choice, gives us a dramatic story that deserves to rank high among the best of the Kleine productions.

"A Shot from Ambush" is a "Cines" photoplay, featuring Ignazio Lupi, familiarly known to Americans for his splendid work as Octavius in "Antony and Cleopatra," and Marie Hesperia, who recently won a comprehensive voting contest held to select the most beautiful actress appearing in European films.

FEATURING A WORLD FILM PRODUCTION.

General Manager Lewis J. Selznick of the World Film Corporation is very proud that the largest electric sign in New York City devoted to theatrical uses should be monopolized for the purpose of featuring the Shubert and William A. Brady photoplays. The current feature to be given the frame is Robert Warwick in George Broadhurst's

Electric Display on New York Theater.

"The Dollar Mark." William Morris owns the gigantic electric sign and makes good use of it in front of the spacious New York Theater, at Forty-fifth street and Broadway, which he has devoted to feature motion pictures. It is one of the finest "flashes" in the gay, white light district. The frame is 60 feet wide and 35 feet high. The letters used in the name—Robert Warwick—measure 9 feet, while the smaller letters are just half that size.

ALCO OPENING EXCHANGES.

The Alco Film Corporation announces that it has opened office exchanges in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Chicago, Minneapolis, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Indianapolis and New York, and that arrangements are about consummated for branches in Portland, Ore., San Francisco, Denver, Vancouver and Montreal.

The Philadelphia will be operated and controlled by the parent company. Its territory will include Eastern Pennsylvania and Southern New Jersey. Al Lichtman, president and general manager of the company, is on his way to the Coast, and is establishing offices at advantageous points throughout the Central West. Mr. Brown is operating in the South.

The first release of the Alco Programme is to occur on October 5, and everything is in readiness to present for the first time Miss Ethel Barrymore in "The Nightingale," which will be followed by Andrew Mack in "The Ragged Earl," and at the private showing of these pictures at the Alco offices during the past week, the general expression of opinion was given that these productions will furnish a pleasing surprise to the public.

WARNER'S FEATURES FAVORED ABROAD.

Sid Olcott, who has just returned from a prolonged sojourn in Europe with his company of players, says that foreign audiences have a great liking for American films, and that among the most popular are the American productions released through Warner's Features, Inc. These films are distributed through the various countries by Warner's London Exchange. Exclusive concessions are awarded to local concerns covering different territories, and by the time a picture has had its full quota of bookings the fans of every European nation have seen it.

A full-page Warner's advertisement appeared in a recent issue of La Vita Cinematografica, which is the Moving Picture World of Italy. The films advertised, "The Brute," is one of the Olcott productions released by Warner's in this country last April. It is a stirring story of life in a lumber camp, with Miss Valentine Grant in the leading role. According to all accounts, "The Brute" has met with big success abroad.

MISS JACKIE SAUNDERS.

MISS JACKIE SAUNDERS has dedicated her young life and talents to the pictures and will continue the impersonation of leads in most of the productions of the Balboa Company, of Long Beach, California. All of the big features in which she has so far appeared and those in which she is scheduled to appear will be released by the Box Office Attraction Company, of New York, in all sections of the United States; and, inasmuch as Miss Saunders has won thousands of enthusiastic followers throughout the country, it has been decided to arrange for her a tour of the principal cities.

Miss Jackie Saunders.

Picture fans everywhere will be given an opportunity to see this winsome little lady. Vivacious and sparkling with good humor, her personality is one that attracts the admiration of women as well as men.

Miss Saunders first presented her charmingly piquant face before the camera in the Universai studios of California and was a success from the beginning. But she did not jump into fame and popularity without previous training in stage productions, having begun her career before the footlights in New York against the wishes of her parents, who were staid Philadelphians of Quaker extraction.

In "The Will-o'-the-Wisp," Miss Saunders acted her part in the very vortex of a raging flood and narrowly escaped drowning on several occasions. But what would be daring to most girls is part of the day's business with her, and no stunt or task is too difficult for her to attempt. Her roles range from the harum-scarum minx in "The Will-o'-the-Wisp" to the heights of genuine drama. In six features which the Box Office Attraction Company is about to release, Miss Saunders displays her remarkable versatility. Among these productions are "Little Sunbeam," "The Square Triangle," "Rose of the Alley" and "Little Jackie." In the latter play she will be seen in boy's clothes to splendid advantage. She makes a wonderful boy, notwithstanding her aversion to masculine attire, and those who realize her capabilities predict that this character will be one of the best she has ever undertaken.

"When I first joined the Universal," said Miss Saunders, "it was impossible for me to put forth my best efforts. The stimulus of an applauding audience was lacking, and my sensibilities seemed to be dormant. I am sure that I was painfully mechanical, but gradually this feeling wore away. The pictures require more self-control, more self-reliance, and one's imagination must be on the alert. I always have a great curiosity to see myself on the film, but this privilege is seldom offered. The fact that I am in continuous demand, therefore, must furnish consolation enough."

SIEGEL WITH "AFTER THE BALL."

A. E. Siegel, who is known to almost every exhibitor in Ohio, Michigan and Pennsylvania, will handle for the Photo Drama Company its big production, "After the Ball," in which they feature Herbert Kelcey and Effie Shannon.

Ohio and Michigan will be his territory for this production and he is right at home in those states, as there is no doubt he has met almost every important exhibitor through that section face to face.

The company name of the new enterprise is the Big Attraction Film Company, and will be located in Mr. Siegel's office on the fifth floor of the Columbia Building, Cleveland, Ohio.

ED-AU CLUB MEETS.

The first meeting of the Ed-Au Club for the season of 1914-15 was held at Keene's Chop House on Saturday evening, September 5, with President "Pop" Hoadley in the chair. Letters of regret were received from Arthur Leeds, editor of the Photoplay Author, and Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice, who were unable to be present. A. D. Cloud, Daniel Carson Goodman, Carroll Deming, Elizabeth Lonergan, Mr. Potter, Benjamin Barondess and Roy S. Hanford were proposed for membership and elected. It was suggested that topics for discussion be offered and that members be notified that they might be prepared to talk thereon. Dr. Stockton offered as a topic for the next meeting: "What Constitutes the Educational Elements of a Photoplay."

Interesting talks were made by Mr. Sargent, of the Sawyer, Inc., Messrs. Veikoff, Powell, Acker and Wickes.

Mrs. Mary Louise Farley was elected secretary to fill the vacancy caused by the departure of Monte Katterjohn. The next meeting will be held on the evening of October 3 at the same time and place.

"TOYS OF FATE." (Lubin.)

This is a very picturesque and powerful melodrama produced at the Lubin Los Angeles studio, which offers all the advantages for realism of the Golden West. The story is told by Will M. Ritchey and is rather pitiful, inasmuch as a wrong is committed which cannot be repaired. A poor Italian is shanghaied and separated from his family, a wife and girl child. For twenty years he tracks the strike-breaker who impressed him and causes him to lose his dear ones, finally he finds him and discovers that his little girl, now a beautiful woman, is a member of the villain's family. He wreaks vengeance but at the last moment saves the family but goes to his own death. Captain Wilbert Melville, the manager, has given the play a strong cast, headed, of course, by Velma Whitman, his popular leading lady. The Lubin Los Angeles pictures for the past year have been extremely popular and Captain Melville may claim "The Toys of Fate" to be his most smypathetic and picturesque production. The scenes are laid in California.

ALEX LORIMORE PROMOTED.

Alex Lorimore, who among his other duties at the Box Office Attractions Company has been handling the booking of state rights subjects, has been made business manager of his concern's recently formed producing companies.

NOTES OF THE TRADE.

NEVER have Pauline Bush and Lon Chaney been seen to better advantage than in "Her Escape," the most recent of Joseph De Grasse's productions, written especially for the Rex cast by Mr. Chaney, who plays the role of heavy lead. In fact, the entire cast is of uniform excellence. Laura Oakley, as the "Salvation Army Girl," is worthy of particular mention.

It is predicted that not even Bob Leonard's famous lumberjack series can compare with the one-reel melodrama "Little Sister," on which he is working at present. It is a story of the underworld that carries a grip with it that will not be shaken off in a moment. It is not a problem play in any sense of the word, and still it carries a lesson that is rendered more valuable because of its subtlety. Mr. Leonard has just finished "Her Aunt's Will," a comedy drama that ranks well with the others.

Work is being started this week by the Vitagraph on two of the Brady plays by Wilfred North, assisted by Col. Brady. The five-reel play, "Hearts and the Highway." The principal female part will be played by Miss Lillian Walker. "The Island of Regeneration," Vitagraph, will be directed by Mr. Thompson. Miss Storey has the leading role. Mr. Moreno will play the part of John Charnock, the child marooned on the lonely island for twenty-five years.

Following the five-reel production of Charles Dickens' "Chimes," with the well known portrayer of Dickens' roles, Tom Terriss, Herbert Blache has completed another Dickens' photodrama, with Mr. Terriss in the leading role. His last effort is a pretentious production of "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," also in five reels. The scenario is by Mr. Terriss, who also collaborated with Mr. Blache in its staging.

* * *

Victor Potel, "Slippery Slim of Snakeville" fame, added to his popularity when he supported the constable of Niles, Cal. He "stump speeched" every "important" place in the township and was met with applause. At one place he was offered a keg of the finest. Potel politely declined.

Lydia Mead is starring in her first two-reel story, "The Cripple," a Paul Lonergan story with Nolan Gane in support. The little New Rochelle girl has had lead parts in "His Reward" and "Arty the Artist," and is rapidly climbing to the top in her profession.

Several interesting letters from Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady, dated Rome, have been received by Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady, the Vitagraph scenario writer. They contain vivid accounts of the trials and tribulations of the stranded American tourists in Italy immediately following the outbreak of the European War. Dr. and Mrs. Brady and three children were among the unfortunates, but arrived finally, succeeding in getting a ship bound home, the Ancona, September 12. Dr. Brady managed to secure valuable information, which will be used in the forthcoming production of the play made from his splendid book, entitled "The Fetters of Freedom."

James Corbett recently paid a visit to the Blache studio to see "The Burglar and the Lady," in which he played the stellar role under Herbert Blache's direction. Gentleman Jim has signed contracts to open his vaudeville season in the West, which call for his presence in Australia early in February.

DETROIT.

SEPTEMBER 7 to September 18 was State Fair in Detroit and, as usual, it brought many thousands of visitors to the city, particularly from the nearby places. Needless to say, the event had a good effect on the moving picture business. Labor Day, which was the first day of the Fair, was a record-breaker for the picture houses as well as those playing a combination of vaudeville and pictures. There was a big parade in the morning which lasted until noon. It brought about 250,000 people to the downtown thoroughfares. As soon as the parade finished there was a mad scramble for the theaters. The business continued until the last show at night. There is not a manager or proprietor who did not report a phenomenal day's receipts.

The semi-annual inspection of the moving picture theaters by the State Fire Marshal's bureau started September 8. There are four deputies making the inspection, and the thing they are after is the smoking and reading in the booths by operators. Managers of picture houses are with the marshals in this crusade. They want their operators to watch the films more closely. One operator in a Gratiot avenue theater lost his position recently because of his reading while the picture was being shown. The manager happened to be standing in the rear of the auditorium and noticed the picture was running slower than usual. The manager quietly went to the booth and saw the operator reading a new novel. This had happened once or twice before, so the manager engaged a new man for the place.

One of the deputies made the statement that it was surprising how few fires there were in the moving picture theaters, not only in Detroit, but throughout the state. It shows that, after all, the operaors and managers are very careful, although, like any business, carelessness will occasionally creep in.

The Garland theater at 225 Woodward avenue has discontinued business. The last picture was shown on Sept. 6. The reason is that the building has been leased by John H. Kunsy to the Woolworth Company of New York, who will remodel it for mercantile purposes.

Jammed to the street, Detroit's newest playhouse, the Orpheum, at Lafayette boulevard and Shelby street, opened Monday night, September 7. The president of the company, Col. Will A. White, House Manager Harry P. Williamson and Mayor Oscar B. Marx made appropriate addresses, complimenting the architect and contractors for their splendid work in making the theater so beautiful, and asking the co-operation of the people of Detroit in helping to make the theater a grand and permanent success. The Pathe war picture, which closed the show, came in for a big share of applause.

Five thousand men working at the Ford Motor Company's plant cannot speak the English language. Starting this month, the Ford Company, with the assistance of the Y. M. C. A., will form these men into classes and they will be taught the language. Later in the winter the motion picture machine will be used to instruct the foreigners in American customs and manners, a theater for this purpose having recently been completed in the Ford plant.

At the convention of Detroit and Wayne county teachers, held in this city from September 8 to 12, at which there was an attendance of approximately 2,000, the value of moving pictures in helping backward pupils was thoroughly discussed and it was the unanimous opinion of the convention that moving pictures were a great aid and should be encouraged in the schools.

The J. L. Hudson company, one of our largest department stores, has been featuring a "Mary Pickford" pillow, giving it free with every purchaser of six skeins. The descriptions read: "America's most popular 'movie' star was so captivated by this attractive pillow that its makers named it after her."

The Jewell will be the name of the new theater being constructed on Gratiot avenue, between Russell and Riopelle streets, by William F. Klatt.

"Detroit people could put this city on the map in South America with moving pictures of the wonderful things that are being made in manufacturing plants," said William A. Reid, government export authority, who spoke to merchants and manufacturers at the Board of Commerce on September 3. "The people in South America are passionately fond of moving pictures and it would be a master stroke at advertising Detroit if its industries were shown in the principal cities to business men. Nothing but the films need be taken along. They could be shown in the existing picture houses at little expense, and I am sure business men would be highly interested in them." As a result of Mr. Reid's remarks, a number of large manufacturers have arranged to have commercial films made and sent to that country.

That courtesy and politeness count in this world is emphasized and practiced by Jack Furney, who takes tickets at the door of the Empire theater. Jack has proven there is just as much science necessary to be a successful ticket taker as there is in any other trade or profession. The average man going into a theater simply drops his coupons into the box without even taking the time to look up or notice who the man is in charge of the box. But at the Empire an entire different atmosphere exists. Ninety per cent. of the regular patrons, and there are many hundreds of them at the Empire, always have something to say as they go by Jack. It's either "How's the show to-day," or "How are you," "It's a nice day," or some greeting of that sort. Jack knows them all by name and is able to respond accordingly. The result is going to be that in a few years hence Jack will find his personal acquaintanceship a great asset whether he stays in the moving picture or any other line of business.

John H. Kunsky, who has a lease on the Washington, is endeavoring to build up a different class of trade from that at his other picture houses, where the prices are 10 and 15 at some and 10 cents at the others. When Mr. Kunsky took the Washington and announced that prices would be 25 and 15 cents, a friend of his remarked that he did not think the people of Detroit would pay that price, as so many of them were only used to 15 and 10 cents. "We shall not disturb the 10 and 15 cent element," he answered, "but shall work up a clientele of people who can afford to pay up to 25 cents for a picture and who will appreciate the style of entertainment we have to offer them at that price. And we are going to be successful. Our business is growing every day. We are getting the very best people in the city. In thirty or sixty days we shall undoubtedly be doing a capacity business at every performance." Howard O. Pierce, manager of the Washington, is giving his patrons a splendid musical program each week. The musical numbers are selected with care and according to the pictures. It has always been the contention of Mr. Pierce that the music is just as important as the picture itself. Every attention is given by Mr. Pierce and his associates to accommodating and satisfying the patrons of the house. SMITH.

ILLINOIS.

A. D. SIMPSON and O. R. Ross, of Rockford, have leased the Dixon Opera house at Dixon and opened it Labor Day as a moving picture theater. The shows began with the serial "The Trey o' Hearts." Some theatrical attractions will be booked but the principal attractions will be photoplays.

Holmes Brothers & Baronfanger have opened their new moving picture house, the Lyric, at Salem.

E. F. Sheets, of Washington, Ind., has leased the Casino theater at Flora from A. Shriver of that city.

The remodeled Grand theater at Kewanee was opened on Labor Day.

Colonel Uden has opened the Uden Opera house at Flanagan, upon which he expended about $6,000. He has installed his own lighting and heating plants. Moving picture shows will be the principal attractions.

The Pastime theater at Malden was opened September 9. It will be operated on Wednesday and Saturday nights.

A Monmouth paper tells the reason for the success of Charles Conley in the moving picture business at La Salle: "He started charging ten cents admission when he opened his La Salle show and at that time all the others were showing for a nickel. He gave the people the best that money could buy and as a result got the business."

David Godfrey has closed his airdome at Philo for the season. The business was so good that it will be re-opened next summer with a moving picture program.

Bodkins & Keane have produced another of their home pictures at Evanston. This one, entitled "Love Against Wealth," has a number of prominent people in the leading parts and includes about 1,500 other persons. It was shown at the Star for three days and at the Grand for three days.

George Arends of Melvin contemplates opening a moving picture theater there as soon as the Central Illinois Utilities Company finishes the line which is to supply electric power to the village.

S. J. Deinlein has opened a moving picture show at Morton Grove.

The Rose theater, at Minonk, has a big light which acts as a signal for its patrons. Whenever the lamp is burning the people are sure there is another full show that evening.

Wilson McKim has leased the Lyric theater at Sterling to Harry G. Fields, of Pecatonica. The new owner will be assisted in the management by Charles Woodruff of Pecatonica. Edward Merritt of Pecatonica will be pianist.

The Star theater at Evanston is boosting its matinee business by using the poster stamp souvenir, giving a stamp at each afternoon show.

Manager Noble of the Duchess theater at Peoria has announced a new policy. Five reels are to be shown daily, except on Tuesdays and Fridays, when the program will be increased to six reels. The same admission of five cents will prevail.

Fred Whitmer of Springfield, formerly with the Central Feature Film Company of Chicago, has gone to Chicago, where he has taken charge of the Vaudette theater, at Fifty-fifth street and Ashland avenue. This house has formerly been conducted by C. P. Kiser for W. W. Watts of the Vaudette Amusement Company of Springfield.

Arrangements were made by Manager Davis of the Murphy opera house, at Mt. Sterling, to have a cameraman at the big picnic held in that city September 14. The films will be shown at the Murphy.

The Kozy theater at Galesburg has installed a new 1914 model Motiograph.

The Lyric theater at Lincoln has taken up the poster stamp plan of advertising, giving its patrons a stamp bearing the picture of a photoplay favorite each night.

The Photoplay theater at Lockport underwent a number of alterations before it was opened for the fall and winter season under the direction of Mrs. W. M. Ward.

Frank F. Miner, city clerk of Monticello, who bought the Globe theater at that place from Harry Plunk some time ago, has sold it to C. W. Joehrendt of Thomas, Okla., who has assumed the management.

The Randolph Amusement Company of Chicago has been incorporated with a capital stock of $10,000 to do an amusement theater and moving picture business. The incorporators are Richard H. Hollen, Abraham Levin and J. A. Massen.

The board of directors at the chautauqua at Paxton have taken steps to make high grade moving pictures a fixture on the assembly program. They have purchased the machine, steel booth and curtain which were used at the Coliseum and installed them in the chautauqua pavilion.

Company F of Illinois National Guard, of Benton, took part in the Gen. John A. Logan Day exercises at Murphysboro, so the management of the Airdome and Auditorium at Benton showed the films at a local picture. An addition was made to the program of a film of the Logan home in Benton, which had been made some time before.

The managers of the moving picture show in Turner Hall at Columbia began a baby show contest September 13, to run until October 18.

The Schmidt & Karuth Corporation of Chicago has been incorporated with a capital stock of $10,000 to do a general amusement business. The incorporators are O. F. Schmidt, Harry E. Krauth and R. Frank.

The University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign has installed a moving picture machine in the College of Engineering Building, to be used in connection with lectures on mechanical engineering.

Visits to a number of the moving picture theaters in Peoria were a part of the program when the representatives of the Peoria Life Insurance Company from different parts of the United States held their annual convention in that city.

E. J. Miller, formerly manager of the Bijou theater at Benton Harbor, Mich., will be the resident manager of the Barrison theater at Waukegan, which is now controlled by Fitzpatrick & McElroy of Chicago. The house will be operated in connection with the other theaters owned by the firm—the Grand and Lyric at Blue Island, the Fashion at Chicago Heights, Bijou at Bendon Harbor, Mich.; the Lyric at Roseland and the Blanche in Chicago. Three acts of vaudeville and three reels of pictures will be given for an admission of five and ten cents. The house was re-opened September 5. New projection apparatus has been installed.

Construction of the new theater building to be erected at Oregon by Manager Boos, of the Star, has begun. The house will have a balcony, which is a new local feature. It will be equipped for both picture and vaudeville shows.

The Finn & Heimann Amusement Company of Chicago has closed a deal for a site in Decatur for a theater, it is reported. Plans call for a structure seating between 1,200 and 1,400 persons and costing about $150,000. This concern is using pictures in some of its middle west houses and it is not unlikely that Decatur residents will have an addition to their photoplay theaters.

E. B. Cowing has remodeled his building on Second street in Peotone and has opened a moving picture theater.

The coincidence concerning the exhibition of "Kathlyn" pictures at Dreamland theater in Kewanee and rain continues. Manager Chris Taylor again advertised the popular Selig star and for the fourteenth time out of fifteen times the films were exhibited the city was visited by showers.

The Majestic theater at Paris has been sold to Herbert Johnson, manager of the Luna theater at La Fayette, Ind. After making some alterations the new management opened the house September 1.

E. P. Churchill, the new manager of the Hippodrome theater at Peoria, had a party of photoplay and vaudeville notables from Chicago and Milwaukee down for the opening. In the group were Thomas and J. E. Saxe of the Saxe Amusement Company, which now has control of the Peoria house.

The "Creation" pictures have been booked for a run at the Family theater in Rock Island, which has been running a regular motion picture program.

The Star theater at Aurora did a good business with a continuous exhibition of the first ten episodes of "The Million Dollar Mystery." The first five days of the week were given over to the serial, running two episodes a day.

The new Seavers' Hippodrome, formerly the Remington theater, has been opened with feature pictures at Kankakee. "Tess of the Storm Country" was the opening offering.

In the course of a heavy rain storm at Peoria the electric plant in that city was flooded with six feet of water. All the moving picture houses were full at the time. Concerts were given during the hour of darkness until the light came on. At the Hippodrome the lobby was crowded. Declaring it was too dark to take tickets, the management told the people to go in. After the show 145 stopped at the box office and paid.

The Canton Company Uniform Rank, Knights of Pythias, tied for first place in the contest at Terra Haute, Ind. The moving pictures did a good business at the Varietie in Canton.

Schmacker & Schultze have discontinued their nightly picture shows at the opera house in Troy and will operate only on Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday nights.

The Askin-Martin Company of Chicago has been incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000 to do an amusement business. The incorporators are Daniel I. Martin, Henry Askin and Edward J. McArdle, Jr.

Burr Swan's moving picture show in the Knights of Pythias Opera House at Pittsfield is hooked up with one of those Central Illinois Public Service central stations which are wiping out the local electric light plants in Illinois. The other night the power went off at 7.30 and came back on at 8 the next morning. For the first time in his photoplay career Swan was peeved to the point of utterance and, having a paper of his own, a troublesome proposition in itself, threatened to install his own power. His plaint follows:

"The opera house picture show was showing 'Paid in Full' to a house full of people, and finally had to dismiss the crowd, which had waited patiently for an hour and a half, hoping that the darn juice would come on again. It does look like electric current that would take Jess Thompson's and Jess (H.) Porter's stuff through the masheen ought at least be stout enough to run a perfectly respectable picture show. Never mind, the old man will build an electric plant of his own, some day, and then he can look the Cips company right square in the eye and repeat an historic but somewhat inelegant remark that fits the case. What with Lister going away on his vacation tonight, the old man will have to box the Intertype's jaws every few minutes, look after the service company, tend to the picture show, run a bill posting plant, keep his wife's disposition in good working order, read Huck Finn with Totsey, sell a 400-dollar lecture course, refund the money that's paid into Little Eva at the box office, and stick his nose into everybody's business twenty-four hours in the day. Outside of that, his time's his very own. The sun is shining this morning, anyway, and it's a pretty good old world, after all.

The management of the Cozy airdome at Belleville is impressing upon the public that it is not connected with the Cozy theater on West Main street. In stormy weather shows are given at the Lyric. MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

The Social Service Board at Tacoma, Wash., declined to recommend to city officials a change in the ordinance which provides that motion picture theaters must remain closed until 1 p. m. Sundays. The request that the board take this action was made by John Seifert, manager of the Palace theater. The mayor and one of the commissioners were in favor of allowing the law to stand as drawn.

The new moving picture and vaudeville house erected on Broadway in Rochester, Minn., will be known as the Empress.

Residents in the vicinity of Fifteenth avenue, East and Superior street, in Duluth, Minn., protested to W. A. Hicken, commissioner of public safety, against the location of a proposed moving picture theater in that neighborhood.

Lester Schwartz, formerly proprietor of the Grand theater at Rochester, Minn., has been appointed manager of the Majestic theater in that city. The Majestic has been overhauled for use as a picture house this season.

The Bijou Orchestra at the Bijou theater in Missoula, Mont., prepared a program of typical circus day music for use in connection with the exhibition of the Hagenback-Wallace feature films.

The Pastime Amusement Company of Mankato, Minn., has had cameramen at work making a reel of the local industries and beauty spots, the film to be shown at the Pastime.

The great woods and animal life of Minnesota are being exploited in moving pictures as a part of the campaign to have travelers see "America First," especially when it is difficult to tour Europe. The film, which is entitled "The Great Northwoods," is loaned by the Minnesota Forestry Commission. It was shown at the Pastime theater in Mankato recently in addition to the regular program.

Warrants were issued and served at Aberdeen, S. D., for the proprietors of the Lyric and Princess moving picture theaters charging them with exhibiting moving pictures for paid admission on Sundays and with disturbing religious worship on Sunday. The warrants were issued at the instigation of the Aberdeen Civic League.

Duluth, Minn., capital, it is said, has been interested in the project to erect a new theater at Eveleth, Minn. The Eveleth Commercial Club planned to take up the project at a meeting September 14.

Manager H. T. Moore, of the Moore Amusement Company, has fixed the first of October for the opening date of the new Colonial moving picture theater on C street, near Ninth street. The draperies of the house will be in old rose, the carpets in solid brown and the ladies' retiring room will have a color scheme of light blue.

Manager A. J. Kavanugh opened the vaudeville season at the Grand theater in Grand Forks, N. D., August 31. The bill this year includes regular exhibitions of the Paramount Features in addition to vaudeville. The house has been redecorated and renovated.

As the result of a name contest conducted in Lehi, Utah, the new moving picture house on State street in that city will be called the Royal.

George W. Metcalf is said to be preparing to erect a new theater at Douglas, Wyoming.

The Madison theater, showing pictures, has been opened at Broadway and Madison streets, in Seattle, Wash.

Earl Humphrey is now manager of the Lyric theater, Cheyenne, Wyo.

George Coler is now in charge of the moving picture theater at Fort Pierre, S. D.

A new moving picture theater has been opened at Melstone, Mont.

Frank Grams of Minot, N. D., was at Ryegate, Mont., looking for a location for a moving picture theater and photograph studio to be operated by his son and daughter. A new building, 24x75, will be erected.

SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST.

NEWSPAPERS at San Antonio, Tex, hint that there is probably some politics in the recent inspection of the motion picture theaters of that city. Alderman Dielmann announced that he had prepared a new theater ordinance, modeled after the state code, which would admit of the construction of the new Allamo Plaza theater, which was the bone of contention. Three entrances will be allowed to take the place of the side exits technically demanded under the older ordinance if the measure passes.

Uncensored moving pictures and conditions in Fort Worth, Tex., houses were discussed at a meeting of the mothers of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of that city. It has contended that it was necessary to have the films examined before they were shown to children and the organization made a recommendation that a city censor be employed. The movement for a federal national board of censorship also was endorsed.

The Healy theater at Fort Worth, Tex., has announced that, with the beginning of its daily programs of Paramount features, its admission price would be five cents except on Saturdays, when, after 1 p. m., the charge would be ten cents. A coupon ad presented at the box office the first day was good for a free admission.

The editor of the News at North Fort Worth, Tex., sees the moving picture theater as a business bringer. "We venture to predict," he says, "that the installation of these splendid motion picture houses will have a decided tendency to stimulate the business of North Fort Worth merchants."

The Isis theater at Hillsboro, Tex., was closed a week for remodelling.

Manager Thomas of the Airdome at Orange, Tex., is making improvements which will add 200 to the seating capacity of his place.

Seven reels of moving pictures which were made at the national Rotary Club convention in Dallas, Tex., for a member from Birmingham, Ala., named Bock, were shown at the Amuse-U theater in Birmingham.

The Cozy Amusement Company of Houston, Tex., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $1,000. The incorporators are Paul Barraco, R. L. Morris and R. Eislele.

Children were admitted free at the re-opening night of the Pastime theater, Kissimmee, Fla., G. L. Sawyer, manager.

Two days were set apart at the Isis theater in Houston, Tex., for a Post party. The Post is the Houston paper which is running the "Trey o' Hearts" and published its admission coupon on the first page—an unusual thing for a large newspaper. The coupon, which admitted readers free, was in the shape of the trey of hearts.

The Lyric theater at Oklahoma City, Okla, staged a novelty. The moving pictures of the national convention of the Brotherhood of American Yeomen at Des Moines were run. In this film the Oklahoma drill team was shown as the winner. After the reel was run the drill team appeared on the stage and duplicated the pictured performance.

John Miller, a real estate man of New Orleans, has taken a lease on the Hippodrome Building on Baronne street, in that city, and has begun its operation as a moving picture and vaudeville house. Mrs. Carl Leeds, a local soprano, was one of the early musical attractions.

The Southern Paramount Pictures Corporation and the World Film Corporation at New Orleans, La., issued notice that the trade names of those concerns were being used by persons not entitled to them. Both firms are exhibiting their pictures at the Fichtenberg houses.

Harry Woods is manager of the new Princess moving picture theater which has been opened on Third street at De Queen, Ark. It will seat 425 persons.

"On these hot afternoons when you almost wish you were sitting on the North Pole with an icicle in your hand," suggests the Hippodrome theater at Shreveport, La., "come down to the Hipp—if we can't keep you cool we shall give you back your money and pay you overtime for your trouble."

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

CINCINNATI.

LOCAL exhibitors are much interested in the reports of the organization of the Alco Film Company, with a capital stock of $1,500,000, combining five companies under one management, and issuing high-class features exclusively. The growing number of exhibitors who feature big attractions only is especially interesting by reason of the promise of the company that it will produce and issue only first-class attractions, frequently with well-known stars, so as to give to the exhibitor the greatest possible assurance of drawing power.

Stanley Hatch, formerly general manager in Cincinnati for the Universal Film Company, and more recently in charge here of the Universal's feature department, is now located in Portland, Me., as manager of the Mutual Film Corporation's branch there.

Special Representative Haynes, traveling out of the Cincinnati office of the Mutual, returned a few days ago from a booking trip through the territory covered by the office, and reports that exhibitors are looking for a big season everywhere. Few of them seem to be affected to any extent by business depression, and most of them, on the other hand, have noted an appreciable gain in patronage on account of the general interest in the war. Business for Mr. Haynes on the trip, therefore, was excellent.

Manager Clay E. Brehm, of the Cincinnati office of the World Feature Film Corporation, is much pleased with reports which he is receiving from exhibitors regarding the success of "The Lure," the latest Shubert attraction released in this part of the country. He was informed last week by J. Gross, manager of the Columbia, of Dayton, O., that that house handled the biggest business in its history while running the attraction referred to. R. S. Moran, of the Cleveland office of the World, was in Cincinnati last week on business, while E. D. Sheldon, of the local office, ran up to Columbus a few days ago for the purpose of investigating the censorship situation there.

The People's theater, one of Cincinnati's uptown houses, has fallen in line with the other houses, and was opened for the season with a combination program of vaudeville and motion pictures. The tendency of the theaters to feature motion pictures has been noted in these columns before, and it is a striking fact that during the first week of Cincinnati's regular theatrical season every house showed moving pictures, this being true also of the second week, notwithstanding the addition of another house (not a picture theater) to the list.

Benjamin G. Wheeler, formerly owner of he Auditorium theater in Dayton, and one of the best-known exhibitors in the city, left on Thursday of last week with his family for Chicago, where he will manage a motion picture house which he has leased. Mr. Wheeler expressed himself as sorry to leave Dayton, and said that if the opportunity ever presented itself he would return.

Two reels a day of motion pictures have been added to the program of the Colonial theater, of Dayton, by Manager Max Hurtig, as a feature of his three-a-day policy. Two evening performances and one in the afternoon make up the program.

The free lecture on "White Slavery and Vice in the State of Ohio," which was advertised to be given in Sandusky last week by Melvin J. Berry, was called off because, according to Mr. Berry, the State censors would not permit the showing of certain motion pictures in connection with the lecture which he considers necessary to its effect. "As 'Ten Nights in a Bar Room' is being stopped," said Mr. Berry, "I felt that it would not be worth while to take mine before the board of censors, as it shows real scenes which, I am satisfied, I would not be permitted to show." Sandusky is accordingly downcast.

The season of the Sun theater, at Portsmouth, O., was formerly opened last week, Manager Lee staging five acts of vaudeville with a reel of motion pictures. The house has been redecorated, and large audiences testified to the eagerness of the town to see what Manager Lee had to offer.

The Lyric, of Portsmouth, O., showed Mary Pickford in one of her earlier successes, "The Thread of Destiny," one night last week with a two-part Vitagraph, "John Rance, Gentleman," to supplement it, making up an unusually attractive program. Old releases in which "Little Mary" is featured are proving as good drawing cards as anything which can be had, according to exhibitors, as the mere announcement that such a picture is to be shown is sufficient to draw crowds.

Manager William Martin, of the Alhambra theater, in Sandusky, O., made himself solid with the boys handling the two local papers on Thursday afternoon of last week, when they attended a performance of "For the Last Edition," the three-reel Reliance feature of newspaper work, produced at Los Angeles under the direction of Fred A. Kelsey, who was himself formerly a Sandusky newspaper boy. Mr. Kelsey, director of the Reliance company, wrote Manager Martin that he wanted the boys to see this picture as his guests, and Manager Martin was only too glad to comply with this wish, save that he insisted that it was his treat.

CASEY.

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE EXACTUS PHOTO FILM CORPORATION has been incorporated here with a capital stock of $150,000 by T. K. Peters, D. Lever, T. Peterson, R. L. Green and L. A. Wittenmyer. The latter has offices in the Balboa Building.

The International Harvester Company has been given a judgment for $35,000 against the Coast Theater Company by Judge Crothers. The judgment is for money taken from the Harvester Company by Wallace J. Poland, the former cashier of the local office, and invested by him in the moving picture concern. Poland is now serving a term of seven years in the penitentiary for the offense.

Extensive provisions have been made for showing moving pictures in the San Francisco Auditorium now approaching completion on the Civic Center. The main hall will seat more than 10,000 persons, and in addition there will be two great banquet rooms and four exhibition rooms, all provided with moving picture facilities. At the close of the 1915 Exposition a great organ will be installed in the structure.

Contracts have been let by Daniel Sullivan for the erection of a moving picture theater building on Divisadero street, near Page, the contract price being $9,000.

The Regal Feature Film Company has opened offices in the Pacific Building under the management of F. E. McCoy and is handling, among others, the productions of the Cosmofotofilm Company and Greene's Feature Photoplays, Inc. Mr. McCoy is well known on the coast, having been associated with several of the leading exchanges during the past few years.

Nine thousand feet of Arctic pictures, taken by the moving picture expedition that went north last spring on the whaler Herman, have been received and developed by Eugene Roth of the Portola theater, Edward H. Kemp and the Liebes interests. Word has just been received from Nome to the effect that six bowhead whales have been taken and pictures secured. A number of attempts have been made to take pictures of bowhead whaling but it is believed that this is the first time that success has been attained. The Herman will now attempt to get to Wrangell Island and rescue the members of the Stefansson expedition who are stranded there. Captain Peterson of the Herman has an interesting relic in the letter written by Captain Bartlett of the wrecked ship Karluk asking for help. This letter was carried by white Eskimos seven hundred and fifty miles to Dutch Harbor and when Captain Bartlett was rescued moving pictures were secured of the event.

The fourth week's run of the Selig production, "The Spoilers," at the Portola theater was a great success, there being scarcely a performance when the theater was not taxed to its full capacity. Fully as much interest was shown as on the first week and many came a second, and even a third, time to see it.

New opera chairs are to be installed shortly in the Unique and V-Odeon theaters on Market street, conducted under the management of Joseph Huff, and both places are being renovated. A 10-cent policy is now in force two days a week at these houses and the proposition of increasing the number of days when an admission price of 10 cents will be charged is under consideration.

Edward H. Kemp has shipped a number of industrial films, showing Western industries, to the Philadelphia Museum. Mrs. Kemp is preparing a lecture on the Hawaiian Islands, having recently spent two months there securing material. This will be illustrated with moving pictures and colored slides.

The annual Bay Outing of the Camera Club, with which many moving picture photographers are affiliated, will be held on September 27.

The Sherman theater on Mission street has changed hands and is now being conducted by L. F. Guernhart.

The Turner & Dahnken Circuit has closed a deal whereby the Shubert productions being released through the World Film Corporation will be shown exclusively at its houses, the service commencing September 20 at the Tivoli. The releases of the Paramount Pictures Corporation will also be shown on this circuit, outside of San Francisco.

"The Greyhound" is the next attraction booked for the Tivoli theater and it is being strongly advertised.

The Supreme Features Corporation, recently incorporated here, has opened offices at 124 Golden Gate avenue, and is ready to make its first release. It is now offering "Beasts of the Jungle," a production that recently enjoyed a highly successful run at Grauman's Imperial, and which has been described by a number of film men as being the greatest animal picture ever made. O. V. Tragghard is president, and Charles Stillwell, secretary and treasurer of the new concern.

The San Francisco office of the Pacific Mutual Film Corporation has just closed the greatest week's business in its history, confirming the general reports that the moving picture business in this territory is getting into good shape again.

Miss Lillian Langdon, a prominent moving picture actress, called upon the California Motion Picture Corporation this week on her way to New York.

The office of George Kleine's Attractions is now located in the Pacific Building, where large quarters have been secured on the sixth floor. Joseph Deitch, who has been in the office for some time, has been promoted to the position of road man and his place has been taken by Louis Corthay. The Pacific Building is becoming quite an exchange center, the following firms now being located there in addition to George Kleine's Attractions: The Progressive Motion Picture Co., the Panama-Aero Film Co., the Nat A. Magner Co. and the Regal Feature Film Co.

The first presentation of the spectacular, seven-part production, "Money," written and produced by James Keane, was given at Grauman's Savoy theater on the morning of September 2 before a large audience of invited guests, including the leading film men of the city and many of those who took part in the production. The picture created a decidedly favorable impression, some of the scenes being on a scale never before seen in American productions. The banquet scene was especially magnificent and the destruction of the multi-millionaire's palace by fire was realistic in the extreme. The strength of the plot, the lack of padding and the artistic manner in which the piece was handled bespeak success for the production when it is released. It is the first large production turned out in the San Francisco Bay district, where the making of moving pictures is now commencing on an extensive scale and is a distinct credit to beautiful Fairfax and the United Keanograph Company.

P. S. Crawley, formerly of Bakersfield, Cal., has purchased a one-half interest in the Capitol theater on Sacramento street, San Francisco.

The Golden Gate Film Exchange has purchased the Coast rights for the production "Lay Down Your Arms." President Sol Lesser of this concern is preparing to make a business trip to Los Angeles at an early date.

B. Mulvaney, who has been making his headquarters with the Independent Film Exchange for some time, is now with the Nat A. Magner Company, Pacific Building.

Oliver Powell, of the Star theater of Crescent City, Cal., was a recent visitor here to arrange bookings.

The many friends of "Rube" Goldberg, formerly a cartoonist of this city, but now of New York, are watching for the release of the production, "He Danced Himself to Death." The scenario of this comedy was written by Mr. Goldberg for the Vitagraph Company. The picture will be shown at the Market Street theater as soon as it is released here.

The Independent Film Exchange of San Francisco has moved its Los Angeles branch from the Los Angeles Investment Building to 731 South Olive street, where quarters are being shared with the Union Film & Supply Co.

Joseph Huff, of the Unique and V-Odeon theaters, has been chosen treasurer of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of San Francisco, succeeding A. Goldberg, who recently resigned.

The local authorities are looking for W. P. Muir and a man named Baker, who have victimized a number of film exchanges and theater owners of San Francisco and Oakland during the past few weeks. The scheme was to secure service from the exchanges and then take the films to small theaters in the outlying districts and conduct exhibitions on a percentage basis. The bills at the exchanges were not paid and in many cases the theater owners failed to secure the percentage of the receipts agreed upon. These parties recently secured a feature attraction from George Kleine's Attractions and showed it at the Linden theater at Oakland, representing that they controlled that house. The films were not returned to the office, but were left with the elevator man in the building, and the owner of the Linden theater received nothing, being compelled even to pay the operator out of his own pocket. A warrant was sworn out for the men and it was then found that almost every exchange in the city had been victimized. Among others whose accounts are unpaid are Warner's Features, the Globe Film Exchange, the Independent Film Exchange and the Union Film & Supply Co.

At a special meeting of the directors of the Exhibitors' League of California, held this week, it was decided to hold the third annual convention at San Francisco on October 6, 7, 8 and 9, instead of at Sacramento, as originally planned. This change was made in order that there might be a large attendance, as matters of utmost importance to the trade are to be considered. The following committee of arrangements has been appointed to make preparations for the meeting: M. E. Cory, president of the Exhibitors' League of San Francisco; F. R. Macauley, vice-president; R. L. Marks, secretary; J. A. Huff, treasurer; C. L. Langley, I. Oppenheimer and George Knowles, directors; Charles Goddard, of Sacramento, president of the State organization; W. H. Hilts, of San Diego; J. Ray Williams, of Sacramento, and H. L. Beach, of Berkeley, vice-presidents; W. A. Cory, San Francisco, secretary, and C. L. Mehrten, Berkeley, treasurer. Other committees are now being appointed and arrangements are being made for the entertainment of visiting delegates, the preliminary plans including a trip on the bay and an inspection of the Exposition grounds, a banquet at which Governor Johnson will speak and a grand ball.

Chief of Police David A. White has again issued orders prohibiting the exhibition of any war pictures showing armies of Europe in action, whether the views are actual or not. While exhibitors and exchange men agree that he is overstepping the bounds of his authority, the order is being generally obeyed, and as far as possible these subjects are being sent to nearby cities. The chief difficulty at the present time is to judge what will pass the scrutiny of the Police Department, some war views being allowed to be shown unmolested, while the exhibition of others is stopped.

A. Cuneo has opened the Wigwam theater at East Bakersfield, Cal.

The vacation season being at an end, the Monte Rio Theater, at the outing place of that name, has been closed and will not be reopened until next spring.

The Piratsky Opera House, Watsonville, Cal., has added a new Motiograph machine to its equipment.

The new Liberty theater at San Jose, Cal., has installed a motor generator set in its projection department, this being the first installation in that city, or in the vicinity.

Contracts have been let for the erection of a one-story brick moving picture theater building at South San Francisco for Roy Morton and E. J. Eschelbach.

The Photo-Play Amusement Co. has been incorporated at Los Angeles with a capital stock of $20,000 by W. F. Bierhans, H. A. Bierhans and L. P. Green. CHURCH.

KANSAS.

THE Rex theater of Fort Scott opened September 2 with a General program. It is running all the big features handled by that company.

George E. Swope, district sales manager of the Maxwell Motor Sales Corporation at Wichita, is trying to secure a theatre in which he can exhibit the films taken at the Maxwell factory. The films show the process of motorcar construction from the molten metal to the finished car, and are to be shown for the purpose of instructing the salesmen.

Cohn's airdome at Lawrence has found a way to boost receipts. The management has secured a company of Tabloid players from the east, and since the Tabloid form of entertainment has not invaded the west to any marked extent as yet, they have been very popular in Lawrence.

The Kafir Corn Carnival Committee of Eldorado is planning to have moving pictures taken of the parades and crowds at the annual Corn Carnival held in Eldorado, which is the county seat of Butler county.

The Novelty, a popular vaudeville and "movie" house in Topeka, has again opened for the 1914-15 season. W. L. Fleming, treasurer, has been spending the summer months with his parents in Washington, D. C. He will assume the management of the house.

The airdome at Gas closed August 28 for the season. Heretofore the airdome has remained open until the middle of September. Manager Wheaton expects to open the Grand theater soon, and also the Majestic, which is being remodeled.

The Hip theater at Topeka is having the sides of its lobby lined with marble and mirrors. A fine new electric sign has also been swung in place.

The Hippodrome theater at Leavenworth is making an effort to secure as many comedies as possible during the war, the object being to use its programs as gloom chasers, and to uplift the pensive feelings of its patrons.

The films taken along the route of the Santa Fe trail are being shown throughout Kansas in cities through which the trail passes. The scenes extend from Kansas City to Los Angeles, and show everything on the trail that would be of interest to the public.

The Gem theater at Arkansas City has found a way to stimulate interest in its afternoon shows. Each child that comes to the Friday afternoon performance gets one ticket good at the Saturday matinee. Although this is virtually giving the children two shows for the price of one, it has been found that it has increased the popularity of the house.

Casto Brothers of Ossawatomie have leased the Stardome for the balance of the summer season, after which they will open the Cozy theater in the same city. Both of these young men are well known in Ossawatomie, and there is not much question but that they will succeed.

The Skydome at DeKalb has been closed for the winter and the shows are now being given in the Opera house. The last performance at the Skydome was Kodak Night. Miss Mary Murphy held the lucky number and received a fine little kodak.

Moving pictures are being used to great advantage in the Boy's State Industrial School as a means of entertainment for the boys. The entertainments are given every Tuesday night, and usually consist of three reels of pictures, special music, and speaking on current topics.

BROWN.

KENTUCKY.

BUSINESS has been considerably better with the Louisville exhibitors during the past week. Cool, dry weather was responsible for this condition. Car rides to the parks were slightly uncomfortable, on account of the chilliness of the evenings, and business flowed to the motion picture houses. Coupled with the fine weather conditions, were a number of superfine pictures, which went big with the Louisville movie enthusiasts.

The big Universal production of "Neptune's Daughter," in which Annette Kellerman takes the leading part, made such a hit at the Mary Anderson theater, Louisville, that it was held over for the second week at fifty cents per head for the night exhibitions. This picture got the strongest run and the highest admission price of any picture ever shown in the city.

Announcement has been made that the old walls of the Hopkins theater, Louisville, which was recently burned, will be wrecked and a new theater erected on the old site. The house draws a good volume of business from Market street and has been successful as a motion picture house. The new building will probably be in the nature of a regular motion picture house of large dimensions instead of the old-style theater building, which was formerly used.

Plans for a new motion picture theater, to cost not less than $40,000, which will be erected in Louisville, on Second street near Magnolia, were made public last week. The new house is to be built by the Broadway Amusement Company, already controlling a chain of theaters, including the East and West Broadway theaters, Crown, Ideal, Baxter, Walnut and several others. The announcement of the plans for the new house was made by Fred Dolle, president of the Broadway Amusement Company, which is a corporation, including Mr. Dolle, Joseph L. Steurle and Dennis Long. Mr. Dolle is also an officer in the local and state exhibitors' associations. According to Mr. Dolle, the site for the new house has already been purchased and application for a building permit will be made in a few days. The new house will have a seating capacity of 1,200 and a summer airdome immediately adjoining, with a seating capacity of 1,500. The location is in the heart of the best residential district of Louisville.

The Masonic theater, Louisville, has decided to run motion pictures every Sunday in lieu of burlesque, which is operated six days of the week. According to the Masonic rules, no stage performance is allowed in the theater on Sunday, but motion pictures are not in the same classification. Edward F. Galligan, local manager of the theater, which is operated under the auspices of the Progressive Amusement Company, opened the motion picture sessions with the great four-reel version of Pendleton's "Round-Up." Four Sunday performances are given, at 2 and 3.30 in the afternoon and 7.30 and 9 o'clock at night. The price of admission for any seat in the house has been placed at twenty-five cents for any of these performances.

H. M. Harris has purchased the Princess theater, at Morganfield, from Hurley Brothers and took charge of the house on September 1. The "Kathlyn" and "Perils of Pauline" series are still being run at the house in addition to a number of Essanay, Kalem and Lubin productions.

Frank Daniel, formerly of Tullahoma, Tenn., who has been the operator at the Dixie theatre, at Russellville, since that house was first opened, has resigned his position to accept a position with a new stock company of local men who will open a new house in Russellville about September 20.

The White Theater Company, which opened a theater at Scottsville in May, has been very fortunate and is handling a good business at this time. The six-reel production of Paul Rainey's African pictures was shown August 27 to 29 to large crowds.

It has been reported that the managers of the old Lyric theater, of Winchester, which recently quit business because of lack of patronage in that city, are figuring on opening a new house at Jackson. Manager Stivers, of the Hippodrome theater, of Jackson, remarked in connection with the report that he had heard of the rumor, but that he thought it would be a good thing for the promoters of the new show house to consult the former managers of the People's Theatrical Company, which tried to open an opposition house in Jackson. "They can give the promoters some valuable information and personal experiences concerning the making of a second house pay in Jackson," said Mr Stivers.

Carpenters working on the new Cherokee theater at Bonnycastle avenue and the Bardstown road, in Louisville, have had a little ruction with the plasterers on the job because the latter preferred to erect their own scaffolding. The consequence was that the carpenters struck, and work has been tied up to some extent as a consequence. Several accidents have happened inside of the past few months over falling scaffolding, and the plasterers preferred to see that it is properly put up. These trades dissensions have also held back work on the new Fourth Avenue Amusement Company's building, which is being put up by George Alt & Co., who have the Cherokee house also. G. D. CRAIN, JR.

WISCONSIN.

THE Gem theater at Portage is taking part in a photoplay title guessing contest in which cash prizes amounting to $250 are to be distributed among the forty-eight persons submitting the nearest correct lists of puzzle pictures, each one of which represents a photoplay.

Paul R. Philip, the new manager of the Pearl theater at De Pere, and Roy Hannon, a photographer of that city, plan to engage in the business of taking moving pictures. Films of local interest will be shown at the Pearl.

Albert Schultz, formerly of Spring Grove, Ill., has opened a a moving picture show at Schleisingerville.

Mrs. M. J. Willey is now sole proprietor of the Idle Hour theater at Phillips, having purchased the interest of B. Bracken.

H. H. Hile has not selected a name for his new theater, which he is erecting in Evansville and which he expects to open about January 1. He has offered a prize of fifty tickets to the person submitting the most attractive title. If the theater is to run nothing but comedy films the name Hilarity probably will be submitted.

Moving pictures of events taken each week at the race matinees of the Washington Park Driving Club at Milwaukee have been featured by the Alhambra theater in that city.

G. R. Radley, president, and two other members of the Milwaukee board of censors, are back from New York, where they conferred with the members of the national board. The Milwaukee idea of co-operation rather than promiscuous "banning" of films was endorsed by the national organization. Since the Milwaukee board was established it has not been necessary to ask the mayor for the revocation of a single moving picture theater license.

A typical reel of local pictures was made at Superior for the Princess theater, including a run by the fire department, factories, school, churches, etc.

The Hexagon Light and Amusement Company has been incorporated at Delavan Lake to take over the moving picture business on the Delavan Lake Chautauqua assembly grounds. J. S. Blakely, of Union Grove, is interested in the project.

The opening of the German theatrical season in Milwaukee is uncertain and the Pabst theater, Ludwig C. Kreiss, manager, has begun a season of feature photoplays, changing the bill each week. "The Littlest Rebel" was the initial offering.

Max Schurer has opened the Lincoln, a new moving picture theater, at the corner of Thirteenth street and Lincoln avenue, in Sheboygan. The new house is in the northwest part of the city.

Michael Carpenter, who contemplates the erection of a new theater at Sixth street and Grand avenue in Milwaukee, may delay the project owing to present unsettled conditions.

Milwaukee women were the guests of the Boston store at an exhibition of the Chicago Style Show films at the Alhambra theater in Milwaukee.

IOWA.

MANAGER FROST of the Unique and Majestic theaters at Atlantic City wanted the county attorney to tell him why, if a Chautauqua could operate on Sunday, it was illegal for his two picture houses to operate. He declared he was giving nothing but the cleanest and best shows. The county attorney gave it as his opinion that the Chautuaqua is of an educational nature and also that the picture shows could not legally run. Frost has announce that if possible he will open his houses on the Sabbath.

Thomas Knudston has sold the moving picture equipment used in the Royal theater at Webster City to Charles Webster of Waucoma. The outfit was operated at Webster City during fair week and then removed to the opera house at Waucoma, where Knudston will operate a show.

The Saturday Record, a sort of a weekly review and interpreter of events in Cedar Rapids, is running the story of "The Trey o' Hearts," which is being shown at the Olympic and Colonial theaters in that city.

All members of the Grand Army of the Republic and all children under ten years of age were admitted free at the Saturday matinee when "The Spy" was shown at the Empire theater in Storm Lake.

Harry Shurtz has closed the Airdome at Shenandoah and it is not likely that it will be re-opened. Shurtz has announced that he will not operate it again.

Educational moving pictures will play an important part in the Iowa State Fair at Des Moines this year. Among the films shown will be the bee-keeping pictures loaned by the United States Department of Agriculture, student activities and grounds at the Iowa State University, the United Manufacturing Company will demonstrate the making of shoes, and the work being done for good roads in Iowa will be shown on the screen.

M. E. Thompson has sold the Pastime theater at State Center to B. F. Belt of Colorado.

B. L. Francis has opened his new Royal theater at Spirit Lake. The building is 24x120, of pressed brown and red brick, is one of the handsomest little houses in the state. It has a seating capacity of 400. A new Powers 6-A machine has been installed to insure good projection.

The new moving picture house which will be erected on Fourth street, in Waterloo, and which will be managed by J. E. Bryant, will be known as the Plaza. It will be opened about November 1. About $35,000 will be expended in its construction, and it will have a number of pleasing features, including a $5,000 pipe organ, two elevated loges seating thirty-five persons, and it will be free from galleries and balconies. Despite the lack of these it will seat 900 persons.

Albert Hahn has opened his new moving picture show in the Fesler Block at Riverside.

James M. Thomason has decided to close the Idle Hour theater at Marcusx and seek another location.

Albert Bailey of Dows has purchased the Lyric theater at Rockwell from Ray Williams.

L. H. Green has purchased a moving picture theater at Gilmore City.

J. P. Linquist has disposed of his moving picture show at Nashua.

MIDDLEWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

PENNSYLVANIA

THE NOTED PLAYS FEATURE COMPANY has opened an office at 409 Ferry street, Pittsburgh, under the temporary management of Adolph Klein, who is the manager of the Keno Feature Film Company, Inc., 101 Fourth avenue.

The Nittany theater at State College, Pa., reports record breaking crows every night. The management states that it is the photoplays which he shows in his house that draws the large crowds to it. He has been showing such pictures as "Chelsea 7750," "Port of Doom," "The Oubliette" and "Trey o' Hearts."

Manager Seitz, the new manager of the Lyric theater, at Canonsburg, Pa., extended an invitation to the Industrial League officials and players to attend the show at his playhouse last week, free of charge. He will also conduct a benefit for any team whose manager desires same.

The Lyceum, capacity 1,350, and the Savoy, capacity 600, of Butler, Pa., which has been closed during the summer months, have been re-opened for the winter season. Samuel S. Hanauer is owner and manager of both houses and anticipates a good season.

J. R. Newman, of Ludwig Hommel & Company, at Pittsburgh, reports business very good, especially in projection machines and supplies. This week Ludwig Hommel & Company received orders for full equipment for two houses, one in Pennsylvania and one in West Virginia, besides orders for four projection machines. Mr. Newman says carbons are very scarce.

The Feature Film & Calcium Light Company of Pittsburgh, Pa., has on display the new Baird projection machine which is proving a great attraction for exhibitors, operators and the picture men generally.

About twenty-five employes of the Independent Film Company at Pittsburgh, Pa., enjoyed a pleasant day in Bradford woods, about sixteen miles out the Harmony line at a corn roast on a recent Sunday. Twenty-two dozen ears of corn were devoured. The party left shortly before noon and arrived back in the city at 10 P. M.

A. W. Goff, formerly connected with the Pittsburgh Calcium Company, is now the manager of the Eclectic Film Exchange, succeeding F. H. Vine, who has been transferred to the Boston branch of the same company. Mr. Goff was manager of the Cleveland branch of the General Film Company for the past three and a half years.

Manager P. J. Donovan of the Arsenal theater, Butler street, Pittsburgh, Pa., recently took a most enjoyable trip in his new Maxwell auto. He traveled 900 miles without a mishap, visiting Conneaut, Erie, Cambridge Springs, Buffalo and Niagara Falls. His wife and mother-in-law accompanied him.

F. S. Frazier has taken the position of manager of Gus Sons' booking office, which was formerly located in the Wabash building, but has recently been moved to the Schmidt building, Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh. Mr. Frazier was formerly manager of the Majestic theater at Oil City, Pa., and owner of the Mecca theater at Ashtabula, Ohio.

John Goebel, of the North End theater, Perrysville avenue, Northside, Pittsburgh, has been nominated as the only candidate for president of the Moving Picture Exhibitors Association, to succeed Fred J. Herrington, resigned.

MANLEY.

MISSOURI.

R. C. CLOPPER, manager of the Universal Film Co. at Kansas City, is trying an experiment with film carriers which promises to solve that most vexing problem. It is well known that no film carrier so far offered is absolutely perfect—even the best ones suffer when roughly handled, or when accidents happen. The fibre case is light and withstands rough usage tolerably well, but the fibre sometimes breaks, and new handles must be put in occasionally. The carrier which Mr. Clopper has had made is a fibre case, but the fibre lies between two thin sheets of iron. The iron is not thick enough to add much to the weight, and the case is still flexible. The hinges and straps are riveted to the metal and do not pull out. The box is coated with the mixture used on locomotives to prevent rust. The use of these cases is still in the experimental stage, but other exchanges are watching closely, to see whether there has been discovered a fairly sure method of shipping films and avoiding the complaints of "bad order."

From the appearances now it would seem that Kansas City is to have a building devoted exclusively to moving picture companies. The new Ozark building, recently completed, is already housing two companies, the latest arrival being the Mutual, which gave up a ten months' lease in the building they were occupying so that they might get space in the new building. The Box Office Attractions are now making arrangements to lease the remainder of the third floor not occupied by the Mutual. The Eclectic Co. was the first to move in, and it is reported in film circles that the Universal will move in if they can relieve themselves of their present lease. The building is admirably equipped for the film business, being absolutely fireproof and having a freight elevator.

The latest company to enter the "movie" field in Kansas City is the Box Office Attractions. Gerald Akers will have charge of the Kansas City branch, which will be located in the Ozark building.

Lemar Mereness, of Liberty, was in Kansas City last week to secure a moving picture photographer, for the purpose of getting a view of the Missouri Valley fox hunt to be held near Liberty, Mo., some time near the last of September.

The Family theater of Nevada opened its doors for the fall and winter season August 29, with service from the General Film Company.

C. C. Wenck, well known business man of LeMonte, Mo., has purchased the Electric theater from H. E. Yankee and will conduct the business in the future. The equipment of the theater is of the best, and it has a splendid power plant for the sole purpose of supplying light for the machine and house.

Moving pictures of the boy scouts taken at their camp in Elk Springs, Mo., will be shown in Kansas City about the first of October. These pictures portray all of the activities of the boy scouts, and are accompanied by an experienced lecturer.

Every boy scout in Kansas City was invited to attend the Rainey African hunt pictures, the only requirement being that the boy wear his scout suit. It is needless to say that every scout that could, saw the pictures.

M. E. Moore, a well known theater man, late of Okmulgee, Okla., has taken charge of the theater located at Twelfth street and Grand avenue in Kansas City, known as the Crystal. Mr. Moore has remodeled the theater, which had been closed for over a year. It opened Monday, September 7, with a Mutual program projected with a brand new Powers.

BROWN.

CONNECTICUT.

AN audience that numbered 5,000 was crowded into the Crown theater at New London when its doors were opened for the first time on Monday, September 7, at a complimentary concert given by Manager Walter T. Murphy. The big crowd in its anxiety to get into the theater tore one of the doors from its hinges. The glass was broken and ground under the feet of the crowd and its framework shattered. The concert was given by the combined orchestras of the New Crown theater and the Lyceum theater, both of which are controlled by the Walter T. Murphy Amusement Co. The Crown theater will be the home of Famous Players films in New London. One of the features of the opening was the rendition of a march written by Leader G. Herbert Rich of the Lyceum theater orchestra and dedicated to the Crown theater. The management of the Crown theater feels that an incident of the opening is a good omen. A woman on leaving the theater found she had dropped her pocketbook containing $65. Going back to the theater she discovered the purse under the seat she occupied. The Crown is one of the handsomest picture houses in New England.

The foundation is finished for the moving picture theater which P. S. McMahon, the New Britain theatrical magnate, will have built in that town in Main street. Mr. McMahon will buy the material for the theater himself and let the contract to Doyle & Murphy, Inc., of Willimantic for the superstructure. E. W. Maynard of Boston is the architect. The building will be 29 x 138 feet, two stories high, of brick and fireproof construction with gravel roof. Mr. McMahon also conducts the Keeney theater in New Britain, the Empire theater in Hartford and finds time also to manage the Bronson house, the leading hotel of New Britain.

Gus Meyers, formerly one of the proprietors of the After Hour open air theater here, has taken charge of the orchestra in the Park theater which plays burlesque and other attractions.

Thomas Patterson, formerly manager of the Empire theater, is now agent for electric signs and has placed two mammoth advertising novelties in the center of the city here.

For the first time in Bridgeport Manager Matt Saunders of the Poli theater showed Paramount Plan pictures at the big Poli house in Main street on Labor Day. The film shown was H. B. Warner in "The Lost Paradise." It is a curious coincidence that the first production of "The Lost Paradise" in original dramatic form was made here on Labor Day about fifteen years ago by the late George B. Bunnell then the manager of the Park City theater, the present Plaza theater.

BOOTH.

INDIANA.

MANAGER E. B. HELMICK is pleased at the capacity crowds which have turned out for the opening week at the Sipe theater.

In spite of threats to close them, the motion picture managers of Wabash kept open all day Labor Day and played to good crowds, a fact which proved the contention of the exhibitors that the people want the houses open.

A. F. Brentlinger and J. F. English have opened the Orpheum theater, Ft. Wayne, as a strictly five-cent house. Two pianos and two pipe organs have been installed. Messrs. Brentlinger & English conduct the Orpheum at Terre Haute.

The Zenith Motion Picture Company is to make a moving picture drama of Marion life and industries. A voting contest is on to name the leading lady and gentleman, who are to be local people.

The Princess theater, Vincennes, and the Vincennes Commercial are getting publicity and circulation respectively from a "Mysterious Princess" who appears on the streets and if recognized by any one carrying a Commercial (last edition) will pay them $100. The would-be prize winner on making his approach must say, "Oh you are the Mysterious Princess of the Princess Theater, the Best Picture Show in the City."

James Rushworth, of the Lyric theater, Aurora, has sold his half interest in the house to the Aurora Military Band. William Kyle, Mr. Southworth's partner, still retains his interest and will remain as manager of the house.

The New Fairy, a $10,000 house, has just been opened in Knox by Proprietor A. F. Metzger. Occasional dramatic offerings will break the routine of movie shows. The house seats 360 persons. Prices will vary from 10 to 50 cents.

Frederick Sanders, proprietor of the Sanders theater, Indianapolis, lost in a replevin suit filed by Harley Irons to get possession of a pony, harness and cart, which the boy claimed to have won in a popularity contest conducted by the theater.

The Maxwell Auto Company, Newcastle, is making good use of a picture of the plant, showing the auto in its progress from molten metal to finished product. The film is being sent to the company's agents for local exhibition.

To STAGE MANAGERS AND PRODUCERS OF UNQUESTIONABLE REPUTATION

An important Renting Company, with Agencies in all the principal cities of America and with Agencies and Connections all over the world, is disposed to consider the printing and publishing of films for any Manufacturer or Producer of unquestionable standing. Only plays of highest moral and artistic value of first-class execution and photography considered.

Finest Theatre in America at the Disposition of Known Stage Managers

Address M. W. B., care of Moving Picture World, 17 Madison Ave., N. Y. City

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE Herbert National Film Company, which is now being incorporated under the laws of the State of Virginia, has secured rooms in the Woodward Building, at Fifteenth and H streets, Northwest, and will handle the feature films of Sawyer, Inc. A regular daily service of feature films was commenced by the new organization, which will handle a territory to include the District of Columbia, Virginia, West Virginia and North Carolina, on September 14. The incorporation papers calls for a capital stock of $25,000 and names M. H. Grinder, as president; J. J. Herfert, secretary and treasurer, and L. G. Grossman, vice-president and general manager. The corporation will be a close one and no stock will be offered for sale. As they have just commenced business here they have not as yet secured their sales force, but offices will shortly be opened in Richmond, Va., Charleston, W. Va., and Greensboro, N. C., that the states in question may be handled more expeditiously. Another feature of the activity of the new concern will be the carrying of a complete line of moving picture machine parts. This section of the business will be handled in Room 229 of the building, while Room No. 227 will be utilized as the office of the company and the adjoining room will be for the handling of the films and paper. Each of these rooms is to be fitted out in first class shape. The office and the film room contain desks and comfortable arm chairs. The next move of the concern will be the fitting out of an exhibition room where films will be exhibited to the moving picture men before they are rented. This exhibition room will be located somewhere in the vicinity of Ninth street.

Sydney B. Lust, with Warner's Features, Inc., is traveling through Virginia and North Carolina boosting the new daily service which Warner's are now producing. David Warner, of the Baltimore branch spent the week-end in New York City.

F. O. Webber, who operates a number of houses in Roanoke, Va., was a visitor here last week. While in Washington he arranged for service for the new house which he has just taken over in Salem, Va.—the Grand.

Mrs. Thorpe, who operates the Rex and the Hippodrome in Richmond, Va., visited several of the exchanges and booked some features for her theaters.

C. O. Moss has gone to Charlotte, N. C., where he will open the Warner office within a very few days. Through this office Mr. Moss hopes to supply the exhibitors of his territory direct, thus diminishing the possibilites of delay through the shipment of films from the Washington office. He will be supplied with sufficient films to enable him to keep up the service of the houses and will route and book them himself independent of the head office here.

The realization of the value of high grade features seems to have come very forcibly to the exhibitors of Washington for announcement is being made that the moving picture fans of the national capital will have an opportunity of seeing many famous productions during the coming season. With the Strand theater "featuring" features, other houses are going in for big things and features will be on the boom from now on. The Savoy, a ten-cent house, is soon to show "The Christian" and on this occasion the price will be increased to twenty-five cents and the sale will be of reserved seats. While it cannot be said that the days of the five-cent show are over, or even on the wane, yet the signs are that higher prices will prevail. Washington is moving picture mad. The people have been helped along in their education by the exhibitors themselves and by the daily press. The papers say they are even tiring of serials, but this is denied by the exhibitors, who point to crowded houses when the "Trey o' Hearts," "The Million Dollar Mystery," "Our Mutual Girl," and others of this type are shown. The serials have been the money-makers during the past season, but if they are to be kept money-makers, there must be something in each series that will keep up the interest of the public in succeeding issues.

The Casino theater, Seventh and F streets, Northwest, has been opened for the season. This house is under the management of Alan Bachrach, one of the live wire young men of the city.

The Niagara theater, on Seventh street, Northwest, operated by A. C. Joy, is temporarily closed.

"What! Where! When!" slides last week appeared in nearly every theater in the city and have started the moving picture fans guessing as to what these words mean. However, the World correspondent was let in on the secret which means that the boys are brushing up their open face suits (or arranging for the hiring of the same) for the Exhibitors' League of the District of Columbia are going to give a bit of a shindig in Convention Hall on All Hallow'een night. Some of the boys down New York way and the girls that act in the movies have accepted an invite to be present. An orchestra of forty or fifty pieces in two sections will play continuously throughout the evening. This is the much talked of ball, and the members of the league are putting forth their best efforts to make it a success. The hall is one of the largest in the United States and will probably accommodate seven or eight thousand persons. In advertising the affair slides are to be used with catchy phrases to awaken interest in the event among the people who patronize the houses. In addition to this, one of the local papers has promised the league a large amount of advertising and, in fact, will aid in the giving of this ball. Many of the patrons of the different houses have often expressed a desire of seeing real live moving picture actors and actresses and this will be their opportunity.

Long before the box office at the Garden theater was opened on Sunday, September 12, there was a large crowd in front of the entrance waiting for admission and it required the service of a policeman to keep them in line. This condition prevaled until the time of the last show. The cause of this was attributed in part to showing "Across he Border," Warner's Features, Inc., which met with approval on all sides, and outbreaks of applause during exciting parts were many. MEMBERS of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce were given a novel treat at a recent noonday luncheon and meeting when a five-reel film telling the story of the production and distribution of iron was thrown upon the auditorium screen. The film is owned by the American Steel and Wire Company, and depicts the progress of iron and its products from the mines through the various processes until it is turned into the commodities of everyday use. A lecture and descriptive talk was made by Dr. H. L. Horton.

Mayor Baker's dictum that lurid posters in front of Cleveland moving picture houses must go, and that it is up to the police to determine which poster is lurid and which is not will be fought through the courts by Sam Bullock, proprietor of the Boulevard theater, Lorain avenue and West 98th street. The mayor recently made an inspection of a number of picture houses and requested some to tone down the character of the posters they use to attract patrons. He then told the police to forage around and arrest proprietors who failed to heed his commands. Bullock was the first proprietor arrested. He was charged with violating the law which prohibits any theater from placing on exhibition any film which has not been passed by the Ohio board of censors. There is no law covering the display of lurid posters, so Bullock was taken on the other charge. Bullock characterized the action of the police as "bulldozing tactics," and engaged attorneys Ben Sawyer and Ernest Schwartz to look after his interests. He will fight his case in police court, and if worsted will appeal.

Patrons of the Majestic theater, Columbus, have been informed that the system of "air washing" which has been used during the summer to make the theater comfortable in the hot weather will be continued through the winter in order to keep the atmosphere fresh. The air will be heated immediately after passing through the washers and the big fan. The Majestic is now conducting a voting contest to ascertain if the patrons like the one reel Mary Pickford films being shown there.

The management of the Star theater, Lima, has put on all Universal program daily and has been enjoying increased patronage.

Dayton film fans have been flocking to the Columbia theater where Dickens' "Old Curiosity Shop" in five parts was featured.

Film lovers in Chillicothe who are students or graduates of Ohio State University were given a treat recently by the Queen theater which presented a two-reel feature showing the celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the university. The films were produced under the direction of H. H. Bennett of Chillicothe, and were shown to crowded houses.

The combination of the Lake County Fair and select bill drew big crowds to the Utopia theater, Painesville, during fair week.

Manager James V. Howell, of the Colonial theater, Columbus, is confined in a hospital in Cincinnati, where he underwent an operation recently. During his absence the Colonial is in charge of Thomas Tharp, the treasurer.

That the securing of the Schubert productions as a weekly feature at the Alhambra theater, Sandusky, was appreciated by film fans in Sandusky, was shown by the packed houses which greeted each performance of the series. Manager William Martin was much pleased by the success of his venture.

Feiber & Shea, proprietors of the Park theater, Youngstown, attracted much favorable comment by their presentation of the George Kleine pictures of the European war.

Officers and employes of the Guardian Savings & Trust Co., Cleveland, appeared as "movie" actors at Willoughbeach Park, where the fifth annual outing was observed. Motion pictures were made of the games and sport events and will be shown to the bankers at a private exhibition later.

Architects at Newark have plans for a two-story brick theater building for Dan Hoffman, to be built at a cost of $15,000 on North Union street. RARIDAN.

NORTHWESTERN NEW YORK.

HAROLD EDEL, manager of the Strand moving picture theater, Buffalo, attended the recent opening of the new Regent moving picture theater, East Genessee street and Irving avenue, Syracuse, N. Y. Mr. Edel promoted the company which built the Regent. The location is near the Syracuse University. M. H. Schwartz of Buffalo is manager of the Regent and Moe Strauss, assistant manager and treasurer. The Regent cost $100,000 and is elaborately furnished. There are rich carpets of blue velvet, which blend with the old ivory decorations of the walls and their panels of blue silk tapestry. The orchestra seats run down to the stage at a gentle angle and are roomy. There are commodious mezzanine boxes reached by two stairways. The ceiling of the auditorium is beautifully paneled and beamed. The private boxes and proscenium arch are artistically decorated. There is an indirect lighting system. The stage is set with a bright, green garden and an illuminated fountain. During the musical numbers the screen is covered with blue velvet curtains. The theater has a $10,000 pipe organ and a well-balanced orchestra. There is a woman's reception room and men's smoking room. The Regent is constructed of steel, concrete and brick and is absolutely fireproof. The seating capacity is about 1,500. Among the patrons are the students of the Syracuse Universiy. Mr. Edel received many congratulations on his new enterprise. "The Littlest Rebel" was the opening attraction. The seats are ten cents and the boxes twenty-five cents.

The Chenango Theater Corporation is building a theater in Norwich, N. Y., and has given Adam Tennis of Utica a ten-year lease on the building. He will open the house at an early date.

Moving pictures of the Geneva, N. Y., firemen were recently taken as they were working on the fire at the New York Central Iron works in that city.

Moving pictures of the Lehigh Valley Railroad's new car transfer station, costing $250,000, at Manhcester, N. Y., were recently shown at the Colonial theater, Elmira, N. Y.

The Majestic, Mozart, Lyceum and Colonial theaters of Elmira, N. Y., have agreed to engage none but union stage hands. The stage and balcony at the Majestic have been extended and new boxes built.

Corporation Counsel Marcy of Binghamton, N. Y., will appeal from the recent decision of Justice McCann in Sunday moving picture case in that city.

The new Star moving picture theater was opened recently in Elmira, N. Y. The building is of fireproof construction. L. M. Andsley and W. F. Doane are the proprietors.

Moving pictures, which will be shown in the New York State building at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, were recently taken in Watertown, New York.

The new Ellen Terry theater at Ferry and Grant streets, Buffalo, will be completed at an early date. BILLY BISON.

NEW THEATERS.

Morton, Minn.—The Unique Theater Co. of Morton has rented the Village hall at Morgan for the purpose of giving moving picture shows the coming winter.

Portland, Ore.—Portland now boasts another moving picture theater in the Sunset, located at Broadway and Washington streets, which has been thrown open to the public. The owners, J. J. and J. A. Jennings, held an informal opening for their friends, and a special run of the pictures shown there were greatly enjoyed.

Sioux Rapids, Ia.—A deal has been made whereby Wm. Frazer of Spencer becomes the owner of the J. A. Meadows moving picture business and fixtures. Mr. Meadows retains the building and we understand that he will manage the business for Mr. Frazer, at least for a time.

Sioux City, Ia.—One of the new modern structures to go up on lower Fourth street will be a motion picture house, costing about $8,000. It will be erected on the southwest corner of Fourth and Jennings streets by Miller and Schulkin. The old buildings on the site have been razed.

Elroy, Wis.—The Majestic theater, the new motion picture house in the A. W. Field block at Main and Franklyn streets, has opened. Three shows were run on the opening night and between 700 and 800 admissions were accommodated.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

KALEM.

THE VIPER (Special—Two Parts—Sept 28).—Kent, a member of the firm of Putnam & Kent, and Crane, one of the clerks, are rivals for the hand of Mary, daughter of Isidore Putnam. Although it is against her father's wish, Mary weds Crane.

Prosperity goes to Crane's head. Mary soon learns that her husband is a drunkard and good-for-nothing. The man loses heavily while gambling on a house boat owned by Baxter, a card sharp. Unable to pay, Crane is threatened with exposure unless the money is forthcoming within twenty-four hours.

Crane returns home in time to see his father-in-law place a large sum of money in the library safe. Later in the evening, Mary and her father visit a friend. Putnam has occasion to call his butler on the 'phone shortly afterward. In answering the 'phone, the man discovers Crane in the act of rifling the safe. At the other end of the wire Putnam hears a shot, and Crane's horrified exclamation, "My God! I have killed him!"

Hastening home, Mary and her father find the butler slain. Meanwhile, Crane has escaped from the house and makes for the houseboat, where he settles his debt. Later, the houseboat is set afire as the result of a fight. The following morning Putnam and his daughter read that Crane had met his death in the river.

Crane, however, is saved from drowning by smugglers. They take him to their lair. Will, the half-witted brother of the leader of the band, takes a violent dislike to Crane. As time passes, Mary, believing her husband dead, consents to marry Kent.

Crane learns that a reward is offered for the arrest of the smugglers. His treachery is discovered, and the band pursues him. In desperation, Crane takes refuge on a yacht in the river—and confronts Kent and Mary, who are on their honeymoon. As the scoundrel leers at the two, the face of Will, the half-witted boy, appears at the port hole. A shot rings out—the Viper meets his just deserts.

GROUCH, THE ENGINEER (Sept. 29).—Grouch's name fits the engineer of the freight to a tee. The man is the best-hated employee of the F. G. & L. An overheated bearing causes Grouch to halt his engine in front of Mrs. Manson's home. The widow's son, Bobby, runs out to watch the proceedings. Grouch injures his hand and Bobby touches the man's heart, when he offers his tiny handkerchief as a bandage.

A friendship springs up between the two. Grouch invariably waves a greeting to the boy when his train passes the Manson cottage. Shortly afterwards Grouch is promoted to a passenger run. With promotion comes news which informs him that Bobby is seriously ill and calls for him continually. Thought of the lad causes Grouch to halt his train in front of Bobby's home. Deaf to the amazed protests of the train crew and passengers Grouch hastens to the boy's bedside. His presence sooths the lad and saves his life.

It costs Grouch his run, however, until the master mechanic, whose son is of Bobby's age, hears of the incident. And Grouch, who receives a message which he believes contains word of his dismissal, learns instead that he has been reinstated.

THE EX-CONVICT (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 30).—To meet the demands of his selfish wife, Pelton commits a forgery for which he is later sent to jail. Marjorie thereupon secures a divorce. Poverty lays its heavy hand upon the woman. Several years later, Pelton is discharged. He secures a position in a country village where Marjorie is employed as dressmaker. He makes the astonishing discovery that Howe, his employer, is about to marry Marjorie.

Pelton meets Lucy, a country girl who had been betrothed to Howe. On the day of the wedding the ex-convict, entering the house with Lucy, interrupts the ceremony. His story fills Howe with remorse and the man weds the girl. At the sight of Pelton, Marjorie's old love for him reawakens and happiness comes to the ex-convict once more.

FOOD FOR THE DOGS OF WAR (Sept. 30).—That the warring European nations may continue without interruption the frightful struggle in which twenty millions of picked men are engaged, one of the world's largest arms and ammunition factories keeps its employees working overtime in an effort to supply the necessary "food for the dogs of war."

The loading of shells, the casting of projectiles and the testing of the arms and ammunition are just a few of the many interesting features shown in this timely subject.

BIOGRAPH.

THE PEDDLER'S TAG (Sept. 17).—The wayward son of a landed gentleman persecutes the gamekeeper's wife with his attentions, and, in the husband's absence, bribes the village peddler to carry him into the cottage in a bag. Cutting his way out at dead of night, he alarms the wife, who seizes a gun and shoots, then flees in panic. The gamekeeper, suspicious, hastens home in time to be suspected by those who find the body, is arrested and brought to trial on the evidence of the butler, who has heard him threaten the young master. At a dramatic moment the signed statement of his wife and the arrest of the peddler bring about his release.

HIS CHANGE OF HEART (Sept. 18).—A young surgeon, on sick call at the railroad yards, sees a little girl killed by a train. While he is describing the fatality to his sweetheart, her father, the president of the road, is in the next room, ordering the claim agents to make no settlement with the child's parents. The young man's denunciations are overheard by the girl's father and he is ordered out of the house. Next day, while the girl is motoring to town to meet him, her automobile is struck by a train and she is carried to the hospital, where her lover's skill saves her life. Her father, called back from a trip on his private car, rushes to the hospital and, at sight of his daughter, realizes his injustice to the dead child's parents and to the young surgeon.

THE FIRE CHIEF'S BRIDE (Sept. 19).—Alfred adores the fire chief's daughter, but the chief objects. Alfred hides in the closet and when the chief discovers him he comes out disguised as a woman and tells the chief "she" has long loved him. The chief falls for the "beautiful woman" and 'phones for the minister. A fire breaks out and the chief leaves for the fire. The minister arrives and the young folks induce him to marry them. After many ludicrous happenings the chief gets the surprise of his life.

MURPHY AND THE MERMAIDS (Sept. 19).—Murphy's wife sets him to chopping wood wh..e she goes swimming with their daughter. A Hebrew peddler, who happens along, is forced by Murphy to chop wood, Murphy nailing a revolver to the barn so that it looks as if he has the peddler covered. Murphy goes fishing, falls asleep and dreams of mermaids. His wife and daughter find him and chase him home, where all three are met by the peddler, who has discovered the trick and armed himself with the revolver.

THE BACKSLIDER (Sept. 14).—A young widow, evicted with her baby, wanders exhausted to the doorstep of the village miser, a backslider from the church. The baby's cry touches the old man's heart, and he gives the pair shelter. While he is out buying milk two jailbirds, who have dropped off an incoming train, break into the house and, not finding the old man's hoard, torture the baby's mother to make her tell where she has hidden the money. The old man returns and is pleading with the robbers, when the sheriff and posse of villagers arrive, summoned by an old maid who has been trying to induce the backslider to return to the church. By his adoption of the baby the old man shows that, even though he stays away from church, he is a true Christian.

MERELY MOTHER (Two Parts—Sept. 15).—Mother love should inspire reverence, but sometimes a mother's devotion encourages her child to be selfish. The death of her good-for-nothing husband throws a great responsibility on Beth's mother. In order that her daughter may have every advantage, including education at a fashionable boarding school, the mother toils long hours in a sweatshop. When Beth makes a rich marriage and is ashamed of her mother, the greatest sacrifice of mother love is made. But through the innocence of her own baby girl, the selfish woman's eyes are opened, when the mother, who never forgets her daughter's birthday, risks discovery to be near her darling on an anniversary that is fraught with the most intense memories for both of them. After years of self-sacrifice, her cup of happiness is filled to overflowing.

ESSANAY.

"SWEEDIE'S" CLEAN-UP (Sept. 28).—"Sweedie's" father is the owner of a grocery store, and Sweedie takes care of the trade while father plays checkers all day. She is in love with a member of the police department, and at every possible opportunity slips out and holds hands with him. One day while her father is very much interested in a checker game, two burglars come in and carry away every article in the store, including the chairs on which the players are sitting. "Sweedie" makes all the noise possible, but fails to arouse the checker fiends. The burglars bind her and place her in the wagon with the stolen goods, where she is found by the police. They all then give chase to the thieves and capture them.

WHITE LIES (Sept. 29).—Greg Hamilton, a young artist, decides to go east and try his fortune. He finds his work unappreciated, and is unable to earn a living. One day while strolling in the park with his wife, Helen, he saves a little girl's life by stopping her runaway horse, but breaks his finger in doing so. He is then unable to paint, and is forced to take a position in a factory, but tells his wife that he is writing stories for a magazine. A few days later, Helen tells him she has accepted a position as governess. Things go on nicely, but one day they discover they are both employed in the same factory but in different departments. They have each been telling "white lies" to save the other's feelings.

THE FABLE OF THE ADULT GIRL WHO GOT BUSY (Sept. 30).—Clara was no longer a Spring Chicken, and when she passed the Thirty Mark, she began to worry for fear that she could never Rope In a Bread Earner, so she got busy. There was one chap in particular who looked awfully good to her, but the younger girls were hot on his trail, and did their utmost to keep Clara out of his way. Finally Clara got rid of her competitors in the Man Hunt when they all went to a summer resort. She was surrounded by Suitors, and Mr. Gibbs was very much in evidence. The afternoons that followed were a repetition of the first day, while the girls up at the lake were making a fuss over some little Freshman. When they returned they found Clara wearing a $400 Rock, presented to her by Friend Gibbs.

Moral: Woman is never dangerous until she attacks single handed.

SLIPPERY SLIM GETS CURED (Oct. 1).—Slippery Slim has a terrible habit of coming home intoxicated late at night. One night he has "soaked up" an unusual amount and does not arrive home until 4 a. m. He takes off his boots and does his best to get in quietly, but Sophie is waiting for him, and proceeds to try and sober him. Next morning she reads that spirits of ammonia will cure drunkenness. She tries it on poor Slim, and it makes him deathly sick. Sophie then gets alarmed and rushes for a doctor. When they arrive, they find Slim doing his utmost to get a drink of water, and he does not succeed until he jumps into the river. He is then relieved and swears never to touch another drop of liquor.

BRONCHO BILLY TRAPPED (Oct. 3).—Broncho and his wife arrive in a new country and settle. They are treated with all kindness by a man who later turns out to be a moonshiner, and Broncho, not having any special occupation, is induced to help the outlaw in his work. One day while Broncho is at work, the moonshiner goes to his helper's home and forces his affections upon his wife. Fearing that she will tell her husband, the moonshiner goes to the government officials and tells where Broncho is at work. Broncho is arrested, but asks to say goodby to his wife. When they enter his home they find the outlaw again insulting his wife. Broncho is released, while the real law offender is arrested.

GOLF CHAMPION "CHICK" EVANS LINKS WITH SWEEDIE (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 2).—"Chick" Evans, western amateur golf champion, is seen playing golf with his sister. Sweedie is the cook for a family of "get-rich-quicks" and treated very roughly until she receives a letter telling her that her uncle has left her an immense fortune. She is then handled with white gloves. To be a society lady she must wear fine clothes and play golf, so they dress her up and take her out to the golf club. Here she meets "Chick" Evans, and he proceeds to try and teach her to play golf. He has very little success as Sweedie breaks all the clubs and insists on swinging on the ball like she was knocking a "home run." She finally gives the ball a terrible wallop and in following it causes a great disturbance among the other players. A riot call is sent in to the police station, and in the meantime Sweedie has ordered her fortune delivered at the golf club. The fortune arrives and much is her disgust when she finds it only to be cigar coupons. The police arrive and a generous rough-house takes place.

EDISON

LOVE BY THE POUND (Tenth of "Wood B. Wedd's" Series—Sept. 28).—John Stout was a man of strong family ties, and when he made a lucky strike in the Western mining country, his first thought was of his family back in the east. After some thought, he decided on a present which seemed to him in the best taste imaginable, so he telegraphed to his niece, Miranda, and informed her that he would give her her weight in gold the day she married.

Now, Stout had not seen his niece in many years, or it is doubtful if he would have made so rash an offer quite so lightly. For Miranda was no ethereal, elf-like little creature. To put it as delicately as possible, Miranda had a slight tendency towards avoirdupois; if one wished to put it roughly, he might mention hippopotami as the nearest comparison to Miranda from the material point of view.

When Darby Jenks learned of Miranda's prospective windfall, he hastened to Wood B. Wedd with the news. Darby's attitude was not entirely disinterested. Wood B. owed him money.

The estimable Mr. Wedd was somewhat taken aback at his first sight of Miranda, but his ideas changed rapidly when he learned that she was worth her weight in gold. When he proposed to Miranda, she readily accepted him, but shortly afterwards a state of affairs was brought about which threatened to make a breach in the pleasant course of their affections. John Stout, in a further burst of enthusiasm, offered to give his niece her husband's weight in gold as well!

Miranda made it quite plain to Wood B. that although she loved him with a passion that made the feelings of Issult for Tristram seem cold by comparison, she could not think of marrying him unless he weighed at least two hundred pounds.

Wood B. at once consulted the fattest man in town, the storekeeper, and was advised to drink plenty of milk. He did! He drank it by the pint and by the quart, and finally, in a desperate spirit of surprise, by the gallon. And it was all quite useless, for after Wood B. had nearly killed himself, Miranda married the storekeeper.

THE MYSTERY OF THE GLASS TUBES (Eleventh mystery in the "Chronicles of Cleek"—Sept. 29).—England was being flooded with illicitly imported cocaine, and Scotland Yard was almost at its wits' ends. When Cleek discovered that the stuff was hidden in small glass tubes which were concealed in the center of eggs, it did something towards clearing up the mystery, but the question of the exact agent responsible for the smuggling was still undetermined.

Cleek, after some thought on the matter, decided that a certain gang of Parisian Apaches operating in London knew more about the matter than anybody else. Under the pretence of wishing him to pose as a model, Dollops, Cleek's assistant, lured one of the Apaches to Cleek's room, where they trussed him up and robbed him of his clothes. With the almost superhuman skill which had given him his reputation as "The Man of Many Faces," Cleek exactly counterfeited the appearance of the Apache and set out for the gang's den. Here, thanks to his disguise, he was accepted on equal terms, and was lucky enough to overhear a wireless message informing the gang that the ship with cocaine aboard would be ready to unload its cargo that evening.

By a singular chance, Miss Lorne, the girl Cleek loved, happened to be the only passenger on the ship. When she saw a villainous Apache climbing over the rail, she was terribly alarmed until Cleek spoke to her. Acting on his directions she went ashore. Unfortunately, during Cleek's absence, the Apache band had rescued their bound comrade, and had followed hot on Cleek's heels. Surprising him aboard the ship, they bound him and then seuttled the vessel.

If it had not been for Miss Lorne, Cleek must have died. But that brave girl, realizing the extent of her lover's risk, had bent every effort to getting the police to the ship in time, and as a result Cleek was saved from a position of terrific danger in the very nick of time.

BUSTER BROWN GETS THE WORST OF IT (Sept. 30).—When Buster Brown and Mary Jane, his sister, learned that Mrs. Benton was going to bring her baby over to their house, they immediately decided that the imminent visit held forth some promise of excitement. In accordance with their decision, immediately after the arrival of the baby and Mrs. Benton, Buster and Mary Jane centered their attention on the carriage which had served to bring the Benton heir Brownwards.

Buster discovered a suit of clothes in his father's closet, and instantly decided that it was exactly what he needed, so he stuffed it carefully with newspapers, and brought it down to the baby carriage. When the stuffed clothes were placed in her carriage, they bore an uncanny resemblance to some tired and weary soul, who, overcome by fate or the insidious ravages of alcohol, had sought the baby carriage as a refuge from the unhappiness of an adverse and misunderstood world. Curiously enough, Buster's father watched the entire proceedings from the shelter of a doorway. When Buster and Mary Jane crept away chuckling, to spring the joke on their long-suffering family, Mr. Brown removed the dummy and took its place in the baby carriage.

Thus the stage was set for events of rare and surpassing moment. A kindly veil must be drawn over the terrible things which happened when Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Benton rushed out to join battle with the reported usurper of the baby's place. Let us only hint that, in addition to the human contestants, a large and uncannily wise dog, named Tige, and one active and diabolic goat played no small part.

The only safe conclusion which can be drawn is that the only person who really enjoyed the proceedings was the baby.

IN A PROHIBITION TOWN (Sept. 30).—Zeke, the storekeeper's assistant, was very much in love with his employer's daughter. The storekeeper was not pleased to any alarming extent by the news. In fact he was aroused to such an extent that he kicked Zeke out of the store. Zeke probably would not have minded the parental wrath as much as he did if further complications had not ensued. When a neat and polished drummer arrived in town from the city, Lizzie, the object of Zeke's affections, promptly displayed her perfidious feminine temperament by deserting her faithful admirer and languishing after the drummer.

When Jake, the delivery boy, angered by the drummer's city mannerisms, painted the potent word, "Whiskey," on the drummer's sample case, matters came to a crisis for Zeke, spotting the word, decided that vengeance had come into his hand. Seizing it, he rushed in the general direction of the town constable with the laudable intention of giving his rival into the clutches of justice. Delaying Daley, a gentleman of more leisure than attainment, had remarked the sample case, and had approached it for his own uses. When he saw Zeke seize it, however, he decided that he would certainly reap a satisfying reward if he caught this shameless thief. Accordingly he gave chase to Zeke.

The storekeeper, his daughter, Jake, and the drummer, aroused by the excitement, followed. When the tramp finally caught Zeke, a combat of Homeric proportions commenced. Zeke and Daley, unable to make each other comprehend the probity of their purposes, "wrastled" and bit and tore like a couple of wild cats. While they were thus pleasantly engaged the storekeeper-drummer contingent arrived, and covered the hill below the contestants with the contents of the suitcase flypaper. What happened when Zeke and the tramp started to roll down the hill is too terrible to relate.

THE POISONED BIT (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 2).—Tom was a great animal lover. This fact stood him in good stead among the gypsies in whose camp he was held. One evening he refused to help them steal chickens, and as the chief was giving him a sound beating, "Prince," a great lovable collie, sprung to Tom's defense. Fearing to return to the camp, Tom followed the dog's lead and soon found himself at the steps of a beautiful home, where he sank down on the steps and falls asleep.

He was discovered the next morning by Colonel and Miss Standish. On learning the boy's story, Colonel Standish employs him in his racing stables. Soon he developed into a proficient jockey. The mutual attraction between Tom and Edith was noticeable since their first meeting, and this made it all the harder for all concerned when Tom was disgraced through losing the race on "King Gallop." Colonel Standish had been plunging very heavily and was depending upon "King Gallop's" winning to save his fortune. When the race was lost, he accused Tom of doing it purposely and preferred charges, which ended in Tom's being ruled off the American turf. The real culprit was Maloney. At first, he tried to get Tom to "pull" the race, but the suggestion was indignantly repulsed by Tom. Failing in this, Maloney played his final card and poisoned "King Gallop's" bit, thus causing him to lose.

Tom left for England, only to find that his unsavory reputation had preceded him, the result being that all English tracks were closed to him. He wandered over to the Continent, and after a chance meeting with Edith, drifted South and quickly became an easy victim for Monte Carlo. Destitute and alone, he hardly knew what to do, until he suddenly caught sight of an ad saying that Lord Blyncourt was in need of an experienced boy to handle yearlings. Tom applied for the position, and was taken on. A short while after, Colonel Standish and his daughters called on Lord Blyncourt, and the Colonel had no sooner recognized Tom than he felt it his duty toward Lord Blyncourt to warn him against Tom. In the meantime, Wilkes had located the Gypsy Queen and secured from her a locket which identified Tom as the grandson of Lord Blyncourt, for whom a worldwide search had been made. Brought before his employer by the Colonel's accusation, Tom was able to refute the charge by producing proof of Maloney's guilt, and both families were gladdened by the announcement that Edith had decided to remain in England as the new mistress of Ivy House, which was to constitute Tom's ultimate heritage.

A TRANSPLANTED PRAIRIE FLOWER (Oct. 3).—Throughout the sparsely settled districts of the rolling West, the arrival of the mail constitutes an event, so when Jim rode up to the house and handed Mary a letter bearing the New York postmark, she was in a flutter of excitement to learn its contents. It turned out to be a message from her aunt urging her to come East in order to fit herself for the social position which she was destined to occupy, and adding that the probation of her father's will had disclosed a more considerable fortune than anyone had expected.

Jim was, of course, sorry to see her leave, but he concealed his real feelings and urged her to carry out the plan. In due time, Mary reached the great city of New York. New experiences crowded in on every side, not the least of which was her meeting with Robert Goodall, the "Social Lion" of the moment. Mary's stories of the glowing West captivated the man but, unfortunately, they also aroused the jealousy of Alice, who had set her cap for the dashing Mr. Goodall. Among Mrs. Wilson's proudest possessions was a valuable pearl necklace. She took pride in showing it to her guests, but on Goodall's inquiry whether she intended to wear it to the masked ball to which they were all invited, she announced that they were too valuable to risk.

Mary was to attend the ball in her old cow girl costume, but thoughts of Jim caused her to change her plans at the last moment and remain at home. While sitting in her room she was startled by a sudden noise. Creeping down the stairs, she was horrified on seeing a burglar at work on her aunt's safe. The burglar discovered her at the same moment, and each of their pistols flashed in the darkness. When the light was flashed on, Mary was astonished at finding Goodall standing before her, nursing a broken wrist. Attracted by the shots, the servants rushed in, followed by Mrs. Wilson, Alice and the police, and the "Social Lion" stood unmasked. Sickened by the sordidness of the whole matter, Mary decided to return to Jim and her beloved West. Her advent, clothed in all her Eastern finery, gave Jim the surprise of his life and filled his heart with joy over the return of his Prairie Flower.

THE GOING OF THE WHITE SWAN (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 28).—In the wild Canadian Northwest lives pretty Lucette, daughter of an honest trapper and a pious mother. John Bagot, a hot-blooded young French-Canadian trapper, is accustomed to no other life than the undisciplined existence of the wild things of the forest. John comes a-courting, and Lucette's parents being simple people, believe that their daughter's happiness can be assured by her marriage to the young trapper. Old Pere Corraine, the beloved missionary, is called in to perform the ceremony. Lucette then leaves the home of her parents and goes to live with her husband in his cabin far out in the wilds.

Lucette has been brought up with a sincere belief in religion, and in her new home she enshrines an image of the Virgin and a small Cross. Her young husband has no religious feeling whatever and at irregular intervals he obtains the fiery whisky which the illicit peddlers sell to the trappers, and relaxes into a condition of drunken stupor, which sometimes lasts for days. Later a little baby comes to them, and grows into a sturdy boy, whom they name Dominique.

One day while John is out looking after his traps, Dominique sallies boldly forth to shoot some wolves which have been howling about the cabin and annoying his mother. John returns to the cabin and in his reckless and careless way indulges from the bottle and smokes his pipe, after which he places them, disregarding his wife's wishes, on the shrine beside the Cross and the image of the Virgin. Lucette expostulates, and tells him it is not a fitting place for these articles, but John laughs and jeers at her religious scruples until in a frenzy of agonized feeling, because of the outrage against her religious views, she rushes from the cabin with a vague intention of making her way back to the home of her parents.

Dominique has a misadventure with the wolves. They surround him and almost kill him, but he finally escapes and drags himself painfully back to the cabin. His father carries him into the house and then rushes out to find Lucette. But she is not to be found. Then follow days and nights of agonized suspense for the father. The tide of life for Dominique ebbs slowly away, until one day when a gust of wind blows a flury of snow across the door, he states plaintively that he has seen the "White Swan." There is a superstition among these people that when the "White Swan" passes, it announces the forthcoming death of the person who sees it. John fears the worst and exerts his simple knowledge to save the boy.

Lucette wanders into a camp of Cree Indians, the chief of whom seizes upon her and announces that he will make her his wife. She is exhausted and nearly frozen, and her joy at the advent of good old Pere Corraine who happened to strike the camp a few hours after she did, is great. Pere Corraine craftily bargains with the chief for Lucette and against his religious scruples agrees to pay ten barrels of rum for her. This, however, is the only bargain that the chief will make. Pere Corraine then takes Lucette back to the vicinity of the cabin and leaves her outside of the door.

John Bagot, in an agony of spirit, and with a soul racked by remorse, has thrown himself before the shrine and begs for help in his extremity from the Great Father above. Dominique, who has received from his mother a religious training, notes his father's conversion with a peaceful smile and drops off to sleep. Pere Corraine takes advantage of the situation to exact from John a promise to give his soul to God if his wife is returned to him. His penitence is sincere, and Pere Corraine, after pledging him to a continuance of his new religious fervor, steps to the door and beckons Lucette to come into the cabin. While husband and wife are weeping tears of joy over their reconciliation, little Dominique wakes from his sleep and announces that he no longer sees the "White Swan," for it has flown away. Thus the going of the "White Swan" brings health and strength to the wounded little boy, while the hearts of father and mother are filled with love and rejoicing.

THE REAL THING IN COWBOYS (Sept. 29).—Elsie's idea of a real man was a dummy dressed like a cowboy, reckless and wild and woolly. Wallace Carey, a gallant city business man, rich, attractive, and well dressed, was in love with her, but she wanted a real cowboy for a husband. Elsie departed for the West to visit relatives on a ranch, but Elsie's mother favored Carey, and planned to bring them together. Carey applied at the ranch where Elsie was staying for a job, intimating that he had lost his fortune. He mixed with the cowboys, became a "good fellow," defeating them all at their sports and games, and cut a striking figure on horseback; so that Elsie finally began to believe that she had made a mistake. He rescued Elsie from a perilous situation, and proved himself to be a "man" in every way. So Elsie was won after all by an Easterner, who admited after their engagement that he had not lost his fortune, but was merely playing a part to win her love.

THE LOYALTY OF JUMBO (Sept. 30).—Paul Kruser, employed in South Africa, in creating a home in the jungle wilderness, has a faithful elephant, named "Jumbo," who helps him in the handling of the heavy timber. On the fifth birthday of their little daughter, Lillian, he presents her with a miniature log playhouse of his own construction. The little girl plays in her little log cabin, while Paul and the elephant "Jumbo" labor in the forest. Hostile Kaffirs surround the place and begin an attack. Mrs. Kruser seizes the rifles and rushes to the miniature log cabin to protect her little daughter, who is there at play. She puts up a desperate battle from the miniature fortress, and successfully stands off the Kaffirs, until "Jumbo" brings help. The faithful elephant becomes the family pet.

WHEN THE GODS FORGIVE (Sept. 28).—Jim Haskell, a trapper, woos and weds Kootina, the beautiful daughter of an Indian Chief, swearing by their Gods to make her a true and faithful husband. Kutaro, her brother, discovers white men laying out a mining town and returns to camp with the news. Haskell, unable to withstand the call of his own race, packs up and with his little Indian bride enters the new white settlement. After a year in the boom town, Haskell becomes dissipated and abuses Kootina. He becomes infatuated with Laura Childe, a dance-hall girl, but a good and beautiful woman, who knows nothing of Kootina. Pascal Lamont, a frontiersman, Haskell's rival, tells her of the latter's cruelty to the Indian girl. Haskell attempts to force Laura to fly with him, but Pascal comes to her rescue and she acclaims her love for the frontiersman, saying, "I am not taking him away from a sweet little Indian girl!" Stricken with remorse, Haskell returns home, speaks tenderly to Kootina, and then goes outside to pray. Kutaro, not hearing from his sister, arrives on a visit, finds her lying apparently dead and, seizing Haskell by the throat, chokes him into unconsciousness. Kootina awakens and, on learning her story, Kutaro forces both to ride to her father's camp, where the tribe decide Haskell shall die by fire. Kootina scatters the burning brands and it commences to rain hard. The fire is extinguished and the Indians take it for an omen of forgiveness from the Gods. Haskell leads his little Indian bride into his tent, while the old Chief smiles benignly on them. Jim proves to be a model husband and protector.

REGAN'S DAUGHTER (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 29).—Known as a saloon-keeper, a politician and a bad man, Regan becomes the sworn enemy of Phil Riordan, a young headquarters detective. The only bright spot in Regan's life is his love for his daughter, Mary, who is being brought up in the Tennessee hills in ignorance of her father's character. Phil, on leave of absence, goes to Tennessee. While out tramping he loses his way and runs into a party of moonshiners, who believe him to be a spy. Mary appears and the girl saves Phil's life. The two later fall in love, and he, not knowing she is Regan's daughter, becomes her acknowledged sweetheart. Meantime, Regan kills a man in a fight and flees to his daughter's home in Tennessee to hide. Phil is ordered to return to headquarters to apprehend Regan, calls to bid Mary good-by, finds she has gone out, meets her father and places him under arrest. Regan begs Phil not a reveal his character to his daughter. The detective agrees and, when Mary returns, is glad to find her father and sweetheart apparently the best of friends. On their trip through the mountains, Regan and Phil are attacked by moonshiners. Phil is shot, but Regan temporarily routs the mountaineers, and his better nature asserting itself, he carries the detective back to the cabin. On the way he is fatally shot, but struggles on to his destination. Mary cares for both and is overjoyed to find Phil's wound is slight. Regan, however, dies peacefully after receiving Phil's promise to keep secret her father's former life.

THE HEART OF SONNY JIM (Sept. 30).—Saddened at the sight of his mother's grief over losing a valued bracelet, Sonny Jim decides to sell "Toto," his dog, to Old Skinflint, thereby securing sufficient money to purchase Mother Dear a new bracelet. Sonny accordingly visits Old Skinflint with Toto and very soberly explains, "I don't know how much money I need, but I want a new bracelet's worth." The old fellow is very much inclined to laugh, but excuses himself and, going outside, calls up Daddy Jim. The two men think it a good joke, and Daddy says, "Give the boy the money and I will return it to-night." The transaction concluded, Sonny, with tears in his eyes bids "Toto" good-by, brings the money to Daddy and makes him promise not to tell Mother Dear, although Mother Dear learns of it later on. The whole affair is taken as somewhat of a joke by all concerned, and "Toto" is temporarily forgotten. But Sonny has not forgotten "Toto," and the separation proves too much for the little fellow. One morning he is found in bed with a high fever. No one can do anything for him, until Mother suddenly exclaims, "Why, I know what is the matter, he's heartbroken over Toto's absence." Then, despite the doctor's orders to the contrary Mother Dear asks Old Skinflint to bring back the dog. Toto's return to his little friend proves a miraculous cure, the crisis is passed and he is soon resting easily. Sonny is frightened when he sees Old Skinflint and eagerly offers the old fellow his rocking horse and teddy bear for Toto, saying, "Anyhow, they're cheaper, 'cause they don't eat nuffin'." Old Skinflint laughs heartily, while Mother Dear, with a quiet smile, makes the boy's heart glad by reassuring him Toto is home to stay and will never leave him again.

THE LOVE OF PIERRE LAROSSE (Oct. 1).—When Pierre Larosse, a trapper, calls on his sweetheart, Jeanne Coudert, to present her with the skin of a silver fox, he finds a stranger, Jacques Javillier, at the Coudert cabin. Jealousy is aroused between the two men by the girl's evident preference for the stranger. Pere Coudert, her father, is called away and announces that one of the men must accompany him. He asks Jeanne "which stays?" She indicates Jacques and the old man makes him swear that no harm shall come to her. When they are alone, Jacques declares his love for Jeanne and she is about to yield to his embrace when her mother's picture falls with a crash to the floor. The spell is broken and their lovemaking ceases. Pierre leaves Coudert at his destination and returns alone, determined upon revenge. Near the Coudert cabin he sets the forest afire, but on learning from Jeanne that Jacques has remained faithful to his trust, he experiences a change of feeling. Jeanne is placed on a horse, and with the two men holding to the saddle, a dash is made for the river and safety. The horse weakens and both men let go. The decision as to which shall go on with the girl is left to Jeanne and she once more decides in favor of Jacques. When he refuses to go, Pierre stuns him with his revolver and, throwing the unconscious man on the horse, tells the girl to ride like mad. Pierre perishes in the flames, while Jacques and Jeanne reach safety and are married.

EATS (Oct. 2).—Old acquaintance is renewed when Slim and Shorty Jim are thrown off a freight train for stealing rides. Jim suggests they "dig up some eats." They steal a pie from the windowsill of a nearby house and, while they are doing the "Alphonse and Gaston" act, the lady of the house comes up with a big bull-dog, and recovers her pie with the aid of a club. Next they try some sample packages which a man is distributing, and to their disgust, find the contents labelled "Dr. Curom's Marvelous Appetizers." They are now ravenously hungry. Sam snatches a policeman's uniform from a clothesline. Jim puts on the uniform and takes up his stand outside the window of a restaurant. Sam takes a seat near the window and proceeds to devour some big eats! Finding the tramp has no money, the proprietor calls the "cop" outside. Jim enters and "arrests" his pal. Safely outside, Jim reminds his pal he has not eaten yet, and they try the same game at another restaurant, with Sam as the policeman. Unfortunately, Sam's excellent dinner makes him sleepy, so when the waiter calls a policeman, a real one responds, and Jim is hustled off to court. Meanwhile the policeman's wife recognizes her husband's clothes on the slumbering Sam, and has him arrested. He is thrown into the same cell with Sam. He explains how the error occurred and both agree that have dined well for the day, and worry about to-morrow.

THE ROYAL WILD WEST (Special—Two Parts—Oct. 3).—Two young English stockbrokers, Willie Sartoris and George Arbuthnot, conceive the idea that if American film companies can make so much money out of Wild West pictures, it should be easy for them to do the same in London. They accordingly change the office door sign to read: "The Royal Wild West Film Company." One of the firm writes a scenario, entitled "Bad Ike, the Bally Nuisance of Red Gulch." Neither of them have ever been in America, but that doesn't worry them. With the assistance of their fellow-club members—none of whom are actors—they proceed to make the picture. All persist in wearing their monocles throughout, holding afternoon teas, and there are other discrepancies compared to the general idea of the way rough-riding cowboys look and act. They experience considerable difficulty in producing the picture in and around London, and several times come near being arrested. At last the picture is finished. Willy goes to New York and invites prominent motion picture men to attend a private view of the new "world beater." The crowd are ushered into the projection room and the show starts. It develops into a screaming farce and certainly proves "some show!" At the conclusion of the picture, the audience fights its way to the open air, gazing at Willy with looks of horror and pity. He is nonplused at their behavior and unkind remarks, but brightens up when the manager of the "Krazy Komics Film Co." arranges to purchase "Bad Ike" and the company's entire output for the next three years. Some time later, reports come in that the film, as a rip-roaring burlesque, is a big hit.

GEORGE KLEINE.

A SHOT FROM AMBUSH (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 29).—Left an orphan by the death of her mother, Margaret Weston goes to live with her father's old friend, Thompson, who has been appointed her guardian by her mother's will. Upon her arrival the guardian, a thorough man of the world, is greatly impressed with her youthful beauty, and it is not long before he begins showering her with unwelcome attentions, which, in view of their relations, she does not know how to avoid.

Thompson hires a young landscape engineer to supervise some improvements at his country place, and when the young fellow meets Margaret it is a case of love at first sight. Thompson, angered at Margaret's refusal to marry him, and suspecting her fondness for the engineer, discharges him. The two lovers continue to meet, however, their clandestine trysts being arranged by Bartlett, an old servant, who is very devoted to the girl.

One day Margaret accompanies Thompson and a party of mutual friends on a fox hunting expedition. She purposely allows her horse to drop behind and, finding a shady nook, settles down to dream of her absent lover. Thompson notices her absence, retraces his steps and finds her alone. He tries to kiss her and she resists his attempt. Angered, he seizes her just as Bartlett appears upon the scene. The old servant raises his rifle and fires. Thompson falls, and Bartlett, thinking he has killed his master, drops his gun and flees without having been seen by either Margaret or her guardian.

It happens that on the morning of the day of the hunt, Bartlett and the engineer, both hunting, had met in the woods. Their rifles, just alike except for the initials of their owners carved in the butts, were interchanged. As a consequence, when the police find the young man's rifle in the bushes from which the shot was fired, he is suspected of trying to kill his former employer and thrown into jail. Margaret suspects that Bartlett fired the shot and sets herself to search for him. She finally locates him in an old hut where he has hidden from pursuit, and persuades him to come into court and tell the truth. The result is that Thompson is discredited, the engineer cleared, and the court, deciding that Bartlett's shot was justified, sets him free. And it is not long before wedding bells ring out for Margaret and the engineer.

LUBIN.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURE SERIES NO. 1—Lord Cecil Intervenes (Sept. 14).—From Lord Weston, a kindly club lounger and his friend, Lord Cecil learns that Rose Middlehurst, a wealthy orphan and daughter of one who had been his very dearest friend, is in the clutches of the Countess Lurovich, a clever and unscrupulous adventuress whose present game is to marry wealthy orphan girls to handsome rascals, afterwards dividing the spoils with the legal "husband." Realizing that craft will be necessary to save the girl from the miserable fate to which she is being beguiled, Cecil obtains employment as chauffeur at the Countess's country place, where Rose is a guest. He soon sees that a direct warning to the girl will be folly, as she has been infatuated by Count Luco, the rascal who has been assigned to marry her.

The Countess is careful not to appear as a party to any of these marriages, and in this case has arranged that it shall appear, through the fact that Luco and Rose eloped, that the marriage had been opposed by her. Cecil learns the plans for the elopement which is to take place on the day Rose is of age, and makes preparations accordingly. He calls upon Lord Weston for assistance, and that nobleman, who is acquainted with Rose, secures the services of a good-natured and discreet actress, whom he brings to the Red Lion Inn, near the Countess' country place. Cecil drives the machine in which Luco steals away with his victim, and speeds furiously to the Red Lion, despite the appeals and threats of the frightened Luco, who is too terrified to attempt either to gain control of the machine or leap out. At the Red Lion, in accordance with Cecil's plans, the actress dramatically declares herself Luco's wife, and Rose appeals to Lord Weston, who, apparently, appears upon the scene by chance, to take her home. Luco at length escapes from the woman who asserts that she is his wife, and realizing that he could never make Rose believe the woman an impostor, flees. Lord Weston discreetly discloses to Rose only the fact that Lord Cecil has saved her from a bitter fate, without explaining the methods employed, and the grateful girl insists on expressing her gratitude directly. This she does, and tells him, moreover, that if she may she will henceforth love him as she did her father, and his friend.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURE SERIES NO. 2—An Untarnished Shield (Sept. 21).—Rodney, Lord Cecil's younger brother, falls under the spell of Mlle. Dazia, a foreign actress who has suddenly become the rage in London, and who has at her feet a score of noblemen and millionaires. She shows marked partiality for Rodney, however, and he is brought almost to the point of madness by her alternating moods of encouragement and coy retreat. Rodney is serving as an aide in the intelligence office of the War Office, and the real object of Mlle. Dazia is to so inflame his heart that he will, for the sake of winning her, betray to the band of foreign spies of which she is a member the secrets of the British harbor defenses. This she at last accomplishes, and Rodney betrays his trust.

Lord Cecil is informed of the affair by the old general, who is the head of the intelligence office, and who was the friend of Lord Cecil's father. The War Office was fully aware that the plot to steal the plans was under way, but instead of preventing its successful conclusion, had taken no notice, false plans having been substituted for the real ones, so that the stolen plans would, in the end, serve as a terrible snare should the enemy attempt to use them. For this reason no official punishment whatever would be meted out to the spies or their accomplices.

Rodney is no less a traitor, however, because his deed would not result in disaster to his country. Lord Cecil is told that, so far as his brother is concerned, the matter is left in his hands and Rodney is ordered to acompany him to Croftlaigh and there await orders. This younger brother is all the world to Lord Cecil, to whom he has seemed more like a son, but Cecil does not hesitate to take the only course which appears in honor open: that of Croftlaigh has ever been an untarnished shield. He places upon the table in front of the boy a revolver, and leaves him to the fate which it has been the duty of his brother to condemn him, that the honor of the house might be preserved.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURES SERIES NO. 3—An Affair of Honor (Sept. 28).—Aside from maintaining untarnished the honor of his name and being "good form," Lord Cecil is particularly interested in but two subjects, one being Rose Middlehurst, a young girl, the child of his dearest friend, now an orphan, and his nephew, Bob Stanley, Lieutenant in the Horse Guards, a fine young chap, but impulsive and reckless. For each Lord Cecil has a deep affection, and he is made quite happy by their engagement. Bob falls in with a "sporting crowd," the leading spirit of which is the Countess Lurovich, a beautiful siren, with whom he becomes temporarily fascinated. The Countess, contrary to her custom, is infatuated with Bob. She induces Lemoine, another member of the set, not to press the youth for a card debt of 4,000 pounds, for which Lemoine holds I. O. U.'s.

Bob soon gets over his fancy for the Countess, his real love for Rose asserting itself, but she has no intention of letting him go. When she realizes that her beauty and wiles have lost their charm, she is roused to a venomous hatred and determines to ruin Bob, even if she cannot cause his death. She tells Lemoine to demand the payment of the I. O. U.'s. She also plans that Count Lurovich, who has been absent but who now returns, shall receive a lurid account of the "affair" with Bob, expecting that the Count, who is a famous duellist, will kill the young guardsman. Bob, almost frantic with shame and grief at his approaching disgrace, which will mean the loss of his commission, the dishonoring of his name, and the breaking of Rose's heart, confesses everything to Lord Cecil, who assures him that everything will be arranged. By straining his scanty resources, Lord Cecil raises the $20,000 necessary to take up Bob's paper. He also contrives that Count Lurovich shall think that it is he who has been intimate with the Countess, and accepts the challenge which the Count at once gives. Lord Cecil fully expects to be killed, the Count's reputation being deadly. Lord Cecil is himself a splendid shot, but has no intention of attempting to kill Lurovich, against whom he has no unkind feelings. There is a little trip to France, and the meeting takes place. At the word, Lord Cecil fires in the air, the Count takes deliberate aim, and Lord Cecil falls, severely wounded. Lord Cecil recovers under the tender care of the deeply grieved Rose and the repentant Bob. He is quite content that he has saved the honor of his nephew and the happiness of the girl, for the single condition he has imposed upon Bob is that Rose must never suspect anything concerning her husband.

JEALOUS JAMES (Sept. 29).—Jim Jenkins is jealous of his wife, Clara, and she cannot even smile on a man that he does not go up in the air so high that he bumps the moon out of place. Even the post man comes under suspicion, and when he steals back to the house and finds a man on his knees before Clara, and in her bedroom at that, he is ready to do murder. Clara pulls her husband off the unfortunate and explains that he is the upholsterer tacking down the carpet, and Jim is quiet for a moment. But on his way to the office a friend shows him a pair of opera glasses. Naturally Jim trains them on his home and there is another man on his knees before Clara out on the back stoop where all the neighbors can see. It's enough. He starts for home in a hurry, and finds it was the grocery boy who had knelt to tie his shoe string. He knows it's the grocery boy because the kid bangs him on the head with a bag of flour and the bag bursts, sprinkling Jim liberally.

This time he actually gets to the office, but he is uneasy. Suspicion gnaws at his vitals and he starts for home. There in the window he sees a man with his arm about his wife's waist; he doesn't stop to inquire; he shoots to kill, and it is a mighty good thing for the girl next door, who is masquerading in her brother's clothes, that rage makes Jim's aim unsteady. Maude's brother and sweetheart hear the shots and run to see what it is about. They arrange a scheme with a prizefighter to cure Jim of his jealousy, which ends very successfully.

HIS BROTHER BILL (Special—Two Parts—Sept. 30).—In 1863 the family of John Jones, a typical New England farmer, consisted of two sons, Bill and Jim, his daughter, Emma, and his wife, Rebecca. The boys wanted to enlist, but the family opposed it until the father discovered that the bounty money they would receive would pay off the mortgage on the farm, the interest of which was due. The farmer was worried, but consented and the boys marched to the front. One day while doing "scout" duty, Jim, the younger brother, was killed by a Confederate sharpshooter. Bill, the elder brother, mad with grief, started in pursuit of the retreating rebel, regardless of the warnings of his companions, or his captain's orders. Bill speedily overtook the fleeing rebel and called on him to surrender. The Confederate threw up his hands.

In the meantime the captain and some of the men, fearing for Bill's safety, started after him. As Bill rushed forward to seize his prisoner, he stumbled, dropped his gun, which fell at the feet of the rebel who, having previously lost his own weapon, seized Bill's gun and threatened him, but the approach of the Union soldiers changed his purpose and he now offered the gun in return for protection. This Bill promised and faithfully fulfilled as the soldiers came up and threatened the rebel's life. Later Bill was wounded and the rebel volunteered to nurse him. At the close of the war Bill, being too weak to travel alone, the rebel took him to the New England home, where he met Bill's sister, Emma, who fell in love with him, and the North and South became one family.

JINKS AND THE BARBER (Sept. 29).—Jinks is enjoying breakfast with his wife when a telegram arrives stating that he must take the next train to attend an important meeting at Puckerbrush. He has time to make the train but needs a shave, so on his way to the depot he stops into a barber shop. A customer has just taken the only vacant chair and Jinks offers to pay his bill if he will surrender his turn. The man agrees and Jinks gets a hasty shave, leaves his card with the barber and hurries to the depot. His hat blows off and he chases it for several blocks; so does a tramp, who throws his own battered derby away and chases Jinks hat. The tramp wins the race and captures the hat, so Jinks is obliged to wear the battered misfit hat abandoned by the tramp. After many mishaps Jinks arrives at the depot just in time to miss the train and sinks on a bench exhausted.

In the meantime business is very brisk in the barber shop, for the man who gave up his turn has his hair dyed and curled, his face massaged and in fact keeps the barber going at full speed until the bill amounts to six dollars. The barber gets on Jinks' trail with the bill and finds him at the depot down and out. He explores Jinks' pockets and finding he has just ten cents more than the amount of the bill he receipts the bill, keeps the ten cents for a tip and leaves Jinks to recover.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

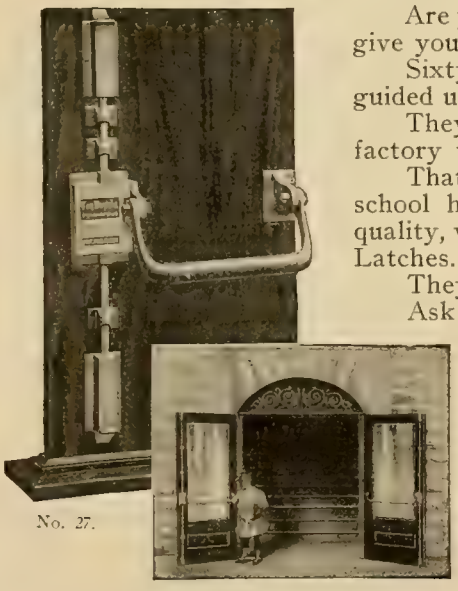
Self-Releasing Fire Exit Latches



No. 27.

"Safe exit is a universal demand."

Are your Exit doors safeguarded? A few dollars' expense would surely give you mental relief—would it not?

Sixty years of experience in the merchandising of Builders' Hardware guided us in the production of these Latches.

They have stood the test in every competition, and have proved satisfactory wherever applied.

That the mechanism is as good as new after years of service on a school house door is proof positive of substantial construction. This quality, we assert, is found only in the Von Duprin Self-Releasing Fire Exit Latches.

They are the best.

THE PROOF OF A MAN (Sept. 28).—Bob Carrol, cripple, works in a little cigar stand down in Chinatown and eats his meals at a coffee house around the corner. Alma Wilson, who waits upon tables, is, unknown to herself, loved by Bob, and also by Jim Carter. Carter is a typical gang leader and Chinatown crook. Alma is infatuated with Carter's good looks. Bob finally musters up courage enough to ask Alma if he may keep her company. Alma answered, "When I go out with anyone, that person must be a man!" Carter overhears this remark and "kids" Bob about it.

That night, after he closes the cigar stand, Bob goes to a little Chinese restaurant. Carter enters and hits Bob for a loan, telling him he will show him a way to forget his troubles. Bob, ready for anything, consents. Carter takes him to a room in the rear, supposed to be a storage room, but in reality the largest opium den in the city. Bob refuses to smoke and shortly after leaves. The next day Carter keeps a date with Alma. Bob observes them as they leave and watches them as they go upstairs to the Chinese restaurant. Carter conspires with Hop Lee and has him dope Alma's tea. Bob waits for them to come down, but in vain. In the meantime the drug, having taken effect on Alma, Carter takes her to the den in the rear and, placing her on one of the bunks, proceeds to "soak" a pill and get ready for a smoke.

Alma's mother waits for her at home. Finally she comes to the coffee house. Bob meets her and, surmising where Alma is, goes in search. At the Chinese restaurant Bob can see no sign of Alma. Bob endeavors to enter the back room, but is refused admittance. He goes to the police station. The police plan a raid. Bob, knowing the facilities the Chinamen have for getting away in case of a raid, tells them of a plan he has by which they can grab the whole crowd. Going back to the restaurant, the detectives are posted. Bob goes to the alleyway in the rear and locates a window. He breaks the glass, enters, fights his way to the door and admits the detectives. In the mix-up which ensues he is rendered unconscious by a blow on the head. Later, Almo visits Bob at the hospital and the old saying is proved, "A man's a man for a' that."

THE TENTH COMMANDMENT (Three Parts—Oct. 1).—The action of the play, briefly told, relates the conditions arising in the home of an ambitious doctor which caused his wife to leave him. The wife was not bad. She was just selfish and demanded more attention from her husband than he could conscientiously give. Incidentally, there was a nurse in the employ of the doctor whom the wife believed she had reasons to be jealous of. True, this nurse loved the young doctor, but aside from the interest she aroused because of her intelligent and efficient work, the doctor paid little attention to her.

When the final separation came between the doctor and his wife there was another man, Brown, who was mixed up in it. He had whispered things into the ear of the wife—those things which would tend to make her unhappy and dissatisfied. Brown coveted the wife for himself. However, the only thing Brown managed to do was to compromise the name of the wife sufficiently to turn the heart of the husband against her when the baby came. She had returned to her mother.

Time came when the young doctor received a 'phone call to attend a little girl who was shot accidentally. This child was his own, though he never discovered it until he arrived at the hotel and met his wife face to face. And as fate would have it Brown was there, too. However, at the urgings of the nurse, the doctor performed the operation, believing the child was not his but Brown's. During the operation a fire breaks out in the hotel. The doctor and the nurse must complete the operation. When all is done the nurse lies dying on the lawn outside, a victim of loyalty, and the doctor understands aright. The wife has learned her lesson, while Brown has pjaid for his villainy with his life.

UNIVERSAL IKE.

THE SHACK NEXT DOOR (Sept. 29).—Ray Vernon, a hard-working young man who so far has been unable to catch the elusive dollar, is in love with Louise, the daughter of a wealthy broker. Ray is sternly told that when he possesses $5,000 as a start in life, his suit may be considered.

Disheartened, Ray starts for town. On the corner adjoining the magnificent mansion of the broker is a vacant lot on which a sign stating that there are no restrictions as to buildings advertises the lot for sale. An idea strikes Ray. Making for the real estate office, he buys an option for thirty days on the lot. He then visits the Italian section and makes a proposition to Pedro, an Italian, to build him a small shack which he can have, providing he and his family will move into it.

A few days later the wealthy broker's wife is astonished to see a rough wooden shack erected on the vacant lot, and Pedro and his numerous posterity its inhabitants. When the broker arrives home that evening his wife tells him of their disgraceful neighbors. The next day he goes to the real estate office determined to buy the lot. He is surprised when he is informed that the price of the lot will be $11,000. Declaring that it is too much, he leaves the office.

That evening Louise is informed by Ray of his plan and, although at first indignant, finally sees the humor of it and encourages him. That evening mother gives a brilliant tea party and one of the society ladies brings her pet dog with her. Pedro has a monkey. The monkey takes a violent fancy to the dog and mounts his back for a ride. The startled canine dashes madly through the tea party and causes consternation. That night the hysterical wife demands that the lot be purchased. A few days later Ray calls and shows the father the check for $5,000. The broker realizes he is beaten and gives his consent to the match.

STERLING.

THE TALE OF A HAT (Aug. 31).—Three hoboes arrive in a box car. They demand that the little tramp ask for a handout. He refuses, and the other two beat him up, leaving him. A collector, demanding payment on a furniture mortgage from extravagant Mrs. Jones, leaves, threatening to bring the sheriff. Mr. Jones, coming upon the scene at this moment, hears the squabble, and tells his wife that he will draw the last of his savings out of the bank and will pay the claim. The two tramps hear this and follow him.

Mr. Jones draws the money in the shape of a thousand dollar bill, which he puts in his hatband for safe keeping. As he gets outside the tramps attack him, and he starts to run. His hat blows off, striking the hoboes. They throw it to one side and the little tramp, who has been in the background, puts it on. Mr. Jones falls exhausted as the tramps come up, and he tells them the money is in the hat. They make a break for the little fellow, who gets on a handcar to escape them. They pursue on another handcar. Jones runs into a parade of police, and when he explains the situation, the cops chase after the tramps, using a wagon.

The little tramp comes to a drawbridge, which he passes over safely, but his pursuing companions fall into the river. The hat flies through the air, the tramps still chasing it. It finally flies right into Mrs. Jones' hands, just as the sheriff is threatening her. He starts his men moving the furniture out, when she observes the money and pays off the mortgage. The tramps come upon the scene, and start tearing the hat up in a vain quest for the money. The police arrive and arrest them. Then hubby demands that the furniture be again moved into the house, and peace reigns.

A BOGUS BARON (Sept. 3).—Andy is very strong for the landlady's daughter, who likes him, although the landlady objects. Upon the count's arrival on the scene, the landlady picks him out as a possible suitor for her daughter. Andy, for revenge, picks up Snitz, who works in the park, and introduces him to the landlady as the Baron von Glutz. He dresses him beforehand in the count's uniform, so that he will look the part. He has an understanding with Snitz that when the latter cuts out the count he will retire in Andy's favor. Snitz, however, likes the new title so well that he refuses to retire when the proper time comes. Andy, in revenge, tells the count that Snitz is wearing his uniform, which arouses him to fury, with disastrous results to Snitz.

TRAPPED IN A CLOSET (Sept. 14).—Bill and his wife, a happy (?) couple, get along like a couple of hungry lions together. Bill, on his way to the office, sees an old-fashioned closet which he buys and sends home. In the meantime wife has gone to market. Two prowling burglars enter the house and pack everything in sight that isn't nailed down. The closet is delivered and on wifie's return the burglars secrete themselves in the same. Wife orders the closet closed and returned to the store, then notices, after same is removed, that all her silverware has been stolen; telephones the police. Mounted (on mules) the force arrive and gives chase to the furniture men, who are removing the closet, with the burglars on a truck. The police force give chase, and when they run out of ammunition, seize a piece of field artillery in order to stop the retreating furniture movers. The field artillery, of antiquated design, is fired at the closet, after, however, the furniture movers and burglars have made their escape from the truck. Truck and closet, including the spoils that the burglars had acquired, are all blown to atoms.

THE BATTLE (Two Parts—Sept. 28).—Billy, Olive and other children are playing on the lawn when the picture opens. Billy is unusually downhearted; he is muchly smitten with Olive and she, on the other hand, will have none of him. The other children have sweethearts; Billy has none. About this time an old soldier, who has seen service in the war, observes Billy and wonders at the close resemblance of the child to his own who has just died. His old heart softens to Billy and, giving the children some sweets, he takes Billy to his home, where he shows him the toys which belonged to his dead son. He gives Billy the toy rifle and drills him to become a soldier.

Billy's mother, looking for him, meets the other children and they inform her that Billy was taken away by an old man. The mother becomes frantic and she seeks the assistance of the neighbors to find the boy. Meantime the old soldier arranges the toy soldiers on the floor and commences the story of his life—how, when he was a boy, he was stationed at a small fort on the plains when it was attacked by Indians. He was in love with his Colonel's daughter, but it was not until he had shown his heroism by going for assistance when the fort seemed doomed that the Colonel consented to the match. Billy listened to this story with eyes and mouth.

During this time the mother and neighbors have been hunting furiously for Billy. The old soldier and Billy, tiring of the play, finally drop off to sleep. Billy dreams of what the old soldier has related. He sees himself arrive at the fort and become smitten with the Colonel's daughter—and the same incidents which the old man experienced the boy goes through in his dream. The mother has located the house belonging to the soldier and dashes in. What she finds is her son fast asleep in the lap of the old man with his arms fast around the old man's neck. She understands and tiptoes out of the scene as it fades.

JOKER.

FOR THE HAND OF JANE (Sept. 16).—The hero and the villain are rivals for the hand of the girl, both being opposed by her father. She turns the villain down, but not so with our hero. He takes matters into his own hands, and, laying out both his hated rivals and the troublesome father with a croquet mallet, tries to persuade the girl to elope with him. She demurs, but he overcomes her objections by means of the mallet, and, knocking her over the head, seizes her in his arms and drags her away. He has trouble in getting through a fence, and the girl becomes tightly lodged in it. A swift kick solves the problem for our hero, but further misfortune looms up when he sees the girl land at the bottom of a deep crevice. At his wits' end, he hurries back and secures a rope. Unable to rescue the girl himself, he revives her father and the villain, and presses them into service to assist him in rescuing his fair one. Unable to affix the rope to the girl satisfactorily, he gets back out of the crevice and the girl's father and the villain are let down. Drawing the girl to the surface our hero makes his escape with his loved one, leaving her father and the villain to their fate at the bottom of the crevice.

THE NEW BUTLER (Sept. 30).—The widow starts for a vacation. Her son takes her to the train. When leaving, he bumps into Betty, the daughter of a wealthy widower, who is also leaving on the same train. Ernie has never seen Betty before, but she looks mighty good to him. They meet often and become fast friends. Betty has promised father she will not marry. She forgets, however, and marries Ernie.

In the meantime the father and mother have met with the same fate. Father sends Betty a telegram, telling her about his marriage, and that, as he has told the wife he had no children, it would be best for her to act as maid until they could arrange matters with the stepmother. The parents return. Ernie is in hot water until he decides to act as butler. Everything goes right until the father discovers his wife in the butler's arms. He is only kept from killing the butler by the maid. The mother sees the maid embracing the husband and more trouble starts. Later explanations are made after the father has seen his daughter in the butler's arms—and the two couples are happy again.

IN THE CLUTCHES OF THE VILLAIN (Oct. 3).—All must be sacrificed to supply Mrs. Gudnite's excessive demands for self adornment. Old man Gudnite does the best he can to earn enough money to settle her terrible bills. But, what's the use? All he can possibly earn is only a drop in the bucket. Ah! the villainous tailor has a scheme: "Deliver your fair daughter, Lizzie, into my clutches and I'll call off your bill!" This proposition strikes Mrs. Gudnite just right. With joy and eagerness she delivers up Lizzie to settle her bill.

Now in this deal one person was overlooked. This is our hero, Shultz. He heeds Lizzie's

Gentlemen:-

We wish to compliment you very highly on your marvelous two reel animal production. We consider "Beasts Of The Jungle" the best educational picture of this kind ever shown on a screen.

It has all the essentials of a big production, without the monotonous padding. Every scene is photographically perfect and the fact that they were all taken within twenty feet of the camera puts this film in a class by itself. Each and every scene has its individual punch.

Our policy of showing only the very largest productions for a complete week, and the fact that we are recognized as the best house in the West naturally demands that we exhibit nothing but the highest class. This fact should be a sufficient recommendation for your picture. If you contemplate releasing any more subjects of this caliber, kindly consider them already booked at this house.

Wishing you all the success you deserve with this production, we remain,

Yours truly,

Gentlemen:-

Your two reel subject entitled "Beasts Of The Jungle" should take the motion picture world by storm, as it is unquestionably the greatest educational film of this nature we have ever witnessed.

Pictures of this class are usually made with the idea of not how good, but - how long. This production, however, is full of short, snappy subjects that will hold the intense interest of any audience throughout.

In presenting these pictures to the patrons of our Auditorium Theater we feel that we are giving them a distinct novelty.

Wishing you the greatest possible success with this splendid subject, we remain

Very truly yours,

screams for succor. Then indeed does the villain find his hands full, and the trail burning hot behind him. It is Schultz coming. The scheming tailor is finally run to earth. He fights, but meets his match in Brady and perishes miserably. Then old man Gudnite finds that his old age is to be blessed with a son-in-law much to his own heart, while his spoiled wife is made to acknowledge and amend the error of her ways.

CRYSTAL.

CHARLIE'S SMOKER (Sept. 29).—Charlie's wife, Vivian, prohibits his smoking in the house. He tries to smoke on the sly, but she catches him. She goes away on a visit. Charlie immediately invites some friends up and they smoke to their heart's content. The room is soon filled with smoke. Vivian returns unexpectedly, sees the smoke coming from one of the windows and thinks the house is afire. She calls the fire department. The firemen play the hose on Charlie and his friends. Charlie gets hold of the hose and nearly wrecks the house. Vivian enters and he drenches her also. Peace is finally restored and Vivian promises never to stop Charlie's smoking again.

BELMONT BUTTS IN (Sept. 29).—Geraldine, a mischievous girl, lives with her grandfather and grandmother. She is continually pestering and playing jokes on the old fellow. He wishes to get rid of her. He writes a letter to her father asking him to take her away and also saying that he is going to kill his prize rooster. Belmont finds the last half of the letter and thinks that he is going to kill Geraldine. He calls the sheriff and their suspicions are confirmed when they see the old man sharpening up his knife. Complications ensue. All is finally straightened out and Belmont is beaten up. He resolves to mind his own business in the future.

NESTOR.

THE WHITE WOLF (Sept. 30).—Swift Wind, a young chief, loves Dancing Fawn. In their ramblings they, too, see white wolves, which is an object of fear and veneration among the Indians, and return to the village. The two are betrothed by the old chief, but old Red Nose, the medicine man, demands her hand for himself. The chief, fearing his magic powers, considers. Dancing Fawn runs away to her lover. Swift Wind is taught a secret by an old trapper. "If a trap is baited with an animal's own hair the iron jaws will never fail to catch it." The Indian decides how he will overthrow his rival. At his instruction Dancing Fawn cuts off a lock of hair from the sleeping medicine man. With it Swift Wind baits the trap. The next day a wolf is caught and as the Indians approach the trap the beast turns into the medicine man. The hand of the great father has proven his love again and Swift Wind and his sweetheart are united.

OUT OF THE FRYING PAN (Oct. 2).—Edward Howard leaves a will to the effect that unless his son, Edward Howard, Jr., marries Miss Elizabeth Hall, within six months of the date of his death, the money shall go to charitable institutions. The condition is not to the liking of the son, but he listens to the advice of his lawyers, as he is heavily in debt. When the Hall family hear of the will they become desirous of the match and write young Howard to visit them at their home in the country. Arriving at the station Edward is met by a lady who introduces herself to him as "Miss Elizabeth Hall." He is horror-struck, for she is a spinster of some forty summers. Arriving at the house they are met by a charming young lady. Miss Hall introduces her as "My niece." In a few words she explains to her niece the romantic affair—love at first sight. Miss Hall, the younger, is overcome with laughter and Mr. Howard with horror as the truth of the situation bursts upon him.

That evening he sees young Miss Hall alone, and, telling her of his mistake, declares his affection, which he discovers to his great joy is mutual. They plot together to find some means by which the aunt will release him. A brilliant idea seizes him. She knows nothing of his character—he will prove himself to be a drunkard. At dinner that night he imbibes too much. Mr. Hall and Elizabeth's brother help the intoxicated one to his room, greatly amused. Finding Miss Hall alone the next day he tells her that he feels that he can no longer hold her to her promise. She assures him that she has spent the whole night in prayer and feels it a sacred duty not to withhold her restraining influence.

In despair he confers with Elizabeth. They decide to let the aunt discover him making love to Elizabeth herself. This is done. To his intense disappointment she blames Elizabeth and again forgives her lover. He is desperate by this time and the whole family hold a conference. Elizabeth is struck with a brilliant idea to which the conspirators listen eagerly. He must be subject to fits. Desiring to make it appear realistic, they get a shaving stick and fill his mouth with a foaming lather. Miss Hall enters and he throws a fit. She at first stands petrified, then faints. The family assure her that Howard said they only happen about two or three times a month or whenever he is much excited. When he approaches her to explain she refuses to allow him to come near her. Again sinking into a swoon she is carried off by the family. Elizabeth and Howard embrace.

REX.

THE BOOB'S LEGACY (Oct. 1).—The Boob's country sweetheart goes to the city for employment and finds it as scullery maid in the house of a family of "would-be" society people. The Boob, in the meantime, has been left a large sum of money by a distant relative. He writes of his good fortune. The letter falls into the hands of the scheming mistress of the house, who is looking for a wealthy husband for her daughter. She decides to capture him if possible. The Boob arrives in the middle of an afternoon reception, causing considerable mirth. The mistress cleverly keeps him from seeing the scullery maid by entertaining him. The Boob appreciates the entertainment so much that he finally goes to sleep. A quarrel is started in the kitchen between the scullery maid and the house maid, which results in the scullery maid chasing the house maid up and down the stairs. The scullery maid finally trips and falls down stairs, landing in the Boob's arms with the result of a happy reunion.

THE PIPES OF PAN (Two Parts—Oct. 4).—Stephen's wife fails to inspire him in his painting. While seated before his hearth stone the young artist dreams of a beautiful pastoral love scene between a faun and a wood-nymph that is interrupted by the daughter of Pan. She lures the faun from his own true love with the weird music of her father's flute. The artist awakens from his dream with the picture of the daughter of Pan lingering in his mind. It is the picture he would like to transfer to canvas. In searching for an ideal model, Stephen meets Caprice, a dancer who exemplifies the spirit of Pan's daughter. She is induced to pose for the coming masterpiece. Stephen becomes enamoured of his model and sadly neglects his wife. When the wife is refused admittance to her husband's studio, she naturally becomes jealous and angry.

As the days pass the wife becomes friendly with her husband's friend, Arthur Darrell. Darrell is in love with the wife and makes advances; but for the time these are spurned. The sinister influence of Caprice upon the artist is apparent, and even after the painting is finished he is too fascinated with her to let her go. In a passionate love scene he wins her. His wife, in the meantime, has come to an understanding with the friend, Darrell. However, she decides, in fairness to her husband, to inform him prior to her departure, of her intentions. She finds the studio empty; the fatal picture is there finished to mock her. In a rage she slashes it to ribbons and with the act of destruction, the influence under which Stephen has worked is broken. Deserting his sweetheart, he hurries home to find love and forgiveness in the hands of his repentant wife.

FRONTIER.

FOUR DAYS (Oct. 4).—It was on a Monday that Fred went fishing. The trout was wary, but, nevertheless, he made a good haul. This good haul was Dolly, who was picking flowers near the stream when a hook flew in and caught her dress. She let him extract the hook, but utterly refused to listen to apologies. But when she reached the gate of her home she looked back and smiled.

Tuesday came. Fred decides to do a little painting, while Dolly concluded to have a little target practice. Her sight was bad, and Fred's half-finished masterpiece was also a sight after it had been punctured with bullet holes. This time it was Fred who refused to listen to apolo-

"'Northern Lights' will have a wide appeal by reason of its double amusement value—on the dramatic side and on the spectacular side."—Moving Picture World.

"The story contains plenty of interesting episodes and the general effect is good. 'Northern Lights' should draw very well in the larger houses."—The Clipper.

"Several distinct threads of plot action are woven gradually together with considerable skill to form interesting dramatic material. The acting of 'Northern Lights' is without a hitch."—Morning Telegraph.

"CAPT. SWIFT"

FIVE PARTS

A Problem Drama—Startling and Entrancing.

The Critics say:

"The photography is such as to cause exclamations of wonder. It might be described as plastic. There can be no doubt of the success of this feature. A review could not possibly do justice to it. To appreciate it, 'Capt. Swift' must be personally seen."—New York Review.

"Startling situations continuously develop. The picture has plenty of good, effective action. The story decidedly interests as it is."—Moving Picture World.

"'Capt. Swift' is commended by virtue of its sterling worth, as a film of interest, of well handled situations, of capable direction, of good photography and of rich settings."—Motography.

"'Capt. Swift' will immediately impress one as being photography of the better class. It is rapid in its dramatic action and the story reaches up to a tragic climax which ends the play in a manner quite different from the usual."—Billboard.

Two wonderful stories, marvelously depicted by all-star casts, artistic settings and perfect photography.

gies. He also smiled when he sat down before the easel again.

On Wednesday Joe decides that he ought to speak to the old man about Dolly. The old man was willing, but when Dolly came in the gate with Fred, Joe realized that he would first have to gain someone's consent. An argument arose between Fred and Joe. Joe got considerably the worst of it.

Thursday was Fred's day to take a plunge into the old swimming hole. Coming through the woods with her rifle Dolly found his clothes. As a prank she rigged them up to represent a man leaning against a tree. From a distance Joe saw this and thought that it is Fred and Dolly in a love scene. When Dolly left he filled Fred's shirt with bullet holes. Later, terror stricken, he told Dolly's father that he had killed his rival. The father, with Dolly and Joe, rushed to the scene, only to find Fred wondering who could have ruined his shirt. Joe had been taught a good lesson, while Fred managed to convince Dolly that Friday was the best day in the week on which to be married.

ECLAIR.

TILL THE SANDS OF THE DESERT GROW COLD (Two Parts—Sept. 30).—Jim Hazen is a man, a man who might, under different circumstances, achieve great things in the world. However his world was in the mining districts and he knew little of the finer things of life. And the woman; she was genuine, she was pretty, but she knew little of life and men and could not read men aright. Her name was Edith and Jim loved her. Edith, though, thought the ne'er-do-well of the town was more dashing and romantic, and she was hardly to blame for giving herself to him.

Time passed and it brought its awakening and suffering and regrets to Edith. Her husband lacked the qualities of manhood and Edith suffered in consequence. She was abused. It was Jim who prevented the depraved man from using a horsewhip on his wife. Then it was that Edith decided to leave her husband. Jim's consent to help her was honorable, though, as he knew that matters could not continue as they were.

The husband learned of the plan. When Jim came to the house there was a fight; Jim was overpowered. Edith, he believed, had been killed by the drunken man. It was her little daughter who released Jim and he took the opportunity to escape with the child. For hours he tramped through the desert with the child until some friendly Indians found them and succored them with water.

Years pass. Jim prospered as a miner and the child, Ruth, has grown to womanhood, loved by her foster father. It was an afternoon that an automobile drew up to the door and a woman alighted to ask for water. Coming out of the door Jim found himself face to face with Edith, Ruth's mother, whom he had thought dead. Edith, believing Jim had died with the child in the desert, had married again. There is a terrific struggle in Jim's breast; he knows that Ruth's place is with her mother. There is a happy reunion and Jim, with a heavy heart, sees the girl ride away with the woman he loved years before.

THE MAN WHO CAME BACK (Oct. 4).—Tex Burton, an experienced cow puncher and range rider, sickens of life in a large city where he has been living for three years and decides to go back to his old life in the open. He reaches a small frontier town and allows himself to be taken as a "tenderfoot." He is engaged by a cattle outfit as handy man. The boys decide to take advantage of his newness and haze him. The first night while asleep he is rudely jerked from the ground. He finds himself being carried over the desert on the end of a rope drawn by a galloping pony. Discovering that one of the Mexicans has played the trick, Tex pours water on his blankets. A fight ensues and after a fierce rough-and-tumble battle the alleged "tenderfoot" emerges victor. The Mexican vows revenge.

Shortly after Tex lassoes a wild bull which is chasing the owner's daughter and with a wonderful display of skill throws him by the tail. A friendship springs up between the two and they soon become sweethearts. The cowboy decides to enter in the Frontier Day Celebration. By wonderful riding and reckless daring, he captures the prize for broncho busting, throwing a steer, the relay race and various other contests. Awaiting his chance the Mexican cuts the young fellow's saddle girth. He is thrown in front of the galloping horses but escapes with a few bruises. Re-entering the contest he captures the honors and is rewarded by a promise of marriage from Mildred, while the Mexican is led to prison.

THE TREY O' HEARTS—AS THE CROW FLIES (Ninth Episode)—(Two Parts)—Sept. 29. —Marrophat, failing to overtake Judith in her flight, turns back to advise with Red November. His car arrives on the scene of the fire just as Alan has rescued Rose. Rapidly assembling several of November's gang, Marrophat gives them their instructions. The gunmen point Alan out to the police as the incendiary. Two policemen arrest him. Alan, suspecting a plot, breaks from his captors and takes to his heels, the mob following. Doubling and twisting through slum streets, Alan finally finds himself on the water-front with every landward way of escape closed. Hard pressed, he seeks refuge in the rigging of a ship moored alongside. The gunmen pursue; he fights them off, kicking and pushing several into the water. But the odds proving too heavy, Alan dives from one of the yard arms and starts swimming for midstream.

An aviator, Coast by name, sailing overhead in a hydroplane, observes the scene, and, his sympathy excited for the gallant fight Alan puts up, drops to the water and rescues him. The day being slightly foggy, Coast loses his way in attempting to locate the Mineola aviation field and hangars. He lands with his passenger in a swamp and it is evening before he and Alan reach the field by motorcar. Here Alan charters from Coast a new aeroplane with the understanding that it is to be held against his order. He then returns to New York.

Meantime Barcus has arrived in New York and learned from Digby, Jr., that Alan is being married to Rose in New Jersey. He starts over in the hope of being in at the finish; fate brings him on the scene of the tenement fire just as Rose is being kidnapped by Marrophat in his motorcar. Barcus pursues in a taxicab. Marrophat takes Rose home, interrupting a violent scene between Judith and her father—Judith having got home a few minutes earlier. She has been lying to Trine, trying to persuade him of Marrophat's treachery. But Marrophat's true story of the events of the morning, backed by Rose's testimony, convinces Trine that Judith is no longer trustworthy. He orders his two daughters to their rooms.

At Marrophat's suggestion Trine decides to take Rose by special train to Chicago and points West as a lure to get Alan away from New York into a section of the country where the prejudices of the police are a less serious handicap to their designs. Barcus, by shadowing the messenger, learns of the plan and by bribing the porter and brakeman, substitutes as a porter. He manages to let Alan know of the affair before the train leaves. Alan goes to Trine's house and discovers Judith a prisoner in her own room. Judith lends a willing hand and the two, making for Van Cortlandt Park, find Coast and the aeroplane. They start the pursuit and arrive in Chicago the next morning. They learn that Trine's special has passed through on time. They renew the chase, finally overtaking the special on the plains of Illinois.

Alan, with the binoculars, recognizes Barcus on the rear platform. Barcus sees the aeroplane and suspects that Alan is attempting a rescue. He hastens to warn Rose. Trine, Marrophat et al., sight the biplane a little later, but as they do so, it develops engine trouble and sinks to the earth. They dismiss it from their thoughts, taking no more precaution than to station the two gunmen as guards on the front and back platform when they go to bed for the night. The biplane comes to earth near Kansas City. Leaving Coast with instructions to effect repairs and follow on, Alan and Judith engage a light engine. On this they pursue Trine's special. Barcus sees their headlight drawing nearer, and suspects that the moment of rescue is at hand. He proceeds to overpower and throw off the train the gunman on the rear platform; then he boots the front platform guard off into the night and hastens to warn Rose.

Both are waiting on the back platform when the light engine overakes the special and runs up close enough for Rose and Barcus to make the leap from the back platform to the cowcatcher. Marrophat and Trine rouse to the situation just in time to complicate the danger. Barcus manages to hold the back door against them until Alan helps Rose from the platform to the light engine, then, forced to release it, makes his own escape in a flying leap under fire. The brakeman of the special frightened by the pistol duel, signals for full speed ahead, and the special lights out like a scared jackrabbit, Trine's protests to the contrary notwithstanding.

THE GREAT GOD FEAR (Two Parts—Sept. 27).—In a frontier mining town Gabriel Blair nurses a man who has fallen sick of a strange skin disease. Some one in the community pronounces the disease leprosy and the community expels patient and nurse from the town. Blair provides for the man and goes back to the town, but being now contaminated they won't let him stay. He goes to another mining community looking for a doctor. In this second town lives Meta Gates with her aged father. Meta is courted by Dick Stull, a brutal fellow, who wants to marry her, but she will not have him. He finds her alone and his wooing is becoming rough, when Blair appears and Stull desists.

Blair is told that a doctor is hunting in the neighborhood, so he waits for the doctor to return and an affection springs up between Meta and Blair. One day a traveler from the first town arrives and, recognizing Blair, tells the town he is a leper. Blair is at once expelled, but Meta follows him while Stull sets out to bring her back before she can reach her lover.

The doctor happens into the first camp and is told of the leper. He goes out to see him and finds that he is not a leper. Crossing the mountain, the doctor meets Blair, Meta and Stull just as the latter is begging Meta to keep away from Blair and go with him. The doctor examines Blair and pronounces him not a leper and tells them that the first man also was not a leper. Stull departs defeated and the doctor passes on, leaving Meta and Blair to return to the camp. But Stull has preceded them and, counting on the fear of the town, organizes them against Blair and Meta, concealing the fact that Blair is not a leper.

The mob decides to kill the pair and menace them with guns, but dare not go near. Stull, knowing there is no danger, boldly assails Blair and in a hand-to-hand fight tries to kill him. Blair is getting the better of the combat, when Stull escapes from him and goes back to the mob. But the mob now believe him also contaminated and they kill him. The doctor now returns and dispels all fear, and Blair and Meta are invited back to the camp.

A MOTHER'S TRUST (Sept. 29).—A poor old mother has a scapegrace son whose drinking and gambling habits break her heart, although she strives mightily to lead her boy right. But he will not stay home nights and travels with a tough mob, one of whom finally leads him into a robbery. The man they plan to rob is a wealty man, whose philanthropy is well known. Invited to come to see him, the boy goes to see Keene, but only to get the lay of the land, for he and his pal, who plan to rob his house.

The boy and his crook pal later go to the man's house to rob and the boy waits in the hall standing guard, while his pal investigates the safe, etc. The crook carries a 38 caliber gun while Keene has a 32 in his desk, and while the burglar is looking over the place Keene enters the room, surprises the burglar, who fires on him and is in turn shot and killed by Keene. The latter is mortally wounded, the shots that wounded him also knocking his gun out of his hand, and he is thus forced to use the dead burglar's gun with which to protect himself against the boy, who enters on the run. Keene wounds the boy and then falls dead himself.

The boy, trying to get away, thinks he is dying and thinks of mother, etc. Maids are scared on account of the shots and dare not approach the room. The boy believing he is done for, crawls back to the room, places the burglar's gun back in his hands, crawls to the side of Keene, and the police—and particularly the mother—are led to believe that the boy was wounded by the burglar while defending his benefactor. This is published in the papers and the mother is happy at the thought of her boy being honest, and the boy realizes here is his chance to foster that belief in him by remaining "straight" always and be worthy of his mother's trust.

DOMINO.

A TRAGEDY OF THE NORTH WOODS (Three Parts—Sept. 17).—Mackenzie, an unpopular factor of the Hudson Bay Company, is discovered murdered by Sands, a trapper. Sands reports the occurrence to the trappers in the saloon, and there is a general air of hilarity at the death of Mackenzie whom all hate. Frenchy, a character of the settlement whom Mackenzie has cruelly beaten, is particularly glad.

Sergeant Allen of the Canadian Mounted Police is detailed on the case. He examines the desk of Mackenzie and finds there a photograph which resembles very much the daughter of Burke, the assistant factor. He learns from the girl that her mother is dead, but she shows him her photograph, which is identical with the one found in Mackenzie's effects. By a subtle piece of work, Allen forces Burke to a confession of the crime and his reasons for committing it. Formerly Burke went under the name of Strong, and Mackenzie was his friend. Mackenzie, tiring of his wife, runs off and deserts her, leaving her sick and penniless in a strange place. The wife writes to Burke, who comes on the scene only to find her dead. He takes charge of the baby and swears an oath of vengeance against Mackenzie. Upon Burke's arrival in the settlement he is lured into the woods and there a spectacular encounter takes place between them in which Burke kills Mackenzie. The heart of the detective is softened upon hearing this story and he wires to the chief that he is returning unable to secure evidence in the case of the murder of Mackenzie. He departs with the heartfelt gratitude of Burke, who is dazed, and the tender wishes of the daughter Hilda.

TEST OF FLAME (Two Parts—Sept. 24).—Mayer, an old New England fisherman, is passionately fond of his violin, a very valuable instrument. He plays it to the neglect of his daughter, Annie, who uncomplainingly does the drudgery of the house. Rand, a young man boarding at a summer hotel nearby, is wandering on the beach. Attracted to the Mayer cottage by the strains of the violin, he stops and in this way meets Annie. A love affair springs up between them and they are married to the bitter displeasure of the father.

Later hard luck overtakes the Rands and Annie sends her baby back for the care of the grandfather. He receives the child and she takes the place of his beloved violin in his affections. Annie, herself reconciled to her father, is returning home. The father sets out to meet her, leaving the child alone. A fire ensues from the explosion of the oil lamp and the house is burned. Previously the child had taken the violin from the chest and to surprise her grandfather hides. Mayer and his daughter are horrified to observe the burning house. Mayer makes an attempt to rescue the child, but the smoke overpowers him and he is forced to retreat. Later when they have given up hope of saving her, she returns on the beach and a reunion follows between all the parties.

KOMIC

BILL MANAGES A FIGHTER (Bill No. 7—Sept. 27).—Bill, still ambitious to make a name for himself, tackles the vocation of manager of a fighter. During his recreation he becomes impressed with the way "Sylves" shines shoes and figures he ought to make good as a scrapper. "Knock 'em Dear Kelly," whose manager happens into Hadley's office to draw up a life contract, gives Bill the idea, so Bill loses no time in assuring "Sylves" that his fortune will be made providing he puts his future in Bill's hands.

In due time Bill gets a match with his "brush pusher" against "Knock 'em Dead Kelly." Bill figures that Ethel, with all her attractiveness, ought to help a lot, so he arranges with her to be at the ringside, and if she sees that things are not going the right way for "Sylves" to use all her cunning and make an impression with "Knock 'em Dead Kelly." Ethel, true to her promise, starts in, and as Bill figured, "Knock 'em Dead Kelly" becomes more interested in Ethel than in his opponent, and during a careless moment "Sylves" puts over the "knock-out." This would have been all very well, but "Knock 'em Dead Kelly" realizing how he was double-crossed, watches his opportunity and, when "Sylves" isn't looking, he puts over one that puts an end to all hopes of "Sylves" over becoming a champion.

BRONCHO.

THE RIGHT TO DIE (Two Parts—Sept. 30).—David Walters, losing heavily on the stock exchange, and sooner then face his wife and daughter with disgrace, he decided to commit suicide. He takes a poison which is not strong enough to kill him, but which puts him in a deep sleep. He dreams of his wife and daughter thrown into poverty, his daughter compelled to work in a factory and about to become the prey of a rounder. He wanders through the scenes, suffering the tortures of the damned, but unable to assist his loved ones. The spell wears off and he comes to himself to find his wife and daughter well, and his supposed losses gains.

KAY BEE.

THE DEATH MASK (Two Parts—Sept. 25).—Running Wolf, the son of the High Chief of a Southland tribe, is fascinated by the vision of an Indian maiden which appears to him at intervals. He repulses gently the advances of Nona, a maiden of his own tribe, to the sorrow of his father. One Bear, an exhausted Indian, staggers into the camp and tells them of a tribe of fierce Indians far to the north, called the Tribe of the Three Brothers. He also describes a beautiful Indian girl whom Running Wolf recognizes as the girl of his dreams.

He journeys north to secure the Indian maid. He arrives, defeats the two brothers in battle, and the Indians calls upon the third terrible brother who always wears a grotesque mask over his face and whom they regard with superstitious awe. Running Wolf previously sheltered the Indian princess who was lost in a rain storm. The terrible third brother appears on the scene, but Running Wolf makes a dash for him and he retreats. The chase leads into the forest, where Running Wolf unmasks the mysterious personage and reveals the face of Nona, the maiden of his own tribe. They make their escape back to the village of his father.

Does MOVING PICTURE WORLD Advertising Pay?

Through some misunderstanding, the one-eighth page advertisement of the Meniscus Bi-Convex Condenser emanating from the Minneapolis office of the Laemmle Film Service, was omitted from a recent issue of The Moving Picture World, and following is a letter received from Mr. J. V. Bryson, manager of the Minneapolis branch of the Laemmle Film Service, relative to the omission:

Sept. 2, 1914.

Gentlemen:—

The writer would feel all broken up if the time would ever come when he could not use the columns of the Moving Picture World for his goods, and I am just wondering if manufacturers, jobbers and dealers appreciate the fact that they can reach the whole wide world through your columns. It is not at all unusual to receive orders and inquiries coming from foreign countries, even from Porto Rico, South America, China and Japan. No, I couldn't do without the "World" in pushing our Meniscus Bi-Convex Condensers and Brightasday Curtain Emulsion.

Trusting that you will continue our ad, and with best wishes, I remain,

Respectfully yours,

JEAN OF THE WILDERNESS (Two Parts—Sept. 8).—Jean Ribot, a young Canadian trapper, visits a small town in a western country and there meets Jim Halton, an old rancher, and his daughter Grace. The friendship between Ribot and Grace soon ripens into love, but Halton is falsely accused of the murder of a gambler, and is compelled to flee the country, owing his escape to the resourcefulness of Jean.

The fugitive finds a home in Canada, where Jean and Grace prepare for their approaching marriage. During Jean's absence on a hunting trip, Haskins, a former employee of the dead gambler, appears and by threatening to denounce Halton to the authorities, secures Grace's promise to marry him; consequently, when Ribot returns, he is surprised to find that she has apparently jilted him.

The father, however, cannot bear to see his daughter unhappy so he surrenders himself to the authorities, and thus leaves a way open to Grace's marriage to Ribot. Haskins, the gambler, sends a letter to Grace purporting to be from her father, stating that he has escaped, and asking her to meet him at a certain lonely spot in the wilderness. Fortunately, soon after Grace has set forth to the appointed place, Ribot learns that the message was not sent by her father, and arrives in time to rescue the girl and punish Haskins for his dastardly trick. Incidentally Ribot makes Haskins confess that he was the slayer of his late employer, and that Grace's father is innocent.

THE METTLE OF A MAN (Sept. 20).—Harry Raynor, private secretary to John Ross, the political boss, mortally fears his brutal employer. Ross imprisons Quinn, who has offended him politically, on a false charge of murder, and Raynor is just in time to save Alice, Quinn's daughter, from taking her life. He entrusts the girl, penniless and ill, to his mother. In her delirium she calls constantly for her father. The young man determines to steal from Ross the evidence of Quinn's innocence. The boss catches him in the act, and Raynor proves in a thrilling scene that he is the superior in both physical and moral courage. Quinn is exonerated, and Harry and Alice are married.

THE HARVEST OF REGRETS (Sept. 27).—Sheldon and his daughter Mary live in a small Western settlement. When Sheldon hears that Henry Moreland, his boyhood chum in the East, has died, he invites Moreland's son, Harry, to come out to Montana. The young man accepts gladly, for he has become involved with an adventuress, and is exceedingly anxious to get out of the woman's clutches. In the West, he falls in love with Mary Sheldon, and all goes well until Kate, the adventuress, is in need of more money. She follows him, and with the aid of Red Morrisey, an unwelcome suitor of Mary's, manages to expose Harry's past to the girl and her father. Before Harry can explain anything, Mary, in tears, has driven him from the house. A few days later, while Sheldon is away, Morrisey forces himself into Mary's presence. Harry arrives just in time to save her from insult. Convinced of Harry's courage and devotion, the Sheldons forgive everything, and Harry and Mary are happy.

PRINCESS.

THE MASTER HAND (Sept. 18).—Wilson, a young detective, falls in love with Clara Rich, and receives her father's consent to their marriage. Wilson is trying to track down "the mysterious hand" to which many robberies in the town are imputed, little dreaming that the burglar is none other than the father of the girl he loves. Quinn, a pal of Rich, jealous of Wilson, gives away the secret at police headquarters, and also reveals to the horrified Clara her father's vocation. An inspector bids Wilson come with him to arrest the thief. In Rich's apartment, however, Clara contrives to throw her arms about her lover and hold him while her father makes his escape, locking the door behind him. The fugitive is headed off below by the inspector, and Wilson putting several bullets through the lock, manages to wrench the door open. When he and Clara reach the hall downstairs, they find the in-

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO 36 (Sept. 21).—Margaret went to Newport. An old, old dream of hers had at last come true. And yet, she was not altogether prepared for the magnificence of Newport society, the palatial houses and the brilliant functions which she attended. She was even a trifle overawed by it all. For the first day or two she found herself in such a whirl of gaiety, meeting so many charming women and bantering with so many delightful young men, that she forgot everything but her joyous surroundings. During a tea at Malbone House, however, she wandered by herself for the first time since her arrival in the City of Pleasure—and her thoughts were of Baby Lily.

It seemed to Margaret that never in the world could she give up that darling mite, least of all to Mrs. Rogers. The same evening she received a letter from that lady demanding photographs of the child. Photographs! Why, it had never occurred to Margaret to have any taken! She made up her mind to go right back to New York in the morning and have a dozen poses made at once.

But it was Captain Welles of the Navy who was destined to alter the best laid plans of Our Mutual Girl. He called her on the phone and insisted that she postpone her trip next day to attend the sailors' drill. He put it so charmingly that Margaret could not refuse, and the following afternoon found her on the beautiful parade ground—a stretch of velvety turf, sloping, unbroken, to the ocean's edge—watching the apprentices of the Navy go through a landing drill, bayonet exercises and battle formations. Margaret was in ecstacies, and Captain Welles presented to her Senator Beekman of Rhode Island and many of the younger officers.

The next morning brought a telegram from Mrs. Rogers, saying that she had made up her mind to adopt the child without more delay. She asked Margaret to go to New York for Baby Lily, and said that, as Mrs. Knickerbocker was out of town, she would send her own car to meet Our Mutual Girl who might use the machine while in the city. So Margaret went down to town and was driven by Mrs. Roger's chauffeur to Aunt Sally's cottage.

And then an astounding thing happened. The chauffeur, at first glance, recognized in the tiny foundling his own child. He seized her from Margaret's arms and would have made off with her in the car, had the motor engine not refused to work. As it was, he leaped into another machine standing across the street. Margaret tried to crank the motor of Mrs. Roger's car. A bystander coming to her aid, the next instant she was in hot pursuit of the chauffeur. A mad chase followed, up one street and down another, sometimes zig-zagging wildly, and tearing around the corners. But at last Our Mutual Girl cornered the kidnapper, and a policeman came running to her rescue. Then, as though the rescue of Baby Lily were not enough, it transpired that Margaret had tracked down a famous jail-bird. Half believing the man's claim to the child, she was more resolved than ever to keep the baby for her own.

THE LAST SHOT (Sept. 23).—Little Marie, the daughter of a rancher, is left alone for the day. Her chief plaything is a little gold watch which her father has recently given her. She is heart-broken when she breaks the chain of this prized trinket and weeps bitterly. Billy, a traveler, stopping at the house for a drink, learns the cause of her tears and agrees to take the watch and chain to be repaired. At the jeweler's where he takes it to be mended while he waits, the jeweler recognizes it as one he had sold a few days before to Marie's father, whom he notifies. Meanwhile, Billy returns to the ranch and gives the watch back to Marie, returning at once to town. Soon after his departure another wayfarer appears at the ranch and when he finds little Marie alone, not only takes away her newly recovered watch and chain but also her father's revolver. Marie, frantic over the loss of her precious watch, resolves to set out on foot to the town to tell her father of the theft. She soon tires, however, and lies down by the roadside to sleep.

Meanwhile, Billy getting into an argument with the bad man in town, wounds and disarms him and starts on his way again. The sheriff who is on the look-out for an outlaw, who is supposed to be in the vicinity for whom a reward is offered, hearing a shot comes on the scene. Previously he had heard of the alleged theft of the watch and the two circumstances putting Billy under suspicion, the sheriff sets out to arrest him. A running fight ensues. Just as Billy is down to his last cartridge, he comes across the sleeping child, near whom a rattlesnake is coiled. There is but a moment to decide whether the last shot in the gun shall be used to defend himself or to save the child from the snake and without hesitation, Billy uses it on the reptile. Marie soon clears Billy of all suspicion and the party returning to town meet the bad man, whom Marie at once recognizes as the man who stole her watch. During the struggle to arrest him, the man loses his false whiskers and wig, disclosing the outlaw for whom the sheriff had been in search. After some discussion the reward is given to Marie.

PROTEA II (Five Parts).—At the death of the old banker, Curtis, his entire estate, including a gold mine, is willed to his niece, Lady Mabel. Count Skettitch, who has cleverly schemed for the hand of Mabel, arranges to have his spy employed by her as a butler. Under the terms of the will, the safe is not to be opened until a month has passed. Mabel, desiring to know its contents, calls on the great detective, Protea, who by the aid of the ultra-violet rays is able to read the document describing the location of the gold mine, but finds it incomplete with a note stating that the missing words will be found tattooed on the shoulder of Fred Sharp, the dead banker's valet.

That evening Skettitch, by the aid of his spy, enters the house and blows the safe. Being in possession of the same knowledge as Protea, at once starts to seek Sharp. She, however, is of the same mind and has already started on her journey. Finding Sharp bathing, falls into the river. Sharp at once goes to the rescue, bringing Protea safely to shore. By this means she has an opportunity to view Sharp's shoulder only to find the tattoo marks have been removed. Skettitch arrives shortly after to find the same conditions—Protea then makes a search of Sharp's room, only finding a photo of him in his bathing suit. In her rage, throws it to the ground, breaking the frame, which reveals the marking on his shoulder.

Skettitch hears this news through his spy and by the aid of narcotic balls, which he injects into Protea's room with a putty blower, succeeds in putting her in a deep sleep. Entering, he gets the information he seeks and politely leaves his card. Protea awakens and finding her document gone, lures Skettitch to her home at Redwood by a decoy letter. Once into the house, the staircase turns, throwing him in a walled chamber. Protea appears in a niche and demands the document. While surrendering it. Skettitch takes her ring. The walls close in on him until he finds it necessary to use dynamite, which blows up the house.

His spy, Haligan, takes the ring to Mabel with the news that Protea has met with an accident. Mabel, going to her aid, is kidnapped, and taken to Skettitch's house and imprisoned. Protea, with her right hand man, Tommy, having escaped injury, traps Haligan and inject a deadly fluid into his arm, the antidote to which Protea alone knows. She promises to give this dose to him if he will show her the hiding place of Skettitch. She is led to his camp, where suddenly she is lassoed, bound and taken to an abyss and suspended from a tree, which is set on fire. Faithful Tommy, seeing this, stretches a fish net under her and succeeds in saving her life.

Skettitch now in possession of the mine, and as he thinks Protea dead and Mabel a prisoner, turns his attention to the entertainment of courtesans and sycophants. Wanting a sensational spectacle, Tommy responds to the advertisement. He arranges to have Protea appear as Electra, a dancing girl. Skettitch at once falls in love with her and forces his attentions and pleads to meet her at her home. To this she agrees providing he bring Mabel with him. Once in her house with his prisoner, Protea unmasks, has him handcuffed and restores the old banker's property to the rightful owner.

THE CHIMES (Five Parts).—Trotty Veck, the licensed messenger, reconsiders his promise to allow the marriage of his daughter Meg to Richard, after being advised by Alderman Cute that it is a sin for the poor to wed. After his day's labors, he meets William Fern with his infant daughter Lillian seeking shelter from the authorities, who have threatened to hang him. The kind-hearted little man takes them to his humble home for the night. Far after midnight, Trotty, seated by the fireside and soothed by the chimes, falls asleep and dreams.

His dream first takes him to the belfry of the old church, where the spirit of the chimes chides him for having done something he should not, and endeavors to show that the consequences might be, by picturing the future. In this vision, Trotty sees his daughter Meg living in poverty and acting as mother to Fern's daughter Lil, now grown to girlhood—Fern, in prison for his demonstration against the rich, and Richard, a drunkard from disappointment. Sir Joseph Bowley visits the little home and offers to adopt Lil, but instead mistreats her so that she is compelled to escape, but finally, upon promise from Sir Joseph to free her father, gives herself up to him, only to be ejected in time from his fine home with an unfortunate infant. She goes back to Meg and dies from the effect of her ill-treatment, leaving the infant to Meg, who in turn is compelled to leave her home due to her poverty.

Going to the bridge, Meg attempts to end all for herself and infant. At this point Trotty's dreams comes to an end. He now realizes that the poor as well as the rich have a right to marry, and hastens to correct his error. This done, he goes to check Fern, leading one of his meetings. Knowing the influence little Lil has on her father takes her and induces Fern to give up his plans. Trotty and Richard are taken prisoners by Sir Joseph's servants and brought before this despot, who instead of compelling Trotty to submit to his terms, is himself forced to sign a document giving the poor their rights.

JESS OF THE MOUNTAIN COUNTRY (Four Parts).—Jack Gibbons, disappointed in love, decides to go to the camp of his friend, "Shorty" Grandon, to live down his feelings. Not far from camp lives Jess, whose father has died and left her with nothing except the small cabin in which she lives. While riding, Jack meets with an accident and is found by Jess, with whom he falls desperately in love. An engagement takes place after Jack has rescued Jess from her burning home and taken her safely from a raging forest fire.

Jack's sister Fay, in response to a wire, visits the camp to meet her new sister. At first she dislikes her ragged appearance, but is soon convinced of the sterling qualities of the noble girl. A visit to Jack's home is planned, to show the future member of the family. She is met with snubs, but lives down her pride and is finally taken into the bosom of the family.

A dance is given at which Jack pays his attentions to his first love. Jess, heartbroken, escapes in the night and returns to her mountain country. Hearing the news, "Shorty," with his fast automobile, dashes his friend to the home of his love, where a reconciliation takes place and the new daughter is received with open arms.

THE MYSTERY OF THE POISON POOL (Five Parts).—Joe Cameron, the diamond prospector, who has just been captured by a wandering band of cannibals, soon realizes that his life is about to come to an abrupt close, and in desperate hope that there may yet be a chance of resuce, he takes from around his neck his mother's locket, hangs it on a bush and is dragged away by the exulting natives.

Corporal Walton, a member of His Majesty's Mounted Patrol, comes upon the locket, and following the trail of the savages, attempts at night fall a heroically and cleverly conceived rescue, by lowering a rope over the large cliff. As Cameron starts to climb, an immense python crawls to the rope and starts down. With the savages below and the snake above, there seems no hope; but Walton, ever resourceful, shoots the snake in the head. Joe Cameron flees one way, and Walton escapes from the pursuing savages on horseback.

A year later, Cameron, still the hard drinking, wandering prospector, comes into the little African village of Ubangi, where he is softened for the first time in his life by the tender influence of Dorothy, the little village missionary. When Cameron sees a huge diamond a prospector has brought in, he is about to stab the man, to steal the stone, but the thought of Dorothy restrains him. Later Dorothy comes upon the murdered form of Cameron's guest. Dorothy cannot believe him guilty of this dastardly crime, but the circumstantial evidence is so strong against Cameron that, rather than face his chances of death, he makes good his escape.

The Forest Patrol pursue him, and Walton, never having recognized the man whom he saved a year before, runs him down in the brush and starts, with his prisoner handcuffed to him, on the journey back to Ubangi. Cameron seizes his opportunity, and rolls with his captor down an immense embankment. Walton's leg is strained. Cameron, while releasing himself from the handcuffs, discovers in Walton's pocket his mother's locket that he had left as a forlorn hope a year before. Then Walton shows him Dorothy's glove and tells him of their mutual love. Our heretofore stoney hearted prospector, raised by love to the greatest sacrifice a human being can make, starts to carry Walton back to the village for Dorothy's sake. He gives him his last drop of water, and when they come upon a limpid pool glowing in the sunlight, they are both about to drink, when Cameron discovers that it is one of Africa's horrors—a natural poison pool.

In a desperate struggle, at the brink of death, he knocks out the now delirious Walton, and with his unconscious form resumes his struggling journey back to civilization. Under arrest in Ubangi, he remains mute to all except Dorothy, and she, convinced of his love for her by his sacrifice, starts for headquarters to intercede in his behalf. On her way she comes across the real murderer, killed by the Mysterious Poison Pool, and with the evidence of

THE KING OF CHANCE (Kalem—Three Parts).—Despite his father's warnings, Tom Holliday continues in his intemperate habits. Flo Baker, a girl of the dance halls, ensnares the good-for-nothing. Jack Sands, a gambler, endeavors to save the boy because of the love he bears for Mae, Tom's sister. Tom, however, stubbornly persists in following the downward path. Flo loves Sands and learning the gambler, in turn, loves Mae, resolves to punish him through Tom. Sands endeavors to secure the consent of Mr. and Mrs. Holliday to marry Mae, but is ordered off the ranch. Due to Flo's urging, Tom rifles his father's cashbox and turns the money over to the dance hall girl. Mae and her father discover the theft. Filled with fury, Mr. Holliday orders his son from home. Mae informs her sweetheart of the turn of events, beseeching him to break Flo's influence over Tom.

Upon receipt of Mae's letter, Sands prepares to show Tom that he is Flo's dupe. He drops a note where the boy is sure to find it. When Tom reads the missive, he learns that Sands is to meet the dance hall girl at her home that afternoon. Here is his opportunity to square accounts with Sands, who has meddled in his affairs, and at the same time show Mae the character of the man to whom she has given her heart. Flo effusively greets the gambler when the latter calls. A short distance down the street, Tom and Mae observe Sands enter the woman's house. Mae, broken-hearted, returns home. Tom, however, is filled with a jealous rage and determines to settle matters with Sands. The gambler coolly acknowledges to the good-for-nothing that Flo is his sweetheart, hoping thereby to cure the boy of his infatuation. Tom, however, startles the gambler by declaring that Mae has seen him enter the house. Dashing Flo and Tom aside, Sands hastens after Mae, only to be refused a chance to explain. The deception has the desired effect, since Flo, blaming Sands' sudden departure upon Tom, drives him from her presence. Mae finally learns the state of affairs. She promises to wed Sands upon the condition that he give up gambling. The man agrees.

After their marriage, Sands and Mae purchase a ranch. Tom drifts lower down the scale. Mae, without her husband's knowledge, supplies the wretch with money. Sands, returning to the ranch house unexpectedly one morning, discovers his wife in the act of handing Tom a bill. He seizes the money and offers the boy a job. Tom sullenly refuses the position. Sands finally gives him money, but wants him never to return. Later, at the end of his resources, the boy holds up a stage coach. Sheriff Bennett and a posse go in pursuit of the robber. Hard pressed, Tom takes refuge in Sands' home. Sands is inclined to surrender Tom, but heeding Mae's pleas, finally consents to save him from the clutches of the law. Bennett and his men enter the ranch house but are prevented from searching the place by Sands, who covers them with his pistols. The posse besieges the building, raining a hail of lead into the place. A bullet strikes Tom, wounding him. Sands thereupon signals to Bennett. When the Sheriff enters the building, Sands offers to gamble with him for the boy. Should the Sheriff win, he gets the boy. Should Sands win, Tom is to go free, but Bennett is to take possession of the ranch. Although this is a flagrant breach of the law, Bennett's cupidity causes him to consent. Neither of the men notices Tom, who sits with his head buried in his arms. The cards are cut. Sands utters a cry of exultation—he has won. Approaching Tom, he places his hand upon the boy's shoulder—but Tom is dead!

THE FIFTH MAN (Selig—Three Parts).—Five young men having finished their course at college, meet in the home of Thomas Wynn to celebrate their emancipation from college work and to speed as parting guests, three of their number who are to depart at once for various foreign points. It is proposed that they shall again meet at the home of Wynn in New York, five years from that date, at 9 o'clock in the evening, if they are alive.

The years pass, and the appointed day is at hand. Only three out of the five arrive on time, but a letter is received from a fourth who is dying from a bullet wound in a hospital at Bombay. He sends his regrets that misfortune has laid him low so that he cannot be present. The three friends discuss their adventures during the five years, and it is nearly midnight, when they drink a toast to John Gaunt, the fifth man, "wherever he may be." Just as they are drinking this toast, the door is thrown open and into the room staggers an uncouth figure with long, unkempt hair and beard, dressed in tattered clothing, who dramatically announces himself to be the fifth man, John Gaunt. It is difficult for them to believe that it is he, but when they recognize him they receive him with expressions of joy and friendship and demand that he shall relate his adventures. John Gaunt then tells the following thrilling tale:

For three years he had buried himself in the wilds of Central America in search of gold. One day he wandered away from the camp and became lost in the jungle. After suffering many days of hardship and becoming exhausted for lack of food, he is found by a mad scientist, who has become crazy and degenerated into a mad beast and who is accompanied by a negro who is similarly afflicted. They live in a small hut filled with curios and stuffed animals and birds. The scientist expresses a delight at the discovery of John Gaunt and gravely announces that he is a most valuable and most unique specimen which he will add to his collection. Gaunt does not understand this until the madman and his crazy companion lead him to the rear of the hut, where stands a row of strongly constructed, heavy, wooden cages. In one of the cages is a fierce mountain lion, and in another a ferocious jaguar. Then to his horror and astonishment, he discovers in the next cage a beautiful American girl, clothed in the skins of wild animals, yet so beautiful and lovely that he is almost paralyzed at the sight. He learns that she was the daughter of a sea captain whose vessel had been wrecked on the coast, and she alone out of the entire crew was saved. The mad scientist had incarcerated her in this living tomb, and she had been there for two years.

At first Gaunt was given a certain amount of liberty by the mad scientist, and together with the crazy negro slept in the hut. One night Gaunt followed the insane scientist to a spot where he had concealed a considerable treasure in gold coin hidden in the ground. Gaunt saw him pour the clinking coins through his fingers like a miser, but he crawled back into the hut before the scientist was aware of his presence. Then he was placed in a cage containing the mountain lion, where he had a hand to hand battle for life and succeeded in killing the frightful beast with his bare hands. Two years pass by, and John Gaunt has learned to love the beautiful young captive, who is his companion in misery. Joan Darey, for that is her name, reciprocates the great love which pours from his heart, and they plan to escape. They manage to break from the cage and make their way into the fastness of the jungle, but they are pursued, captured and brought back. After another period of imprisonment, John Gaunt discovers to his great joy that one of the posts in the cage, which confines him, has become weakened by the work of insects. In his weakness he is unable to free Joan from her cage, and they determine that the best thing to do is for him to seek assistance from the nearest settlement.

So John Gaunt departs towards the seacoast, leaving Joan a prisoner in the wooden cage. He reaches the seaport, where his story is received with disbelief. People think he is crazy. He secures passage on a tramp steamer and arrives in New York City just in time to keep his appointment. "Do you believe me crazy?" he asks of his friends in pitiful tones. They declare that they believe every word he has stated, and Thomas Wynn, without hesitancy, prepares immediately an order for the captain of his private yacht to make ready within twenty-four hours for a voyage to Central America They are going to rescue Joan from her imprisonment in the jungle.

The voyage passes rapidly and without incident. The party of rescuers take up the back trail of John Gaunt and arrive finally at the hut of the madman and his assistant. They are just in time. The madman and his negro helper have had a mortal combat in which both are slain. Joan has been without food and water and is almost exhausted. Tenderly, they free her from her cage, and depart immediately for the seacoast, not forgetting, however, to dig up the golden treasure which the mad scientist had concealed. The great love which John bore for Joan, and which she reciprocated fully, made them happily oblivious of everything. Thomas Wynn and the other two friends congratulate themselves on the rescue of the beautiful prisoner and the helping of John Gaunt after his years of suffering and wanderings into a comfortable fortune, which would make Joan and himself independent for life.

LIBERTY BELLES (Biograph—K. & E.—Three Parts).—Margery Pennyfeather and Jack Everleigh, Dorothy Ketcham and Phil Fuller, are sweethearts and chums. Margery's father, Jasper Pennyfeather, is trying to build a hydro-aeroplane. Captain Hiram Ketcham, Dorothy's father, is preparing to sail to a desert island in search of a treasure. The Pennyfeathers and Ketchams are neighbors and the fathers object to the boys, Jack and Phil. Jack and Phil are preparing to leave for college, but before going they plot to get the girls into a boarding school in the neighborhood of the college. The boys write letters to Mrs. Sproutts, the principal of the school, for prices and particulars, to which they sign the names of Jasper Pennyfeather and Captain Ketcham.

Upon receiving the information the fathers decide to send their daughters to Mrs. Sproutts' school. The boys, upon learning that the girls have reached the school, make an effort to see them. They are discovered under the window calling the girls and are chased away. The fathers of the girls have both fallen in love with Mrs. Sproutts and are striving hard to win her affections. The girls of the school are taken by the swimming teacher to the beach, but Margery and Dorothy are left behind. The boys secure bathing suits and with the two girls go to another part of the beach. Mrs. Sproutts discovers the happy quartet and proceeds to drag the girls from the water. They are taken back to school and punished by being deprived of their dinner. The girls throw a note out of the window to the boys telling them they are hungry. The boys are quick to respond and soon return with refreshments which they hoist up to the window.

That night the belles of the dormitory plan a secret feast. The boys scheme to play a joke on the girls and, disguised as burglars in order to gain admittance to the feast, they climb the side of the house and crawl in through the window. Seeing the two supposed burglars, the girls are thrown into a panic. The boys are recognized, however, and given a hearty welcome. They are teaching the girls how to dance and Mrs. Sproutts' disturbed by the loud laughter and shuffle of the feet, suspects something is wrong and arouses the janitor, who in turn gets the town constable and all three go to the dormitory. The boys resume the role of burglars to avoid compromising the girls and are arrested and taken to the town lock-up. The girls now feel sorry for their escapade and plan to get the boys out of jail. By fondling the jailer they manage to steal the keys. They free the boys and the four young people decide to avoid further trouble, so proceed to get married. Not having any means of support, they start a cooking school.

Captain Ketcham finds the supposed treasure and also finds a shipwrecked sailor, who later turns out to be the husband of Mrs. Sproutts. The Captain sails for home, taking with him the shipwrecked sailor. Jasper Pennyfeather has built his large flying machine and has it nearly finished on the water's edge. Mrs. Sproutts has discovered that the girls have eloped and are married. She immediately sends a note to Mr. Pennyfeather telling him his daughter has eloped and is married. He hurries to the school and meets Captain Ketcham calling on Mrs. Sproutts. In order to decide who shall exhibit his wealth first, they toss a coin. Jasper Pennyfeather wins and invites the party to see his flying machine. The flying boat is a failure and all on board are ducked. They all return to the school and the Captain gives Jasper Pennyfeather the laugh. The Captain exhibits his treasure chest which, upon being opened, is found to have been a hoax and contains nothing. Mrs. Sproutts recognizes her husband and takes him back. The young people are very prosperous by this time and take their fathers in and put them to work

THE VIRGINIAN (Five Parts).—The Virginian (so called from his native state) is a free lance cowboy. Securing a job at Bear Creek, his happy disposition soon brings him a host of friends. He meets Steve, an old friend and former bunkmate. Mutual admiration draws them to each other; together, Steve and the Virginian perpetrate many practical jokes. During one of these pranks, the Virginian encounters "Trampas," the local bully and bad man, and the Virginian makes him "back down."

Deciding to open a school, the cattlemen send East for a teacher and "Molly," a trite, lovely Vermont miss, comes via the overland stage. The Virginian rescues Molly from the coach after the drunken driver wanders off the trail. At a barbecue the Virginian proposes to Molly, but is rejected. Trampas, who has made vile comments on Molly, is forced by the Virginian to "eat" his words.

Steve joins Trampas and his cattle thieves. The Virginian is selected by the cattlemen to hunt down and exterminate the marauders. Steve and Spanish Ed are captured and, despite the Virginian's fondness for Steve, stern duty compels him to dispose of them by the Western method, and Steve and Ed are hanged. Trampas, who escaped the posse, reaches an Indian camp, and incites them to kill his enemy. The Virginia is severely wounded and left by the Indians as dead. Molly finds the Virginian, takes him back to her cabin; nurses him back to health and promises to marry him. The Virginian hears that Trampas is again in camp and threatens his life. Seeking Trampas out, they meet in the street, a duel begins and, after Trampas has paid the penalty, the Virginian and Molly take up the thread of their dreams in peace.

ENGLAND'S MENACE (Three Parts).—The ruler of a foreign power is making secret plans to invade England. Of his advisors only the Chancellor protests against the outrageous scheme; his military and naval leaders are eager to obey his commands. One of the chief spies of this foreign power secures a place as butler in the house of Lord Talbot, Secretary to the British Prime Minister. He uses his opportunities to copy important papers which Lord Talbot has charge of papers which refer to the movements of British ships and soldiers.

Lord Talbot's two children have an amateur wireless outfit, which the spy uses to receive messages from his government. He burns a sheet of paper on which he decoded a message. The children find the burned fragment, which has remained intact, and though they make nothing of the message (the ink of which is still visible on the burned paper) they copy it off together with the numbers which represent the letters. The date fixed for the invasion arrives. The spy puts off his butler's livery and leaves Lord Talbot's house, going for the last time to the wireless outfit to receive his final message from his government. But the two children are already in the little wireless house, moreover they have taken down the code message, and by use of the key which they made from the charred paper, have succeeded in translating it. Just as they realize the significance of the message—that the foreign fleet is on its way toward the English coast—the spy enters the wireless house. Though the spy tries to balk them, the children get away on their motorcycle and carry the portentous news to their father and the Prime Minister at Downing street.

The British government acts at once. Orders are issued with swift decision. The fleets get up steam; the troops begin to march. By a clever use of the enemy's code, the Prime Minister sends out a wireless message which turns back the enemy's ships and transports. The danger is passed. The British government breathes a sigh of relief and the English people go placidly about their daily business without realizing how narrowly a dangerous menace has been averted.

GREAT NORTHERN FILM CO.

LAY DOWN YOUR ARMS (Four Parts).—Countess Martha, daughter of an old warrior, General Count Von Althaus, although she lost her first husband in battle, has married another military officer, Baron Frederick Von Tilling. They have both become to hate war and all that it means and they live in the hope that there will not be any war in the near future. But their hopes were in vain, for it was not long before a war was declared and the husband was called to arms. His wife was sick at the time and her two misfortunes together, nearly caused her death.

This conflict was of short duration, however, and soon they were happily united again. The hostilities were long enough though to arouse deeper disguse for war on Tilling's part, because of the manifold horrors he had seen on the battlefield. And Martha's great sorrow in having her beloved husband snatched from her in the hour when she needed him most, had made her the more bitter against war. Consequently, she persuaded her husband to resign from the service but no sooner had he written his resignation, than he was compelled to change his mind. His wife received a letter from her bankers, notifying her that her fortune was lost, and as they now had only his salary on which to live, he could not resign from the service. Thus the horror of war began to make itself felt on all sides, it being one of its evil results that swept away their fortune, through the failure of their bank.

The last conflict still fresh in their minds, a new war broke out, and Tilling was called again to the front. This time the strife was prolonged and desperate. Tilling's regiment was in the thick of the fray where the battles were fierce and disastrous. His regiment was finally routed, with terrific loss of life. The wounded were quartered in available places—barns, churches, railroad stations and the like. While Tilling was visiting one of these barns, it was struck with a huge shell, which destroyed the barn, killing most of its occupants and injuring Tilling as he sought to escape. He was rushed to the railroad station and sent by train to his home.

Meantime, Martha, who had not heard from her husband for so long, feared that he had been wounded or killed, and started for the seat of war to search for him among the injured. She disembarked from the very train that carried her husband back to the city. She met the family physician who was at the front and, together, they visited all the field hospitals. She was horrified at the sight of so many maimed and dying men. When she failed to find her husband, she returned home and was overjoyed to find him there, alive, and his wounds not serious.

Happiness now reigned supreme for this happy family. Martha's sister, Rosa, became engaged to her cousin, Conrad Von Althaus. All had forgotten war until alas, another of its inevitable terrible effects interrupted their contentment. Cholera, which had spread from the battlefield, attacked their house. First a maid contracted it and died. Then Rosa developed the dreaded disease and died. Her aged father was grief-stricken and after her funeral he died, but btfore the end he renounced his belief in war and prayed for peace, as Martha and her husband pledged themselves to the same cause.

THE $5,000,000 COUNTERFEITING PLOT (Six Parts).—The counterfeiters are shown at work in their engraving, bill-splitting and printing plants. One of the first counterfeits is placed in circulation by the daughter of one of the master counterfeiters. The bill is suspected and is sent to the Treasury in Washington, where it is proved to be a counterfeit when it peels in a pail of scalding water.

Mr. Burns is called to Washington, placed on the case, and immediately goes to Philadelphia, where the counterfeit was first dissovered. Mr. Burns locates men that he believes to be behind the fraud by suspicious engraving orders, and immediately calls in other Secret Service operators to assist him in shadowing. The Lancaster members of the counterfeiting gang learn that Mr. Burns is on their trail through the dishonest revenue inspector, and fire their warehouse in order to destroy the evidence. Mr. Burns, however, manages to place himself in the counterfeiting engraving plant in Philadelphia. In the raid which follows, the three engravers are cornered and arrested. The securing of evidence against the New York branch, where the counterfeit paper is made, is more difficult. Mr. Burns sends Florence Castle, his leading woman operative, to work the April Fool ruse by which he succeeds in getting one of the counterfeiters into jail without the latter's suspecting in the least that he is being trailed by Mr. Burns.

A "faked" newspaper is printed, blazing in its head lines an announcement that the New York counterfeiters have been captured and have confessed. Their confederate in jail, misled by it, confesses his part in the transaction and, upon his evidence, Mr. Burns is enabled to raid the counterfeit headquarters just in time to rescue his female operative.

Mr. Burns then adroitly secures a confession of Helen Long, the daughter of one of the counterfeiters, through a concealed recording phonograph, and with the record goes to the father. Long breaks down in Moyamensing prison, and gives evidence against his pals in Lancaster, in order to save his daughter. With this evidence, Mr. Burns goes to Lancaster. As he is examining the counterfeiters' printing press in a tobacco house there, the counterfeiters dynamite the warehouse. Mr. Burns and his men escape in the nick of time. The counterfeiters leap into a carriage, Mr. Burns following in a delivery wagon. After a running chase the counterfeiters are finally rounded up. The final scene shows some specially posed pictures of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, creator of Sherlock Holmes, with Mr. Burns.

THE CLUE OF THE SCARAB (Four Parts).—Albert Normand, the son of a wealthy banker, has married against his father's wishes, and disinherited, he supports his wife and child by performing the duties of attendant at the Egyptian Museum. Margaret Noble, an adventuress and leader of a clever band of swindlers, plans to obtain possession of some valuable jewels on exhibition at the Egyptian Museum. She visits the museum with the intention of stealing the jewels, and while there she drops an odd scarab brooch which is returned to her by the attendant. Her accomplice feigns a sudden illness, and in the excitement which follows, she succeeds in hiding in a mummy case. During the night she comes out of her hiding place, steals the jewels, and with the aid of her accomplices succeeds in getting away, but not before they have killed the night watchman of the museum, who tried to stop them.

The authorities offer a large reward for the capture of the criminals, and searching for evidence, Albert finds a scarab brooch, which he recognizes as the one he returned to the woman the day before. He decides to try and trace the thieves. By chance, one day he meets a woman whom he recognizes as the one who dropped the brooch. He follows her to a gambling house, where she loses heavily, and anxious to make her acquaintance he loans her some money. This changes her luck and she invites Albert to her home, but she recognizes him as the attendant of the Museum, and afraid that he might order their arrest she succeeds in trapping him. Meanwhile Albert's coat has been found on the bank of a river, and his wife has asked his father for help. He advises her that he will give her child a home, but will not allow her to enter his house. The child goes to live with her grandfather, but every night she meets her mother at the gates.

Margaret has lost all her money at the gaming tables, and hard up for cash, she calls on Roy Arden, the banker's secretary, who is madly in love with her, to help her in securing the money from the banker's safe. The banker, meanwhile, has changed the combination to his safe, and when the thieves find they cannot open it, they tareaten him with murder. Little Mary is just returning from her nocturnal meeting with her mother when she hears the tumult in the banker's room, and learning tae cause, she telephones for the police. They come just in time, as the old man would not have been able to hold out much longer. Little Mary can now have anything she desires as reward for her faithful services. She pleads for her mother, and the banker decides to visit his daughter-in-law. On arriving at the house they find husband and wife in each other's arms, as Albert has succeeded in escaping, and the family is happily reunited.

THE UNWELCOME MRS. HATCH (Four Parts).—Marian Lorimer, an affectionate and impulsive young wife, palls upon her coarse-natured husband, and he turns to the waiting arms of Madge Creighton, whose charms appeal to him more than the delicate qualities of his wife. A baby girl comes to the home of the Lorimers, and for a time this new tie unites husband and wife more closely, but soon Lorimer becomes again entangled in the wiles of the other woman. Jealous and angry, the heart-sore Marian listens to the false counsel of the husband's trusted friend, and consents to elope, telling Lorimer in a note that she has gone with a man who respects her more than does her husband. At the gate Marian turns back, drawn from the abyss by the love of her child, and dismisses her suitor forever. But Lorimer has already read the message of farewell, and refuses to admit her. On the strength of the fatal note, Lorimer obtains a divorce, with the custody of the child, and marries the other woman. Marian goes West, taking the name of "Mrs. Hatch," and supporting herself meagerly by the income of a little store.

Years pass, and one day she reads in the paper that the child whose baby image she still treasures in her broken heart has attained womanhood and love, and is about to be married. Taking her little all, the longing mother journeys back East, buys a magnificent wedding gift, and begs her former husband to grant her but one glimpse of her daughter. The pitiful plea is denied, and only through the kindly schemes of the old nurse, Agnes, is Marian able to see her child again. As a modiste, bearing the wedding gown of her daughter, Marian creeps into her old home, and sees and touches again her loved one, without the latter's knowledge of their tender relationship. Seeing a framed picture of her daughter, Marian yields to temptation, and conceals it in her dress; but the picture drops to the floor, and her former husband and his wife discover her presence and learn her identity. They threaten Marian with arrest for theft, and rather than expose her daughter to scandal, Marian steals away, humiliated and despairing. How the other woman is justly punished, the cruel husband, mother and child at last united is dramatically unfolded in this photoplay.

RENOWNED PLAYERS.

A GREAT MISTAKE (Five Parts)—William Collins, a wealthy real estate dealer of New York, is infatuated with Lily Anderson, an adventuress, and neglects his wife and child, Hazel. Mrs. Collins learns of his infidelity and institutes a suit for divorce. After Mrs. Collins obtains a decree, Collins marries Lily, and they leave for the West. Their child, Martha, resembles Hazel. Several years elapse and Lily dies, leaving Martha to be cared for by Collins who places her in an exclusive school for girls. While there Martha meets Rob, a disreputable character, who induces her to elope with him.

Collins receives a letter from the principal of the school informing him of the elopement. He decides to disinherit her. He calls his partner, Landau, to prepare a will leaving all his property to Hazel. Landau sees a chance to acquire Collins' fortune. He induces Miss Pierce, the office stenographer whom he has promised to marry, to prepare a will in accordance with Collins' wishes and another will leaving all of Collins' property to himself. As Collins is about to sign the first will, Landau substitutes the second document which Collins signs. As Landau tears the will which Collins believes he has signed, Collins looks up. A glance of the will he actually signed reveals the perfidy of his partner. They struggle. Collins is overpowered and dies.

Hazel Collins marries George Thompson, an eminent architect. Many years have passed and Landau becomes a prominent social figure. He meets Mrs. Thompson at a dance. He becomes infatuated with her. He hasn't the faintest idea that she is the woman he has robbed of her inheritance. He declares his love. She repulses him. He is determined to win her and lays plans to this end. He endeavors to interest her husband in a business proposition in order to gain an entree into the Thompson home. He is invited to dine with them. During the absence of Mr. Thompson, Landau makes advances to Mrs. Thompson and she orders him from the house. He leaves, vowing vengeance. While at a cabaret he meets a woman whom he believes to be Mrs. Thompson. He addresses her by the name, she laughs and exclaims: "My name is not Mrs. Thompson it is Martha Collins." He realizes that the woman is the sister of Mrs. Thompson. He comes to the conclusion that this woman will fit in powerfully in his plans of revenge on Mrs. Thompson. Landau meets Martha and her husband at their home. He engages them to enact a love scene so that he can deceive Thompson. Landau meets Thompson at the club and induces him to go for a walk. They draw near the scene where Martha and her husband are engaged in the love scene as arranged by Landau. Thompson sees them and imagines the woman to be his wife. He tries to lay hands on them as they flee. Landau accompanies Thompson to his home. Thompson enters just as Mrs. Thompson, who had attended a meeting of a charitable circle, returns. He stoutly maintains that she is unfaithful to him, and he turns a deaf ear to her protestation of innocence and drives her from the house.

A year passes and Thompson, brokenhearted, takes to drink. Mrs. Thompson kidnaps their child and works for their support. Landau visits her and offers to aid her. She refuses his aid. The child becomes dangerously ill, and the slender means of the mother are soon exhausted. In their last extremity she recalls Landau's offer and calls to see him. When she returns to her home she finds her child dead.

In the meantime Thompson has descended to the lowest stages of misery. He wanders through the slums, hoping to meet his wife again. He is attracted by a noisy crowd. Drawing near he finds Martha Collins stretched on the sidewalk in front of a saloon from which she was forcibly ejected. Believing her to be his wife he carries her to his home where she shortly dies, begging Thompson's forgiveness for what she has done. Thompson does not comprehend. He buries her as his wife.

Both mourners bury their dead. Husband and wife meet at the gates of the cemetery. Believing that the woman before him is the ghost of his wife whom he has buried, he flees. She pursues him with the cry: "Don't you know your wife." She finally convinces him of the great mistake that he has made. The story reaches the newspapers. The mystery is unraveled. Miss Pierce returns to New York after an absence of several years. While seeking employment Miss Pierce meets Landau. She reminds him of his promise to marry her. Believing that all evidence of his crime has been destroyed he maintains that he does not know her and shows her the door. Beside herself with rage she bares to the police the story of Landau's crime against Collins and his daughter. Landau commits suicide when the police call to arrest him. He leaves a confession. Mrs. Thompson regains her inheritance.

OZ FILM MFG. CO.

THE PATCHWORK GIRL OF OZ.—Living in a lonely forest in the Munchkin Country of the Land of Oz with Unc Nunkie is Ojo, an orphan boy. Ojo discovers that their supply of food is gone so he and Unc Nunkie start for Emerald City where there is plenty. Before they reach the city they stop at the house of Dr. Pipt who has just completed a magic concoction which, when applied to any inanimate object, will infuse it with life. The wife of Dr. Pipt, Margolotte, has become tired of doing her housework and makes a dummy girl of a patchwork quilt whom she proposes to use as a servant, after applying the magic lotion. Ojo asks Margolotte if she is going to give the servant brains, and he learns that such persons do not need any. Whereupon he injects too much of the magic brains invented by Dr. Pipt with a result that when the patchwork girl is brought to life she has a superabundance of gray matter. This so startles Unc Nunkie that he knocks a bottle off a shelf containing petrifying liquid which falls upon himself, Margolotte and Danx, the sweetheart of Jesseva and daughter of the magician, turning them to stone. In order to bring the persons back to life again Dr. Pipt tells the bereaved ones, Ojo and Jesseva, that it will take six years to make some more of the powder of life which has been spilled. As he is too tired to start working on this powder, he finds in his book of magical recipes an antidote for petrifaction consisting of three hairs from a Woozy's tail and a six-leaved clover to be mixed in a pail of water taken from a dark well. Before the doctor, Ojo and Jesseva start out to look for the necessary ingredients, Dr. Pipt, at the request of his daughter, reduces the statue of Danx to six inches so that she may carry it around with her.

The pranks of the Patchwork Girl cause the doctor so much annoyance that he throws her away, but she comes back again on the assumption that she is now one of the family. Ojo, Jesseva, the Patchwork Girl and some of Jesseva's friends start to look for the Woozy and a six-leaved clover while the doctor himself hunts for water from a dark well. Ojo and his co-workers come upon the Woozy, but cannot pull the hairs from his tail, so they take it with them. When they are but a short distance from Emerald City, Ojo discovers a six-leaved clover but is told by Jinjur, a female inhabitant of Emerald City, that it is a violation of the law of Oz to pluck one. But Ojo's desire to bring back to life his Unc breaks the law and places the clover in Jesseva's basket. The act is witnessed by Jinjur, who informs the officers of what has been committed when she is refused the statue of Danx, and all the Munchkins are attired in prisoner's garb and marched through the streets. Jinjur proclaims that the statue belongs to her and the officers immediately take it from Jesseva and give it to her. The Patchwork Girl observes what has been perpetrated, follows Jinjur, succeeds in overtaking her, and replevining the statue. Not recognizing her friends as they are being marched through the streets in prisoner's garb, the Patchwork Girl goes to the mountain country, where she rescues Dr. Pipt, who has been having trouble in his wanderings for a dark well, from Hoppertown where only one-legged men are allowed by condescending to have one of her legs amputated in place of his. After several other trying experiences Dr. Pipt and the Patchwork Girl succeed in finding a dark well from which they draw the precious water. Jinjur overtakes them as they are on their way to the Emerald City to aid their friends and snatches the statue from the Patchwork Girl.

The trial of the prisoners is about to be called before Ozma, the ruler of Emerald City, when the Scarecrow of Oz, one of the jurymen who is too good-natured to decide what punishment shall be meted out to the offenders, escapes. He meets Dr. Pipt and the Patchwork Girl and falls in love with the latter. At the palace of Ozma, Dr. Pipt entreats Her Majesty to let him use the six-leaved clover in a concoction which he is to prepare to bring his petrified wife to life again. Ozma consents, but as it must be done in her presence and as the statues are some distance away, the Wizard of Oz prepares a magic which brings the statues of Unc Nunkie and Margolotte in her presence, but the one of Danx is missing. Presently Jinjur appears with the small statue of Danx, and she is accused of theft by Dr. Pipt. The accused is ordered by Her Majesty to relinquish the statue to which demand she complies. Dr. Pipt then cuts three hairs from the Woozy's tail, which he mixes in the precious water with the much desired clover. The magic thus produced he sprinkles upon the statues and they all come back to life. As Danx is still in his diminutive size, Dr. Pipt soon remedies this, bringing him to his natural size by the application of more of his magic compound.

SYNDICATE FILM CORP.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY (Episode 13—Parts 25-26).—With the mysterious disappearance of the Hargreaves' treasure, or rather the box in which the conspirators believed it to be, as narrated in Episode Twelve, Braine and his companions are puzzled what to do next. For a time they make no attempt to molest Florence, and she and Jimmy Norton spend many happy hours together. Then the Countess Tagalavia, a titled Russian, who has been a girlhood friend of the Countess Olga, visits the latter and Braine. She brings a message from far-off Russia, which interests the chief conspirator greatly. A few days later, at a meeting of the conspirators, a strange knock is heard at the door. After certain preliminaries are gone through, the newcomer is admitted and his papers investigated and found correct. He is the secret agent from Russia, whose coming had been hinted at by the Countess Taglavia. Bearing with him the supreme authority from the inner council of the secret organization in Russia, he at once assumes command.

Meanwhile the Countess Olga, who knows nothing of the agent's arrival, visits Florence. At the time of her arrival, Florence, who as yet has found no reason to suspect her of complicity in the many plots of the conspirators, is opening the morning mail. She has just opened a mysterious-looking missive as the Countess enters, but at once lays it aside to greet her pseudo friend, whom Jones, the butler, is beginning to regard with a chary eye. They are deep in an animated conversation, when there comes a crash in one of the rooms upstairs, and a moment later a weeping maid comes to tell Florence that she has smashed a priceless bust.

Florence excuses herself for a moment, to ascertain the damage the maid has done, and the Countess Olga, left alone, does not neglect her opportunity. Almost the first thing that her roving eye lights upon is the letter, which Florence has just opened, but has not read. The Countess hurriedly reads the written page. As she does so her eyes light up in startled amaze, for this is what she reads:

My Dear Daughter:

I must turn the treasure over to you. Danger threatens me and I can no longer keep it in my charge. Meet me at eight o'clock tonight in the summer house by the old stone wall on the estate. Do not fail me, for unless I see you the treasure will be lost and my life will pay the forfeit. Your father,

SIDNEY HARGREAVES.

The Countess Olga's mind moves fast. Hargreaves then is alive after all? It is he who holds the secret of the vast fortune which she and the other conspirators have vainly sought to solve. Rising quickly, she steps toward the clock on the mantelpiece and turns its hands backward a full half hour. That done, she breatnes a quick sigh of relief, and as Florence re-enters the room, makes ready to say her adieus. As for Florence, on picking up the letter after her visitor has gone, her astonishment is quite as great as was that of the Countess on reading it.

In the garden by the old stone wall that evening, two cloaked mysterious figures meet. The taller of the two, in his slouched hat, bears a curious resemblance to the missing millionaire—the other hooded form to Florence.

"The treasure is in an office downtown," says the man in a low voice, "There I can tell you all in safety."

Not far off, a taxi is waiting and in it they speed cityward. Strangely enough they draw up at a building, which if Jimmy Norton or Jones had been with them would have roused the suspicions of Florence's faithful defenders. But the caped and hooded figure of the girl makes no serious protest as her companion leads the way to a room in the upper part of the building. Flinging open a door at the end of the hallway, he suddenly thrusts the shrinking girl into a room in which the masked conspirators are gathered.

"Here," he says dramatically, pushing her roughly before him, "is the girl you have been seeking so long."

For an instant there is a tense silence. It is broken by peals of sneering laughter, as the girl throws aside her cape and hood, disclosing the face and form of the Countess Olga. "Seize him," she says quickly. "It is Hargreaves—and he has the treasure." Almost as quickly as herself, the man tears aside the beard and wig that disguise him, displaying the features, not of Hargreaves, but of the secret agent from Russia. As for their intended victim, she sits weeping, alone in the Hargreaves' mansion. "If the clock hadn't been slow," she is saying, "I should have seen my father."

BROADWAY STAR FEATURES.

THE PAINTED WORLD (Three Parts).—By one of those strange mistakes of nature, a child is born to Elois, an actress. The advent of the child, Yvette, arouses in Elois the one fine trait in her nature, a tremendous mother-love. To keep the child clean and to protect it from the influence of her life and that of its dissolute father, becomes the one passion of her soul. The moment comes when it is borne upon her forcibly that the child must be sent away. She sends Yvette to a fashionable boarding school, instilling in the child's mind that she is a lady and the daughter of a wealthy widow, travelling extensively.

From her life at boarding school, Yvette dreads her visits home where she has to suffer the passionate, suffocating embrace and dreary companionship of a perfumed woman—her mother. On one of these visits she meets her father, under conditions so strange that she was gradually led to believe they were dreams, as her mother said, and the scar her mother carried across her eye, came to her in a fall. Her schooling over, Yvette, on the threshold of the world, returns home. Her mother leaves her alone the first night and her father, deep in his cups, pays her a visit and, in his maudlin drunkenness, discloses the fact that her mother is an actress. Yvette, unbelieving, rushes to the theatre, and from a seat in the balcony, sees her posing in the semi-nude.

The veneer that has been added to Yvette in years of training, lays bare the coarse, primal grain. Without letting her mother know, she becomes a burlesque queen. Her mother returns one night to find her husband there and her daughter missing. In the midst of a terrific scene, in which she tries to make him tell where the girl is, Yvette enters, now a member of the painted world. The mother realizes that her daughter is gone, and does the inevitable—saves the girl's soul at the cost of her body; lays a double crime to the man who has caused all her misery, and the tragedy ends in his being cornered, powerless to explain.

SMALL UP-KEEP

MOTIOGRAPH

1914 MODEL

With the hardened and ground parts used in the late Model MOTIOGRAPH it can't wear out—the up-keep is brought to a minimum, your pictures are ROCK STEADY even after twelve months' constant use.

Compare the Motiograph with any other new machine, for Up-keep and Rock Steady Pictures, after a twelve months' run, and you can easily see why the Modern Theatres are installing MOTIOGRAPHS.

MUTUAL PROGRAM

THE MAJESTIC MOTION PICTURE CO.

Presents for feature release Sunday, Oct. 4

OUT OF THE AIR

In Two Parts

FAY TINCHER

Who plays Ethel, the Stenographer, in the "Bill, The Office Boy," series.

A melodrama of exciting thrills and suspense, introducing remarkable scenes with fast moving aeroplane and railroad train never before attempted in motion pictures.

The KOMIC Release

For Sunday, September 27

No. 7 of the "Bill" Series

BILL MANAGES A PRIZEFIGHTER

appears to be the best thus far produced of Paul West's office boy stories.

MAJESTIC GUIDE FOR EXHIBITORS

(In which we try to tell only the truth about all Majestic Releases)

MEG OF THE MINES (1 Reel) Release date, Tuesday, Sept. 22—A drama of the West, with Mae Marsh in the leading role. The story is not especially novel, but the characteristic work of Miss Marsh makes it a very desirable offering.

THE GREAT GOD FEAR (2 Reels) Release date, Sunday, Sept. 27—Proves to be a very unique and superior picture, fresh and pleasing in scenery, story and acting, featuring Mae Marsh and Robert Harron.

HIS MOTHER'S TRUST (1 Reel) Release date, Tuesday, Sept. 29—Not entirely up to Majestic standard in detail of production, but a strong story featuring Robert Harron.

OUT OF THE AIR (2 Reels) Release date, Sunday, Oct. 4—Promises exceedingly well. More definite advice next week.

War In Europe Will Not Stop Us Selling You Meniscus Bi-Convex Condensers.

Fortunately we received last week six months' consignment of our now world wide famous condensers. Even the biggest and best jobbers and machine manufacturers in the country are wiring and 'phoning us for MENISCUS—BI-CONVEX CONDENSERS—WHY? Because Mr. Richardson, in his Projection Dept. Columns in August 1st's edition of The World said he had to hand it to us for giving the theatre man and his operator one of the best condenser combinations ever. We have convinced every hard to please man who has given us a chance; WE WILL YOU, TOO—if you want to improve your light 50% and decrease your electric light bill 40%. If you don't believe, we'll prove it. Don't try and order from your local exchange—send it direct—if you wish we will gladly give your exchange proper credit, but we prefer to fill all orders direct.

No matter how thrilling a story one may read, interest is not sustained if poor type, poor paper and poor press work make hard work for the eyes. It's the same with motion pictures. A clear picture is as necessary as a good scenario.

Because the basic product is right, the clearest pictures are on "Eastman" film. Look for the stencil mark in the margin.

MR. EXHIBITOR: Your Success Depends, Not Upon Promises, but Upon Actual Results Obtained

Some Screen Manufacturers Will Promise You Everything and Anything, BUT—Will They Guarantee to Keep Their Promises?

Will they guarantee their screen for five years against cracking, peeling, deteriorating, turning or turning black?
Will they guarantee their screen is climate proof and can be washed with soap and water?
Will they guarantee perfect projection regardless of how close your seats are placed to the screen, or angle?
Will they guarantee perfect projection, without haze, glare or eye-strain?
Will they really guarantee the saving?

We'll Be Guided by Our Policy of Six Years to Under-claim Rather Than Over-claim. You Can Rest Assured That We Do Not Exaggerate or Misrepresent. Therefore Feel Secure in Accepting Our Representations at Their Full Worth.

WE GUARANTEE MIRROROIDE FOR FIVE YEARS TO SUBSTANTIATE EVERY CLAIM WE MAKE AS ABOVE. WILL THEY?

MIRROROIDE, the Only Rough or Matte Metalized Surface on Earth—Silver White, Silver Flesh, or Pale Gold. Send for Our Large Free Samples. TEST, COMPARE with any Screen on Earth. MIRROROIDE IS THE WORLD'S BEST SCREEN—and We Will Back This Statement Up with $1,000.00 in Real Tests—Tests Open to the Public in General.

MIRROROIDE IS SOLD AT 36 1-9 CENTS THE SQUARE FOOT

Save Time, Labor and Polish!
Don't Polish Your Brass Rails, Poster Frames and Metal Work

Apply a coat of NEWMAN'S TRANSPARENT LACQUER. Positively prevents tarnishing and is easily applied with a brush (similar to varnishing) and keeps and preserves the metal at a bright, beautiful and lasting lustre for years; same as on a brass bed. Will stand lots of wear.
PRICE, per Pint (brush included) $2.50
Best money you ever invested!
